his hand over the sea, and thereby give a signal to the waters to close again, as, before, upon the word of command, they had opened to the right and the left, v. 29. He did so, and immediately the waters returned to their place, and overwhelmed all the host of the Egyptians, v. 27, 28. Pharaoh and his servants, who had hardened one another in sin, now fell together, and not one escaped. An ancient tradition says, that Pharaoh's magicians, Jaanes and Jambres, perished with the rest, as Balaam with the Midianites whom he had seduced, Numb. 31. 8. And now, (1.) God avenged upon the Egyptians the blood of the first-born whom they had drowned; and the principal is repaid with interest, it is recompensed double, full-grown Egyptians for newborn Israelites; thus the Lord is righteous, and precious is his people's blood in his sight, Ps. 72. 14. (2.) God reckoned with Pharaoh for all his proud and insolent conduct toward Moses his ambassador; mocking the messengers of the Lord, and playing the fool with them, bring ruin without remedy; now God got him honour upon Pharaoh, looking upon that proud man, and abasing him, Job, 40. 12. Come and see the desolations he made, and write it, not in water, but with an iron pen in the rock for ever. Here lies that bloody tyrant who bid defiance to his Maker, to his demands, threatenings, and judgments; a rebel to God, and a slave to his own barbarous passions; perfectly lost to humanity, virtue, and all true honour; here he lies, buried in the deep, a perpetual monument of divine justice. Here he went down to the pit, though he was a terror of the mighty in the land of the living. This is Pharaoh and all his multitude, Ezek. 31. 18.

IV. Here is the notice which the Israelites took of this wonderful work which God wrought for them, and the good impressions which it made upon them for the present.

1. They saw the Egyptians dead upon the sands, v. 30. Providence so ordered it, that the next tide threw up the dead bodies, (1.) For the greater disgrace of the Egyptians. Now the beasts and birds of prey were called to eat the flesh of the captains and mighty men, Rev. 19. 17, 18. The Egyptians were very nice and curious in embalming and preserving the bodies of their great men, but here the utmost contempt is poured upon all the grandees of Egypt; see how they lie, heaps upon heaps, as dung upon the face of the earth. (2.) For the greater triumph of the Israelites, and to affect them the more with their deliverance; for the eye affects the heart. See Isa. 66. 24. They shall go forth, and look upon the carcasses of the men that have transgressed against me. Probably, they stripped the slain, and, having borrowed jewels of their neighbours before, which (the Egyptians having by this hostile pursuit of them broken their faith with them) from henceforward they were not under any obligation to restore, they now got arms from them, which, some think, they were not before provided with. Thus, when God broke the heads of Leviathan in pieces, he gave him to be meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness, Ps. 74. 14.

2. The sight of this great work greatly affected them, and now they feared the Lord, and believed the Lord, and his servant Moses, v. 31. Now they were ashamed of their distrusts and murmurings, and, in the good mind they were in, they would never again despair of help from Heaven, no not in the greatest straits; they would never again quarrel with Moses, nor talk of returning to Egypt. They were now baptized unto Moses in the sea, 1 Cor. 10. 2. This great work, which God wrought for them by the ministry of Moses, bound them effectually to follow his directions, under God. This confirmed their faith in the promises that were yet to be fulfilled; and, being brought thus triumphantly out of Egypt, they did not doubt that they should be in Canaan shortly, having such a God to trust to, and such a mediator between them and him. Oh that there had been such a heart in them as now there seemed to be! Sensible mercies, when they are fresh, make sensible impressions; but with many these impressions soon wear off: while they see God's works, and feel the benefit of them, they fear him and trust in him; but they soon forget his works, and then they slight him. How well were it for us, if we were always in as good a frame as we are in sometimes!

CHAP. XV.

In this chapter, I. Israel looks back upon Egypt with a song of praise for their deliverance. Here is, 1. The song itself, v. 1..19. 2. The solemn singing of it, v. 20, 21. II. Israel marches forward in the wilderness, (v. 22.) and there, 1. Their discontent at the waters of Marah, (v. 23, 24.) and the relief granted them, v. 25, 26. 2. Their satisfaction in the waters of Elim, v. 27.

1. THEN sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the LORD, and spake, saying, I will sing unto the LORD, for he hath triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea. 2. The LORD is my strength and song, and he is become my salvation: he is my God, and I will prepare him an habitation; my father's God, and I will exalt him. 3. The LORD is a man of war: the LORD is his name. 4. Pharaoh's chariots and his host hath he cast into the sea: his chosen captains also are drowned in the Red sea. 5. The depths have covered them: they sank into the bottom as a stone. 6. Thy right hand, O LORD, is become glorious in power: thy right hand, O LORD, hath dashed in pieces the enemy. 7. And in the greatness of thine excellency thou hast overthrown them that rose up against thee: thou sentest forth thy wrath, which consumed them as stubble. 8. And with the blast of thy nostrils the waters were gathered together, the floods stood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea. 9. The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil; my lust shall be satisfied upon them; I will draw my sword, my hand shall destroy them. 10. Thou didst blow with thy wind, the sea covered them: they sank as lead in the mighty waters. 11. Who is like unto thee, O LORD, among the gods? who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders. 12. Thou stretchedst out thy right hand, the earth swallowed them. 13. Thou in thy mercy hast led forth the people which thou hast redeemed: thou hast guided them in thy strength unto thy holy habitation. 14. The people shall hear, and be afraid: sorrow shall take hold on the inhabitants of Palestina. 15. Then the dukes of Edom shall be amazed; the mighty men of Moab, trembling shall take hold upon them; all the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away. 16. Fear and dread shall fall upon them; by the greatness of thine arm they shall be as still as a stone; till thy people pass over, O LORD, till the people pass over, which thou hast purchased. 17. Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O LORD, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in, in the sanctuary, O LORD, which thy hands have established. 18. The LORD shall reign for ever and ever. 19. For the horse of Pharaoh went in with his chariots and with his horsemen into the sea, and the LORD brought again the waters of the sea upon them; but the children of Israel went on dry land in the midst of the sea; 20. And Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after her with timbrels and with dances. 21. And Miriam answered them, Sing ye to the LORD, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea.

Having read how that complete victory of Israel over the Egyptians was obtained, here we are told how it was celebrated; they that were to hold their peace while the deliverance was in working, (ch. 14. 14.) must not hold their peace, now that it was wrought: the less they had to do then, the more they had to do now; if God accomplishes deliverance by his own immediate power, it redounds so much the more to his glory. Moses, no doubt, by divine inspiration, indited this song, and delivered it to the children of Israel, to be sung before they stirred from the place where they saw the Egyptians dead upon the shore. Observe, 1. They expressed their joy in God, and thankfulness to him, by singing; it is almost natural to us thus to give vent to our joy, and the exultations of our spirit. By this instance, it appears that the singing of psalms, as an act of religious worship, was used in the church of Christ before the giving the ceremonial law, therefore was no part of it, nor abolished with it; singing is as much the language of holy joy, as praying is of holy desire. 2. Moses, who had gone before them through the sea, goes before them in the song, and composes it for them. Note, Those that are active in public services should not be neuters in public praises. 3. When the mercy was fresh, and they were much affected with it, then they sang this song. Note, When we have received special mercy from God, we ought to be quick and speedy in our returns of praise to him, before time and the deceitfulness of our own hearts efface the good impressions that have been made. David sang his triumphant song in the day that the Lord delivered him, 2 Sam. 22. 1. Bis dat qui cito dat—He gives twice who gives quickly. 4. When they believed the Lord, (ch. 14. 31.) then they sang this song: it was a song of faith; this connexion is observed, (Ps. 106. 12.) Then believed they his words, they sang his praise: if with the heart man believes, thus confession must be made.

Here is,

1. The song itself; and it is, 1. An ancient song, the most ancient that we know of. 2. A most admirable composition, the style lofty and magnificent, the images lively and proper, and the whole very moving. 3. It is a holy song, consecrated to the honour of God, and intended to exalt his name, and celebrate his praise, and his only, not in the least to magnify any man: holiness to the Lord is engraven on it, and to him they made melody in the singing of it. 4. It is a typical song. The triumphs of the gospel-church, in the downfall of its enemies, are expressed in the song of Moses and the song of the Lamb put together, which songs are said to be sung upon a sea of glass, as this was upon the Red sea, Rev. 15. 2, 3.

Let us observe what Moses chiefly aims at in this song.

(1.) He gives glory to God, and triumphs in him; this is first in his intention; (v. 1.) I will sing unto the Lord. Note, All our joy must terminate in God, and all our praises be offered up to him, the Father of lights, and Father of mercies, for he hath triumphed. Note, All that love God triumph in his triumphs: what is his honour should be our joy. Israelites rejoice in God, v. 2. [1.] As their own God, and therefore their strength, song, and salvation: happy therefore the people whose God is the Lord, they need no more to make them happy; they have work to do, temptations to grapple with, and afflictions to bear, and are weak in themselves; but he strengthens them, his grace is their strength. They are often in sorrow, upon many accounts, but in him they have comfort; he is their song; sin, and death, and hell, threaten them, but he is, and will be, their salvation; see Isa. 12. 2. [2.] As their fathers' God. This they take notice of, because, being conscious to themselves of their own unworthiness and provocations, they had reason to think that what God had now done for them was for their fathers' sake, Dent. 4. 37. Note, The children of the covenant ought to improve their fathers' relation to God as their God, for comfort, for caution, and for quickening. [3.] As a God of infinite power; (v. 3.) The Lord is a man of war, that is, well able to deal with all those that strive with their Maker, and will certainly be too hard for them. [4.] As a God of matchless and incomparable perfection; (v. 11.) Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? This is pure praise, and a high expression of humble adoration. It is, First, a challenge to all other gods to compare with him: "Let them stand forth, and pretend their utmost; none of them dare make the comparison." Egypt was notorious for the multitude of its gods, but the God of the Hebrews was too hard for them, and baffled them all, Numb. 33. 4. Deut. 32. 23..39. The princes and potentates of the world are called gods, but they are feeble and mortal, none of them all comparable to Jehovah the almighty and eternal God. Secondly, It is a confession of his infinite perfection, as transcendent and unparalleled. Note, God is to be worshipped and adored as a Being of such infinite perfection, that there is none like him, nor any to be compared with him; as one that in all things has, and must have, the pre-eminence, Ps. 89. 6. More particularly, 1. He is glorious in holiness; his holiness is his glory. It is that attribute which angels adore, Isa. 6. 3. His holiness appeared in the destruction of Pharaoh, his hatred of sin, and his wrath against obstinate sinners. It appeared in the deliverance of Israel, his delight in the holy seed, and his faithfulness to his own promise. God is rich in mercy, that is his treasure, glorious in holiness, that is his honour. Let us always give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness. 2. He is fearful in praises; that which is the matter of our praise, though it is joyful to the servants of God, is dreadful and very terrible to his enemies, Ps. 66. 1..3. Or, it directs us in the manner of our praising God; we should praise him with a humble holy awe, and serve the Lord with fear; even our spiritual joy and triumph must be balanced with a religious fear. 3. He is doing wonders, wondrous to all, being above the power, and out of the common course, of nature; especially wondrous to us, in whose favour they are wrought, who are so unworthy, that we had little reason to expect them. They were wonders of power, and wonders of grace; in both God was to be humbly adored.

(2.) He describes the deliverance they were now triumphing in; because the song was intended, not only to express and excite their thankfulness for the present, but to preserve and perpetuate the remembrance of this work of wonder to after-ages. Two things were to be taken notice of:

[1.] The destruction of the enemy; the waters were divided, v. 8. The floods stood upright as a heap, Pharaoh and all his hosts were buried in the waters. The horse and his rider could not escape, (v. 1.) the chariots, and the chosen captains; (v. 4.) they themselves went into the sea, and there they were overwhelmed, v. 19. The depths, the sea, covered them, and the proud waters went over the proud sinners, they sank like a stone, like lead, (v. 5, 10.) under the weight of their own guilt and God's wrath. Their sin had made them hard like a stone, and now they justly sink like a stone. Nay, the earth itself swallowed them; (v. 12.) their dead bodies sank into the sands upon which they were thrown up, which sucked them in. Those whom the Creator fights against, the whole creation is at war with. All this was the Lord's doing, and his only. It was an act of his power; Thy right hand, O Lord, not our's, has dashed in pieces the enemy, v. 6. It was with the blast of thy nostrils, (v. 3.) and thy wind, (v. 10.) and the stretching out of thy right hand, v. 12. It was an instance of his transcendent power, (v. 7.) in the greatness of thine excellency:

and it was the execution of his justice, Thou sentest forth thy wrath, v. 7. This destruction of the Egyptians was made the more remarkable by their pride and insolence, and their strange assurance of success; (v. 9.) The enemy said, I will pursue. Here is, First, Great confidence; when they pursue, they do not question but they shall overtake, and when they overtake, they do not question but they shall overcome, and obtain so decisive a victory as to divide the spoil. Note, It is common for men to be most elevated with the hopes of success, when they are upon the brink of ruin, which makes their ruin so much the sorer. See Isa. 37. 24, 25. Secondly, Great cruelty; nothing but killing, and slaying, and destroying, and this will satisfy his lust; and a barbarous lust that is, which so much blood must be the satisfaction of. Note, It is a cruel hatred with which the church is hated; its enemies are bloody men. This is taken notice of here, to shew, 1. That God resists the proud, and delight to humble those who lift up themselves; he that says, "I will, and I will, whether God will or no," shall be made to know, that, wherein he deals proudly, God is above him. 2. That those who thirst for blood shall have enough of it. They who love to be destroying shall be destroyed, for we know who has said, Vengeance is mine, I will repay.

[2.] The protection and guidance of Israel; (v. 13.) Thou in thy mercy hast led forth the people; led them forth out of the bondage of Egypt, led them forth out of the perils of the Red sea, v. 19. But the children of Israel went on dry land. Note, The destruction of the wicked serves for a foil to set off the salvation of Israel, and to make it the more illustrious, Isa. 45. 13..15.

(3.) He sets himself to improve this wonderful appearance of God for them. [1.] In order to quicken them to serve God; in consideration of this, (v. 2.) I will prepare him a habitation. God having preserved them, and prepared a covert for them under which they had been safe and easy, they resolve to spare no cost or pains for the erecting of a tabernacle to his honour, and there they will exalt him, and mention, to his praise, the honour he had got upon Pharaoh. God had now exalted them, making them great and high, and therefore they will exalt him, by speaking of his infinite height and grandeur. Note, Our constant endeavour should be, by praising his name and serving his interests, to exalt God; and it is an advancement to us to be so employed. [2.] In order to encourage them to trust in God: so confident is this psalmist of the happy issue of the salvation which was so gloriously begun, that he looks upon it as in effect finished already; (v. 13.) "Thou hast guided to thy holy habitation. Thou hast thus put them into the way to it, and wilt in due time bring them to the end of that way," for God's work is perfect; or, "Thou hast guided them to attend thy holy habitation in heaven with their praises." Note, Those whom God takes under his direction, he will guide to his holy habitation, in faith now, and in fruition shortly.

Two ways, this great deliverance was encouraging.

First, It was such an instance of God's power, as would terrify their enemies, and quite dishearten them, (v. 14..16.) The very tidings of the overthrow of the Egyptians would be more than half the overthrow of all their other enemies; it would sink their spirits, and that would go far toward the sinking of their powers and interests; the Philistines, Moabites, Edomites, and Canaanites, (with each of which nations Israel was to grapple,) would be alarmed by it, would be quite dispirited, and would conclude it was in vain to fight against Israel, when a God of such power fought for them. It had this effect; the Edomites were afraid of them, (Deut. 2. 4.) so were the Moabites, (Numb. 22. 3.) and the Canaanites, Josh. 2. 9, 10.—5. 1. Thus God sent his fear before them, (ch. 23. 27.) and cut off the spirit of princes.

Secondly, It was such a beginning of God's favour to them, as gave them an earnest of the perfection of his kindness. This was but in order to something further; (v. 17.) Thou shalt bring them in. If he thus bring them out of Egypt, notwithstanding their unworthiness, and the difficulties that lay in the way of their escape, doubtless, he will bring them into Canaan; for has he begun, (so begun,) and will he not make an end? Note, Our experiences of God's power and favour should be improved for the support of our expectations; "Thou hast—therefore not only thou canst, but we trust thou wilt," is good arguing. Observe, Thou wilt plant them in the place which thou hast made for thee to dwell in. Note, It is good dwelling where God dwells, in his church on earth, (Ps. 27. 4.) in his church in heaven, John, 17. 24. When he says, "This is my rest for ever," we should say, "Let it be ours."

Lastly, The great ground of the encouragement which they draw from this work of wonder, is, v. 18. The Lord shall reign for ever and ever. They had now seen an end of Pharaoh's reign; but time itself shall not put a period to Jehovah's reign, which, like himself, is eternal, and not subject to change. Note, It is the unspeakable comfort of all God's faithful subjects, not only that he does reign universally, and with an incontestable sovereignty, but that he will reign eternally, and there shall be no end of his dominion.

II. The solemn singing of this song, v. 20, 21. Miriam (or Mary, it is the same name) presided in an assembly of the women, who (according to the softness of their sex, and the common usage of those times for expressing joy) with timbrels and dances sang this song. Moses led the psalm, and gave it out for the men, and then Miriam for the women: famous victories were wont to be applauded by the daughters of Israel; (1 Sam. 18. 6, 7.) so was this: when God brought Israel out of Egypt, it is said, (Mic. 6. 4.) He sent before them Moses, Aaron, and Miriam, though we read not of any thing remarkable that Miriam did but this.* But those are to be reckoned great blessings to a people, who assist them, and go before them, in praising God.

22. So Moses brought Israel from the Red sea, and they went out into the wilderness of Shur; and they went three days in the wilderness, and found no water. 23. And when they came to Marah, they could not drink of the waters of Marah, for they were bitter: therefore the name of it was called Marah. 24. And the people murmured against Moses, saying, What shall we drink? 25. And he cried unto the LORD; and the LORD shewed him a tree, which when he had cast into the waters, the waters were made sweet: there he made for them a statute and an ordinance, and there he proved them, 26. And said, If thou wilt diligently hearken to the voice of the LORD thy God, and wilt do that which is right in his sight, and wilt give ear to his commandments, and keep all his statutes, I will put none of these diseases upon thee, which I have brought upon the Egyptians: for I am the LORD that healeth thee. 27. And they came to Elim, where were twelve wells of water, and threescore and ten palm-trees: and they encamped there by the waters.

It should seem, it was with some difficulty that Moses prevailed with Israel to leave that triumphant shore on which they sang the foregoing song. They were so taken up either with the sight, or with the song, or with the spoiling of the dead bodies, that they cared not to go forward, but Moses with much ado brought them from the Red sea into a wilderness: the pleasures of our way to Canaan must not retard our progress, but quicken it, though we have a wilderness before us. Now here we are told,

I. That in the wilderness of Shur they had no water, v. 22.

This was a sore trial to the young travellers, and an alloy to their joy; thus God would train them up to difficulties; David, in a dry and thirsty land where no water is, reaches forth toward God, Ps. 63. 1.

II. That at Marah they had water, but it was bitter, so that though they had been three days without water, they could not drink it, either because it was extremely unpleasant to the taste, or was likely to be prejudicial to their health, or was so brackish, that it rather increased their thirst than quenched it, v. 23. Note, God can imbitter that to us from which we promise ourselves most satisfaction, and often does so in the wilderness of this world, that our wants and disappointments in the creature may drive us to the Creator, in whose favour alone true comfort is to be had. Now in this distress,

1. The people fretted and quarrelled with Moses, as if he had done ill by them; What shall we drink? is all their clamour, v. 24. Note, The greatest joys and hopes are soon turned into the greatest griefs and fears with them that live by sense only, and not by faith.

2. Moses prayed; (v. 25.) He cried unto the Lord. The complaints which they brought to him, he brought to God, on whom, notwithstanding his elevation, Moses owned a constant dependence. Note, It is the greatest relief of the cares of magistrates and ministers, when those under their charge make them uneasy, that they may have recourse to God by prayer: he is the Guide of the church's guides; and to him, as the Chief Shepherd, the under-shepherds must upon all occasions apply.

3. God provided graciously for them; he directed Moses to a tree which he cast into the waters; in consequence of which, all of a sudden, they were made sweet. Some think this wood had a peculiar virtue in it for this purpose, because it is said, God shewed him the tree. God is to be acknowledged, not only in the creating of things useful for man, but in discovering their usefulness. Or perhaps this was only a sign, and not at all a means, of the cure, any more than the brazen serpent, or Elisha's casting one cruise full of salt into the waters of Jericho. Some make this tree typical of the cross of Christ, which sweetens the bitter waters of affliction to all the faithful, and enables them to rejoice in tribulation. The Jews' tradition is, that the wood of this tree was itself bitter, yet it sweetened the waters of Marah; the bitterness of Christ's sufferings and death alters the property of our's.

4. Upon this occasion, God came upon terms with them, and plainly told them, now that they were got clear of the Egyptians, and were entered into the wilderness, that they were upon their good behaviour, and that, according as they carried themselves, so it would be well or ill with them; there he made a statute and an ordinance, and settled matters with them; there he proved them, that is, there he put them upon the trial, admitted them as probationers for his favour. In short, he tells them, v. 26. (1.) What he expected from them, and that was, in one word, obedience. They must diligently hearken to his voice, and give ear to his commandments, that they might know their duty, and not transgress through ignorance; and they must take care in every thing to do that which was right in God's sight, and to keep all his statutes. They must not think, now that they were delivered from their bondage in Egypt, that they had no lord over them, but were their own masters; no, therefore they must look upon themselves as God's servants, because he had loosed their bonds, Ps. 116. 16. Luke, 1. 74, 75. (2.) What they might then expect from him; I will put none of these diseases upon thee, that is, "I will not bring upon thee any of the plagues of Egypt." This intimates, that, if they were rebellious and disobedient, the very plagues which they had seen inflicted upon their enemies should be brought upon them; so it is threatened, Deut. 28. 60. God's judgments upon Egypt, as they were mercies to Israel, opening the way to their deliverance, so they were warnings to Israel, and designed to awe them into obedience. Let not the Israelites think, because God had thus highly honoured them in the great things he had done for them, and had proclaimed them to all the world his favourites, that therefore he would connive at their sins, and let them do as they would. No, God is no Respector of persons; a rebellious Israelite shall fare no better than a rebellious Egyptian; and so they found, to their cost, before they got to Canaan. "But if thou wilt be obedient, thou shalt be safe and happy;" the threatening is implied only, but the promise is expressed, "I am the Lord that healeth thee, and will take care of thy comfort wherever thou goest." Note, God is the great Physician. If we be kept well, it is he that keeps us; if we be made well, it is he that recovers us; he is our Life, and the Length of our days.

III. That at Elim they had good water, and enough of it, v. 27. Though God may, for a time, order his people to encamp by the waters of Marah, yet that shall not always be their lot. See how changeable our condition is in this world, from better to worse, from worse to better; let us therefore learn both how to be abased and how to abound; to rejoice as though we rejoiced not, when we are full; and to weep as though we wept not, when we are emptied. Here were twelve wells for their supply, one for every tribe, that they might not strive for water, as their fathers had sometimes done; and, for their pleasure, there were seventy palm-trees, under the shadow of which their great men might repose themselves. Note, God can find places of refreshment for his people even in the wilderness of this world, wells in the valley of Baca, lest they should faint in their mind with perpetual fatigue; yet, whatever our delights may be in the land of our pilgrimage, we must remember that we do but encamp by them for a time, that here we have no continuing city.

CHAP. XVI.

This chapter gives us an account of the victualing of the camp of Israel.

- I. Their complaint for want of bread, v. 1..3. II. The notice God gave them beforehand of the provision he intended to make for them, v. 4..12. III. The sending of the manna, v. 13..15. IV. The laws and orders concerning the manna. 1. That they should gather it daily for their daily bread, v. 16..21. 2. That they should gather a double portion on the sixth day, v. 22..26. 3. That they should expect none on the seventh day, v. 27..31. 4. That they should preserve a pot of it for a memorial, v. 32.

I. AND they took their journey from Elim, and all the congregation of the children of Israel came unto the wilderness of Sin, which is between Elim and Sinai, on the fifteenth day of the second month after their departing out of the land of Egypt. 2. And the whole congregation of the children of Israel murmured against Moses and Aaron in the wilderness: 3. And the children of Israel said unto them, Would to God we had died by the hand of the LORD in the land of Egypt, when we sat by the flesh-pots, and when we did eat bread to the full; for ye have brought us forth into this wilderness, to kill this whole assembly with hunger. 4. Then said the LORD unto Moses, Behold, I will rain bread from heaven for you; and the people shall go out and gather a certain rate every day, that I may prove them, whether they will walk in my law or no. 5. And it shall come to pass, that on the sixth day they shall prepare that which they bring in; and it shall be twice as much as they gather daily. 6. And Moses and Aaron said unto all the children of Israel, At even, then ye shall know that bath brought you out from the land of Egypt: 7. And in the morning, then ye shall see the glory of the LORD; for that he heareth your murmurings against the LORD. And what are we, that ye murmur against us? 8. And Moses said, This shall be, when the LORD shall give you in the evening flesh to eat, and in the morning bread to the full; for that the LORD heareth your murmurings which ye murmur against him: and what are we? your murmurings are not against us, but against the LORD. 9. And Moses spake unto Aaron, Say unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, Come near before the LORD: for he hath heard your murmurings. 10. And it came to pass, as Aaron spake unto the whole congregation of the children of Israel, that they looked toward the wilderness, and, behold, the glory of the LORD appeared in the cloud. 11. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 12. I have heard the murmurings of the children of Israel: speak unto them, saying, At even ye shall eat flesh, and in the morning ye shall be filled with bread; and ye shall know that I am the LORD your God.

The host of Israel, it seems, took along with them out of Egypt, when they came thence on the fifteenth day of the first month, a month's provisions, which, by the fifteenth day of the second month, was all spent; and here we have,

I. Their discontent and murmuring upon that occasion, v. 2, 3. The whole congregation, the greatest part of them, joined in this mutiny; it was not immediately against God that they murmured, but (which was equivalent) against Moses and Aaron, God's vicegerents among them. 1. They count upon being killed in the wilderness; nothing less, at the first appearance of disaster. If the Lord had been pleased to kill them, he could easily have done that in the Red sea; but then he preserved them, and now could as easily provide for them. It argues great distrust of God, and of his power and goodness, in every distress and appearance of danger to despair of life, and to talk of nothing but being speedily killed. 2. They invidiously charge Moses with a design to starve them when he brought them out of Egypt; whereas, what he had done, was both by order from God, and with a design to promote their welfare. Note, It is no new thing for the greatest kindnesses to be misinterpreted, and basely represented as the greatest injuries. The worst colours are sometimes put upon the best actions. Nay, 3. They so far undervalue their deliverance, that they wished they had died in Egypt, nay, and died by the hand of the Lord too, that is, by some of the plagues which cut off the Egyptians, as if it were not the hand of the Lord, but of Moses only, that brought them into this hungry wilderness. It is common for people to say of that pain, or sickness, or sore, of which they see not the second causes, "It was what pleases God," as if that were not so likewise which comes by the hand of man, or some visible accident. Prodigious madness! They will rather die by the flesh-pots of Egypt, where they found themselves with provision, than live under the guidance of the heavenly pillar in a wilderness, and be provided for by the hand of God; they pronounce it better to have fallen in the destruction of God's enemies, than to bear the fatherly discipline of his children. We cannot suppose that they had any great plenty in Egypt, how largely soever they now talk of the flesh-pots, nor could they fear dying for want in the wilderness, while they had their flocks and herds with present, without regard to truth or reason. None talk more absurdly than murmurers. Their impatience, ingratitude, and distrust of God, were so much the worse, inasmuch as they had lately received such miraculous favours, and convincing proofs, both that God could help them in the greatest exigencies, and that really he had mercy in store for them. See how soon they forgot his works, and provoked him at the sea, even at the Red sea. Ps. 106. 7. 13. Note, Experiences of God's mercies greatly aggravate our distrusts and murmurings.

II. The care God graciously took for their supply; justly he might have said, "I will rain fire and brimstone upon these murmurers, and consume them;" but, quite contrary, he promises to rain bread upon them. Observe,

1. How God makes known to Moses his kind intentions, that he might not be uneasy at their murmurings, nor be tempted to wish he had let them alone in Egypt. (1.) He takes notice of the people's complaints; (v. 12.) I have heard the murmurings of the children of Israel. As a God of pity, he took cognizance of their necessity, which was the occasion of their murmuring; as a just and holy God, he took cognizance of their base and unworthy reflections upon his servant Moses, and was much displeased with them. Note, When we begin to fret and be uneasy, we ought to consider that God hears all our murmurings, though silent, and only the murmurings of the heart. Princes, parents, masters, do not hear all the murmurs of their inferiors against them, and it is well they do not, for perhaps they could not bear it; but God hears, and yet bears. We must not think, because God does not immediately take vengeance on men for their sins, that therefore he does not take notice of them; no, he hears the murmurings of Israel, and is grieved with this generation, and yet continues his care of them, as the tender parent of the froward child. (2.) He promises them a speedy, sufficient, and constant, supply, v. 4. Man being made out of the earth, his Maker has wisely ordered him food out of the earth, Ps. 104. 14. But the people of Israel, typifying the church of the first-born that are written in heaven, and born from above, and being themselves immediately under the conduct and government of heaven, receiving their charters, laws, and commissions, from heaven, from heaven also received their food: their law being given by the disposition of angels, they did also eat angels' food. See what God designed in making this provision for them, That I may prove them whether they will walk in my law or no. [1.] Thus he tried whether they would trust him, and walk in the law of faith or no; whether they could live from hand to mouth, and (though now uneasy because their provisions were spent) could rest satisfied with the bread of the day in its day, and depend upon God for fresh supplies to-morrow. [2.] Thus he tried whether they would serve him, and be always faithful to so good a Master, that provided so well for his servants; and hereby he made it appear to all the world, in the issue, what an ungrateful people they were, whom nothing could affect with a sense of obligation. Let favour be shewed to them, yet will they not learn righteousness, Isa. 26. 10.

2. How Moses made known these intentions to Israel, as God ordered him; here Aaron was his prophet, as he had been to Pharaoh; Moses directed Aaron what to say to the congregation of Israel; (v. 9.) and some think, that, while Aaron was giving a public summons to the congregation to come near before the Lord, Moses retired to pray, and that the appearance of the glory of the Lord, (v. 10.) was in answer to his prayer. They are called to come near, as Isa. 1. 18. Come, and let us reason together. Note, God condescends to give even murmurers a fair hearing; and shall we then despise the cause of our inferiors, when they contend with us? Job, 31. 13.

(1.) He convinces them of the evil of their murmurings; they thought they reflected only upon Moses and Aaron, but here they are told that God was struck at through their sides. This is much insisted on; (v. 7, 8.) "Your murmurings are not against us, then we would have been silent, but against the Lord; it was he that led you into these straits, and not we." Note, When we are tempted to murmur against those who are instruments of any uneasiness to us, whether justly or unjustly, we do well to consider how much we reflect upon God by it; men are but God's hand. They that quarrel with the reproofs and convictions of the word, and are angry with their ministers, when they are touched in a tender part, know not what they do, for therein they strive with their Maker. Let this for ever stop the mouth of murmuring, that it is during impiety to murmur at God, because he is God; and gross absurdity to murmur at men, because they are but men.

(2.) He assures them of the supply of their wants; that, since they had harped upon the flesh-pots so much, they should for once have flesh in abundance that evening, and bread the next morning, and so on every day thenceforward, v. 8, 12. Many there are, of whom we say, that they are better fed than taught; but the Israelites were thus fed, that they might be taught; he led him about, he instructed him; (Deut. 32. 10.) and as to this instance, see Deut. 8. 3. He fed thee with manna, that thou mightest know that man doth not live by bread only. And, beside that, here are two things mentioned, which he intended to teach them by sending them manna; [1.] By this ye shall know that the Lord hath brought you out from the land of Egypt, v. 6. That they were brought out of Egypt, was plain enough; but so strangely sottish and short-sighted were they, that they said it was Moses that brought them out, v. 3. Now God sent them manna, to prove that it was no less than infinite power and goodness that brought them out, and that could perfect what was begun. If Moses only had brought them out of Egypt, he could not thus have fed them; they must therefore own that that was the Lord's doing, because this was so, and both were marvellous in their eyes; yet, long afterward, they needed to be told that Moses gave them not this bread from heaven, John, 6. 32. [2.] By this ye shall know that I am the Lord your God, v. 12. This gave proof of his power as the Lord, and his particular favour to them as their God; when God plagued the Egyptians, it was to make them know that he was the Lord; when he provided for the Israelites, it was to make them know that he was their God.

3. How God himself manifested his glory, to still the murmurings of the people, and to put a reputation upon Moses and Aaron, v. 10. While Aaron was speaking, the glory of the Lord appeared in the cloud. The cloud itself, one would think, was enough both to strike an awe upon them, and to give encouragement to them; yet, in a few days, it was grown so familiar to them, that it made no impression upon them, unless it shone with an unusual brightness. Note, What God's ministers say to us, is then likely to do us good, when the glory of God shines in with it upon our souls.

13. And it came to pass, that at even the quails came up, and covered the camp: and in the morning the dew lay round about the host. 14. And when the dew that lay was gone up, behold, upon the face of the wilderness there lay a small round thing, as small as the hoar frost on the ground. 15. And when the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, It is manna: for they wist not what it was. And Moses said unto them, This is the bread which the LORD hath given you to eat. 16. This is the thing which the LORD hath commanded, Gather of it every man according to his eating, an omer for every man, according to the number of your persons, take ye every man for them which are in his tents. 17. And the children of Israel did so, and gathered, some more, some less. 18. And when they did mete it with an omer, he that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack; they gathered every man according to his eating. 19. And Moses said, Let no man leave of it till the morning. 20. Notwithstanding, they hearkened not unto Moses; but some of them left of it until the morning, and it bred worms, and stank: and Moses was wroth with them. 21. And they gathered it every morning, every man according to his eating; and when the sun waxed hot, it melted.

Now they begin to be provided for by the immediate hand of God.

I. He makes them a feast, at night, of delicate fowl, feathered fowl, (Ps. 78. 27.) therefore not locusts, as some think; quails, or pheasants, or some wild fowl, came up, and covered the camp, so tame, that they might take up as many of them as they pleased. Note, God gives us of the good things of this life, not only for necessity, but for delight, that we may not only serve him, but serve him cheerfully.

II. Next morning, he rained manna upon them, which was to be continued to them for their daily bread.

1. That which was provided for them was manna, which descended from the clouds, so that, in some sense, they might be said to live upon the air. It came down in dew that melted, and yet was itself of such a consistency as to serve for nourishing strengthening food, without any thing else. They called it Manna, Manku,—"What is this?" Either, "What a poor thing this is!" despising it: or, "What a strange thing this is!" admiring it: or, "It is a portion, no matter what it is; it is that which our God has allotted us, and we will take it, and be thankful," v. 14, 15. It was pleasant food: the Jews say, it was palatable to all, however varied their tastes.* It was wholesome food, light of digestion, and very necessary (Dr. Grew says) to cleanse them from disorders, with which he thinks it probable that they were, in the time of their bondage, more or less infected, which disorders a luxurious diet would have made contagious. By this spare and plain diet we are all taught a lesson of temperance, and forbidden to desire dainties and varieties.

2. They were to gather it every morning, (v. 16.) the portion of a day in his day, v. 4. Thus they must live upon daily providence, as the fowls of the air, of whom it is said, That thou givest them, they gather; (Ps. 104. 28.) not to-day for to-morrow, let the morrow take thought for the things of itself. To this daily raining and gathering of manna our Saviour seems to allude, when he teaches us to pray, Give us this day our daily bread. We are hereby taught, (1.) Prudence and diligence in providing food convenient for ourselves and our households; what God graciously gives, we must industriously gather; with quietness working, and eating our own bread, not the bread either of idleness or deceit. God's bounty leaves room for man's duty; it did so even when manna was rained, they must not eat, till they have gathered. (2.) Contentment and satisfaction with a sufficiency; they must gather, every man according to his eating; enough is as good as a feast, and more than enough is as bad as a surfeit. They that have most, have, for themselves, but food, and raiment, and mirth; and they that have least, generally have these: so that he who gathers much has nothing over, and he who gathers little has no lack. There is not so great a disproportion between one and another, in the comforts and enjoyments of the things of this life, as there is in the property and possession of the things themselves. (3.) Dependence upon Providence; "Let no man leave till morning, (v. 19.) but let them learn to go to bed and sleep quietly, though they have not a bit of bread in their tent, nor in all their camp, trusting that God, with the following day, will bring them their daily bread." It was surer and safer in God's store-house than in their own, and would thence come to them sweeter and fresher. Read with this, Matth. 6. 25. Take no thought for your life, &c. See here the folly of hoarding. The manna that was laid up by some, (who thought themselves wiser and better managers than their neighbours, and who would provide, in case it should fail next day,) putrefied and bred worms, and became good for nothing. Note, That proves to be most wasted, which is covetously and distrustfully spared. Those riches are corrupted, Jam. 5. 2, 3.

Let us set ourselves to think, [1.] Of that great power of God which fed Israel in the wilderness, and made miracles their daily bread. What cannot this God do, who prepared a table in the wilderness, and furnished it richly even for those who questioned whether he could or no? Ps. 78. 19, 20. Never was there such a market of provisions as this, where so many hundred thousand men were daily furnished, without money, and without price. Never was there such an open house kept as God kept in the wilderness for forty years together, nor such free and plentiful entertainment given. The feast which Ahasuerus made, to shew the riches of his kingdom, and the honour of his majesty, was nothing to this, Esth. 1. 4. It is said, (v. 21.) When the sun waxed hot, it melted; as if what was left, were drawn up by the heat of the sun into the air to be the seed of the next day's harvest, and so from day to day. [2.] Of that constant providence of God, which gives food to all flesh, for his mercy endures for ever, Ps. 136. 25. He is a great House-keeper that provides for all the creatures. The same wisdom, power, and goodness, that now brought food daily out of the clouds, does, in the constant course of nature, bring food yearly out of the earth, and gives us all things richly to enjoy.

22. And it came to pass, that on the sixth day they gathered twice as much bread, two omers for one man: and all the rulers of the congregation came and told Moses. 23. And he said unto them, This is that which the LORD hath said, To-morrow is the rest of the holy sabbath unto the LORD: bake that which ye will bake to-day, and seethe that ye will see the; and that which remaineth over lay up for you to be kept until the morning. 24. And they laid it up till the morning, as Moses bade: and it did not stink, neither was there any worm therein. 25. And Moses said, Eat that to-day; for to-day is a sabbath unto the LORD: to-day ye shall not find it in the field. 26. Six days ye shall gather it; but on the seventh day, which is the sabbath, in it there shall be none. 27. And it came to pass, that there went out some of the people on the seventh day for to gather, and they found none. 28. And the LORD said unto Moses, How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws? 29. See, for that the LORD hath given you the sabbath, therefore he giveth you on the sixth day the bread of two days: abide ye every man in his place, let no man go out of his place on the seventh day. 30. So the people rested on the seventh day. 31. And the house of Israel called the name thereof manna: and it was like coriander seed, white; and the taste of it was like wafers made with honey.

* Our Author alludes, we presume, to the following passage in the Apocryphal Book of Wisdom, ch. 16. 20, 21.—Thou hast . . . sent them bread . . . which had abundance of all pleasures in it, and was meet for all tastes. For thy sustenance declared thy sweetness unto thy children, which served to the appetites of him that took it, and was meet to that which every man would.—F. B.

We have here,

1. A plain intimation of the observing of a seventh-day sabbath, not only before the giving of the law upon mount Sinai, but before the bringing of Israel out of Egypt, and therefore from the beginning, Gen. 2. 3. If the sabbath had now been first instituted, how could Moses have understood what God said to him, (v. 5.) concerning a double portion to be gathered on the sixth day, without making any express mention of the sabbath? And how could the people so readily take the hint, (v. 22.) even to the surprise of the rulers, before Moses had declared that it was done with a regard to the sabbath, if they had not had some knowledge of the sabbath before? The setting apart of one day in the seven for holy work, and, in order to that, for holy rest, was a divine appointment ever since God created man upon the earth, and the most ancient of positive laws. The way of sabbath-sanctification is the good old way.

2. The double provision which God made for the Israelites, and which they were to make for themselves, on the sixth day; God gave them on the sixth day the bread of two days, v. 29. Appointing them to rest on the seventh day, he took care that they should be no losers by it: and none ever will be losers by serving God. On that day, they were to fetch in enough for two days, and to prepare it, v. 23. The law was very strict, that they must bake and seethe, the day before, and not on the sabbath-day. This does not now make it unlawful for us to dress meat on the Lord's day, but directs us to contrive our family-affairs so that they may hinder us as little as possible in the work of the sabbath. Works of necessity, no doubt, are to be done on that day; but it is desirable to have as little as may be to do of things necessary to the life that now is, that we may apply ourselves the more closely to the one thing needful. That which they kept for their food on the sabbath-day did not putrefy, v. 24. When they kept it in opposition to a command, (v. 20.) it stank; when they kept it in obedience to a command, it was sweet and good; for every thing is sanctified by the word of God and prayer.

3. The intermission of the manna on the seventh day; God did not send it then, and therefore they must not expect it, nor go out to gather, v. 25, 26. This shewed that it was not produced by natural causes, and that it was designed for a confirmation of the divine authority of the law which was to be given by Moses. Thus God took an effectual course to make them remember the sabbath-day; they could not forget it, nor the day of preparation for it. Some, it seems, went out on the seventh day, expecting to find manna, (v. 27.) but they found none; for those that will find must seek in the appointed time; Seek the Lord while he may be found. God, upon this occasion, said to Moses, How long refuse ye to keep my commandments? v. 28. Why did he say this to Moses? He was not disobedient; No, but he was the ruler of a disobedient people, and God charges it upon him, that he might the more warmly charge it upon them, and might take care that their disobedience should not be through any neglect or default of his. It was for going out to seek for manna on the seventh day that they were thus reprov'd. Note, (1.) Disobedience, even in a small matter, is very provoking. (2.) God is jealous for the honour of his sabbaths. If walking out on the sabbath to seek for food was thus reprov'd, walking out on that day purely to find our own pleasure cannot be justified.

32. And Moses said, This is the thing which the LORD commandeth; Fill an omer of it to be kept for your generations: that they may see the bread wherewith I have fed you in the wilderness, when I brought you forth from the land of Egypt. 33. And Moses said unto Aaron, Take a pot, and put an omer full of manna therein, and lay it up before the LORD, to be kept for your generations. 34. As the LORD commanded Moses, so Aaron laid it up before the testimony, to be kept. 35. And the children of Israel did eat manna forty years, until they came to a land inhabited; they did eat manna, until they came unto the borders of the land of Canaan. 36. Now an omer is the tenth part of an ephah.

God having provided manna to be his people's food in the wilderness, and to be to them a continual feast, we are here told,

1. How the memory of it was preserved; an omer of this manna was laid up in a golden pot, as we are told, (Heb. 9. 4.) and kept before the testimony, or the ark, when it was afterward made, v. 32. . 34. The preservation of this manna from waste and corruption was a standing miracle, and therefore the more proper memorial of this miraculous food. "Posterity shall see the bread," says God, "wherewith I have fed you in the wilderness;" see what sort of food it was, and how much each man's daily portion of it was, that it may appear they were neither kept to hard fare, nor to short allowance, and then judge between God and Israel, whether they had any cause given them to murmur, and find fault with their provisions, and whether they, and their seed after them, had not a great deal of reason gratefully to own God's goodness to them. Note, Eaten bread must not be forgotten; God's miracles and mercies are to be had in everlasting remembrance, for our encouragement to trust in him at all times.

2. How the mercy of it was continued as long as they had occasion for it. The manna never ceased till they came to the borders of Canaan, where there was bread enough and to spare, v. 35. See how constant the care of Providence is; seed time and harvest fail not, while the earth remains. Israel was very provoking in the wilderness, yet the manna never failed them: thus still God causes his rain to fall on the just and unjust.

The manna is called spiritual meat, (1 Cor. 10. 3.) because it was typical of spiritual blessings in heavenly things; Christ himself is the true Manna, the Bread of life, of which this was a figure, John, 6. 49. . 51. The word of God is the manna by which our souls are nourished, Matth. 4. 4. The comforts of the Spirit are hidden manna, Rev. 2. 17. These come from heaven, as the manna did, and are the support and comfort of the divine life in the soul, while we are in the wilderness of this world. It is food for Israelites, for those only that follow the pillar of cloud and fire; it is to be gathered, Christ in the word is to be applied to the soul, and the means of grace are to be used; we must every one of us gather for ourselves, and gather, in the morning of our days, the morning of our opportunities, which if we let slip, it may be too late to gather. The manna they gathered must not be hoarded up, but eaten; they that have received Christ, must by faith live upon him, and not receive his grace in vain: there was manna enough for all, enough for each, and none had too much; so in Christ there is a complete sufficiency, and no superfluity. But they that did eat manna hungered again, died at last, and with many of them God was not well-pleas'd; whereas they that feed on Christ by faith shall never hunger, and shall die no more, and with them God will be for ever well-pleas'd; the Lord evermore give us this bread!

CHAP. XVII.

Two passages of story are recorded in this chapter, I. The watering of the host of Israel. 1. In the wilderness they wanted water, v. 1. 2. In their want, they chid with Moses, v. 2, 3. 3. Moses cried to God, v. 4. 4. God ordered him to smite the rock, and fetch water out of that; Moses did so, v. 5, 6. 5. The place named from it, v. 7. II. The defeating of the host of Amalek. 1. The victory obtained by the prayer of Moses, v. 8. . 12. 2. By the sword of Joshua, v. 13. 3. A record kept of it, v. 14. . 16. And these things which happened to them are written for our instruction, in our spiritual journey and warfare.

1. AND all the congregation of the children of Israel journeyed from the wilderness of Sin, after their journeys, according to the commandment of the LORD, and pitched in Rephidim: and there was no water for the people to drink. 2. Wherefore the people did chide with Moses, and said, Give us water that we may drink. And Moses said unto them, Why chide ye with me? wherefore do ye tempt the LORD? 3. And the people thirsted there for water: and the people murmured against Moses, and said, Wherefore is this that thou hast brought us up out of Egypt, to kill us, and our children, and our cattle, with thirst? 4. And Moses cried unto the LORD, saying, What shall I do unto this people? They be almost ready to stone me. 5. And the LORD said unto Moses, Go on before the people, and take with thee of the elders of Israel; and thy rod, wherewith thou smotest the river, take in thine hand, and go. 6. Behold, I will stand before thee there upon the rock in Horeb; and thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come water out of it, that the people may drink. And Moses did so in the sight of the elders of Israel. 7. And he called the name of the place Massah, and Meribah, because of the chiding of the children of Israel, and because they tempted the LORD, saying, Is the LORD among us, or not?

Here is,

I. The strait that the children of Israel were in, for want of water; once before, they were in the like distress, and now, a second time, v. 1. They journeyed according to the commandment of the Lord, led by the pillar of cloud and fire, and yet they came to a place where there was no water for them to drink. Note, We may be in the way of our duty, and yet may meet with troubles, which Providence brings us into, for the trial of our faith, and that God may be glorified in our relief.

II. Their discontent and distrust in this strait: it is said, (v. 3.) They thirsted there for water. If they had no water to drink, they must needs thirst; but this intimates not only that they wanted water, and felt the inconvenience of that want, but that their passion sharpened their appetites, and they were violent and impatient in their desire; their thirst made them outrageous; natural desires, and those that are most craving, have need to be kept under the check and guidance of religion and reason.

See what was the language of this inordinate desire.

1. They challenged Moses to supply them; (v. 2.) Give us water, that we may drink, demanding it as a debt, and strongly suspecting that he was not able to discharge it. Because they were supplied with bread, they insist upon it, that they must be supplied with water too; and indeed to those that by faith and prayer live a life of dependence upon God, one favour is an earnest of another, and may be humbly pleaded: but the unthankful and unbelieving have reason to think that the abuse of former favours is the forfeiture of further favours; Let not them think that they shall receive any thing, (Jam. 1. 7.) yet they are ready to demand every thing.

2. They quarrelled with him for bringing them out of Egypt, as if, instead of delivering them, he designed to murder them, than which nothing could be more base and invidious, v. 3. Many that have not only designed well, but done well, for their generation, have had their best services thus misconstrued, and their patience thereby tried, by unthinking unthankful people. To such a degree their malice against Moses rose, that they were almost ready to stone him, v. 4. Many good works he had shewed them; and for which of these would they stone him? John, 10. 32. Ungoverned passions, provoked by the crossing of unbridled appetites, sometimes make men guilty of the greatest absurdities, and act like madmen, that cast firebrands, arrows, and death, among their best friends.

3. They began to question whether God were with them or not; (v. 7.) They tempted the Lord, saying, "Is the Lord among us, or not?" Is Jehovah among us by that name by which he made himself known to us in Egypt? They question his essential presence, whether there was a God or not; his common providence, whether that God governed the world; and his special promise, whether he would be as good as his word to them. This is called their tempting God, which signifies, not only a distrust of God in general, but a distrust of him after they had received such proofs of his power and goodness, for the confirmation of his promise: they do, in effect, suppose that Moses was an impostor—Aaron a deceiver—the pillar of cloud and fire a mere sham and illusion, which imposed upon their senses—that long series of miracles which had rescued them, served them, and fed them, a chain of cheats—and the promise of Canaan, a bauble upon them; it was all so, if the Lord was not among them. Note, It is a great provocation to God, for us to question his presence, providence, or promise, especially for his Israel to do it, who are so peculiarly bound to trust him.

III. The course that Moses took, when he was thus set upon and insulted. 1. He reproveth the murmurers; (v. 2.) Why chide ye with me? Observe how mildly he answered them; it was well that he was a man of extraordinary meekness, else their tumultuous conduct would have made him lose the possession of himself: it is folly to answer passion with passion, for that makes bad worse; but soft answers turn away wrath: he shewed them whom their murmurings reflected upon, and that the reproaches they cast on him fell on God himself; Ye tempt the Lord, that is, "By distrusting his power, ye try his patience, and so provoke his wrath." 2. He made his complaint to God; (v. 4.) Moses cried unto the Lord: this servant came, and shewed his Lord all these things, Luke, 14. 21. When men unjustly censure us and quarrel with us, it will be a great ease to us, to go to God, and by prayer lay the case before him, and leave it with him; if men will not hear us, God will; if their bad conduct towards us ruffle our spirits, God's consolations will compose them. Moses begs of God to direct him what he should do, for he was utterly at a loss; he could not of himself either supply their want, or pacify their tumult; God only could do it. He pleads his own peril, "They be almost ready to stone me; Lord, if thou hast any regard to the life of thy poor servant, interpose now."

IV. God's gracious appearance for their relief, v. 5, 6. He orders Moses to go on before the people, and venture himself in his post, though they spake of stoning him. He must take his rod with him, not (as God might justly have ordered) to smother some plague or other to chastise them for their distrust and murmuring, but to fetch water for their supply. Oh the wonderful patience and forbearance of God toward provoking sinners! He loads those with benefits, that make him to serve with their sins, maintains those that are at war with him, and reaches out the hand of his bounty to those that lift up the heel against him. Thus he teaches us, if our enemy hunger, to feed him, and if he thirst, as Israel did now, to give him drink, Rom. 12. 20. Matth. 5. 44, 45. Will he fail those that trust him, when he was so liberal even to those that tempted him? If God had only shewed Moses a fountain of water in the wilderness, as he did Hagar not far from hence, (Gen. 21. 19.) that had been a great favour; but, that he might shew his power as well as his pity, and make it a miracle if mercy, he gave them water out of a rock. He directed Moses whither to go, and appointed him to take of the elders of Israel with him, to be witnesses of what was done, that they might themselves be satisfied, and might satisfy others, of the certainty of God's presence with them; he promised to meet him there in the cloud of glory, (to encourage him,) and ordered him to smite the rock: Moses obeyed, and immediately water came out of the rock in great abundance, which ran throughout the camp in streams and rivers, (Ps. 78. 15, 16.) and followed them wherever they went in that wilderness: it is called a fountain of waters, Ps. 114. 8. God shewed the care he took of his people, in giving them water when they wanted it; he shewed his power, in fetching the water out of a rock; and he put an honour upon Moses, in appointing the water to flow out, upon his smiting of the rock. This fair water, that came out of the rock, is called honey and oil, (Deut. 32. 13.) because the people's thirst made it doubly pleasant; coming when they were in extreme want, it was like honey and oil to them. It is probable the people digged canals for the conveyance of it, and pools for the reception of it, in like manner as, long afterwards, passing through the valley of Baca, they made it a well, Ps. 84. 6. Numb. 21. 18. Let this direct us to live in a dependence, 1. Upon God's providence, even in the greatest straits and difficulties. God can open fountains for our supply, where we least expect them, waters in the wilderness, (Isa. 43. 20.) because he makes a way in the wilderness, v. 19. Those who, in this wilderness, keep to God's way, may trust him to provide for them. While we follow the pillar of cloud and fire, surely goodness and mercy shall follow us, like the water out of the rock. 2. Upon Christ's grace; that Rock was Christ, 1 Cor. 10. 4. The graces and comforts of the Spirit are compared to ivers of living water, John, 7. 38, 39.—4. t4. These flow from Christ, who is the Rock smitten by the law of Moses, for he was made under the law. Nothing will supply the needs, and satisfy the desires, of a soul, but water out of the rock, this fountain opened. The pleasures of sense are puddle-water; spiritual delights are rock-water, so pure, so clear, so refreshing; rivers of pleasure.

V. A new name was, upon this occasion, given to the place, preserving the remembrance, not of the mercy of their supply, (the water that followed them was sufficient to do that,) but of the sin of their murmuring, Massah, Temptation, because they tempted God, Meribah, Strife, because they chid with Moses, v. 7. There was thus a remembrance kept of sin, both for the disgrace of the sinners themselves, (sin leaves a blot upon the name,) and for warning to their seed to take heed of sinning after the similitude of their transgression.

8. Then came Amalek, and fought with Israel in Rephidim. 9. And Moses said unto Joshua, Choose us out men, and go out, fight with Amalek: to-morrow I will stand on the top of the hill, with the rod of God in mine hand. 10. So Joshua did as Moses had said to him, and fought with Amalek: and Moses, Aaron, and Hur went up to the top of the hill. 11. And it came to pass, when Moses held up his hand, that Israel prevailed: and when he let down his hand, Amalek prevailed. 12. But Moses' hands were heavy; and they took a stone, and put it under him, and he sat thereon; and Aaron and Hur stayed up his hands, the one on the one side, and the other on the other side; and his hands were steady until the going down of the sun. 13. And Joshua discomfited Amalek and his people with the edge of the sword. 14. And the LORD said unto Moses, Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua: for I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven. 15. And Moses built an altar, and called the name of it JEHOVAH-nissi. 16. For he said, Because the LORD hath sworn that the LORD will have war with Amalek from generation to generation.

We have here the story of the war with Amalek, which, we may suppose, was the first that was recorded in the book of the wars of the Lord, Numb. 21. 14. Amalek was the first of the nations that Israel fought with, Numb. 24. 20. Observe,

I. Amalek's attempt; they came out, and fought with Israel, v. 8. The Amalekites were the posterity of Esau, who hated Jacob because of the birthright and blessing, and this was an effort of the hereditary enmity; a malice that ran in the blood, and perhaps was now exasperated, by the working of the promise towards an accomplishment. Consider this, 1. As Israel's affliction; they had been quarrelling with Moses, (v. 2.) and now God sends Amalekites to quarrel with them: wars abroad are the just punishment of strifes and discontents at home. 2. As Amalek's sin; so it is reckoned, Deut. 25. 17, 18. They did not boldly front them, as a generous enemy, but, without any provocation given by Israel, or challenge given to them, basely fell upon their rear, and smote those that were faint and feeble, and could neither make resistance, nor escape; herein they bade defiance to that Power which had so lately ruined the Egyptians; but in vain did they attack a camp guarded and victualled by miracles; verily they knew not what they did.

II. Israel's engagement with Amalek, in their own necessary defence against the aggressors; and there,

1. The post assigned to Joshua, of whom this is the first mention: he is nominated commander in chief in this expedition, that he might be trained up to the services he was designed for, after the death of Moses, and be a man of war from his youth. He is ordered to draw out a detachment of choice men from the thousands of Israel, and to drive back the Amalekites, v. 9. When the Egyptians pursued them, Israel must stand still, and see what God would do; but now it was required that they should bestir themselves. Note, God is to be trusted in the use of means.

2. The post assumed by Moses, (v. 9.) I will stand on the top of the hill, with the rod of God in my hand. See how God qualifies his people for, and calls them to, various services for the good of his church; Joshua fights, Moses prays, and both minister to Israel. Moses went up to the top of the hill, and placed himself, probably, so as to be seen by Israel; there he held up the rod of God in his hand; that wonder-working rod which had summoned the plagues of Egypt, and under which Israel passed out of the house of bondage. This rod Moses held up, (1.) To Israel, to animate them; the rod was held up as the banner to encourage the soldiers, who might look up, and say, "Yonder is the rod, and yonder the hand that used it, when such glorious things were wrought for us." Note, It tends much to the encouragement of faith, to reflect upon the great things God has done for us, and review the monuments of his favours. (2.) To God, by way of appeal to him: "Is not the battle the Lord's? Is not he able to help, and engaged to help? Witness this rod, the voice of which, thus held up, is that, (Isa. 51. 9, 10.) Put on strength, O arm of the Lord; art not thou it that hath cut Rahab?" Moses was not only a standard-bearer, but an intercessor, pleading with God for success and victory. Note, When the host goes forth against the enemy, earnest prayers should be made to the God of hosts, for his presence with them. It is here the praying legion that proves the thundering legion. There, in Salem, in Zion where prayers were made, there, the victory was won, there brake he the arrows of the bow, Ps. 76. 2, 3.

Observe,

[1.] How Moses was tired, (v. 12.) his hands were heavy; the strongest arm will fail with being long extended; it is God only whose hand is stretched out still. We do not find that Joshua's hands were heavy in fighting, but Moses's hands were heavy in praying; the more spiritual any service is, the more apt we are to fail and flag in it; praying work, if done with due in-tearsness of mind and vigour of affection, will be found hard work, and though the spirit be willing, the flesh will be weak: our great Intercessor in heaven faints not, nor is he weary, though he attends continually to this very thing.

[2.] What influence the rod of Moses had upon the battle; (v. 11.) When Moses held up his hand in prayer, (so the Chaldee explains it,) Israel prevailed, but when he let down his hand from prayer, Amalek prevailed. To convince Israel that the hand of Moses (with whom they had just now been chiding) contributed more to their safety than their own hands, his rod than their sword, the success rises and falls, as Moses lifts up or lets down his hands. It seems, the scale wavered for some time, before it turned on Israel's side; even the best cause must expect disappointments as an ally to its success; though the battle be the Lord's, Amalek may prevail for a time; the reason was, Moses let down his hands. Note, The church's cause is, commonly, more or less successful, according as the church's friends are more or less strong in faith, and fervent in prayer.

[3.] The care that was taken for the support of Moses. When he could not stand any longer, he sat down, not in a chair of state, but upon a stone; (v. 12.) when he could not hold up his hands, he would have them held up; Moses, the man of God, is glad of the assistance of Aaron his brother, and Hur, who, some think, was his brother-in-law, the husband of Miriam. We should not be shy, either of asking help from others, or giving help to others, for we are members one of another. Moses's hands, thus stayed, were steady till the going down of the sun; and though it was with much ado that he held out, yet his willing mind was accepted. No doubt, it was a great encouragement to the people to see Joshua before them in the field of battle, and Moses above them upon the top of the hill; Christ is both to us; our Joshua, the Captain of our salvation, who fights our battles, and our Moses, who, in the upper world, ever lives, making intercession that our faith fail not.

III. The defeat of Amalek. Victory had hovered awhile between the camp; sometimes Israel prevailed, and sometimes Amalek, but Israel carried the day, v. 13. Though Joshua fought with great disadvantages—his soldiers undisciplined, ill armed, long inured to servitude, and apt to murmur; yet by them God wrought a great salvation, and made Amalek pay dear for his insolence. Note, Weapons, formed against God's Israel, cannot prosper long, and shall be broken at last. The cause of God and his Israel will be victorious. Though God gave the victory, yet it is said, Joshua discomfited Amalek, because Joshua was a type of Christ, and of the same name, and in him it is that we are more than conquerors. It was his arm alone that spoiled principalities and powers, and routed all their force.

IV. The trophies of this victory set up.

1. Moses took care that God should have the glory of it; (v. 15.) instead of setting up a triumphal arch, to the honour of Joshua, (though it had been a laudable policy to put marks of honour upon him,) he builds an altar to the honour of God; and we may suppose it was not an altar without sacrifice; but that which is most carefully recorded, is, the inscription upon the altar, Jehovah-nissi—The Lord is my banner; which, probably, refers to the lifting up of the rod of God as a banner in this action. The presence and power of Jehovah were the banner under which they enlisted, by which they were animated and kept together, and therefore which they erected in the day of their triumph. In the name of our God we must always lift up our banners, Ps. 10. 5. It is fit that he who does all the work should have all the praise.

2. God took care that posterity should have the comfort and benefit of it; "Write this for a memorial, not in loose papers, but in a book, write it, and then rehearse it in the ears of Judah, let him be intrusted with this memorial, to transmit it to the generations to come." Moses must now begin to keep a diary or journal of occurrences; it is the first mention of writing that we find in scripture, and perhaps the command was not given till after the writing of the law upon the tables of stone: "Write it, in perpetuum rei memoriam—that the event may be had in perpetual remembrance;" that which is written remains. (1.) Write what had been done, what Amalek had done against Israel; write in gall their bitter hatred, write in blood their cruel attempts, let them never be forgotten, nor yet what God had done for Israel in saving them from Amalek. Let ages to come know that God fights for his people, and he that touches them, touches the apple of his eye. (2.) Write what should be done. [1.] That in process of time Amalek should be totally ruined and rooted out, (v. 14.) that he should be remembered only in history. Amalek would have cut off the name of Israel, that it might be no more in remembrance, (Ps. 83. 4, 7.) and therefore God not only disappoints him in that, but cuts off his name. Write it for the encouragement of Israel, whenever the Amalekites are an annoyance to them, that Israel will at last undoubtedly triumph in the fall of Amalek. This sentence was executed in part by Saul, (1 Sam. 15.) and completely by David; (ch. 30. 2 Sam. 1. 1.—8. 12.) after this time, we never read so much as of the name of Amalek. [2.] That in the mean time God would have a continual controversy with him; (v. 16.) Because his hand is upon the throne of the Lord, that is, against the camp of Israel, in which the Lord ruled, which was the place of his sanctuary, and is therefore called a glorious high throne from the beginning, (Jer. 17. 12.) therefore the Lord will have war with Amalek from generation to generation. This was written for direction to Israel, never to make any league with the Amalekites, but to look upon them as irreconcilable enemies, doomed to ruin. Amalek's destruction was typical of the destruction of all the enemies of Christ and his kingdom. Whoever make war with the Lamb, the Lamb will overcome them.

CHAP. XVIII.

This chapter is concerning Moses himself, and the affairs of his own family.

I. Jethro his father-in-law brings to him his wife and children, v. 1. 6.

II. Moses entertains his father-in-law with great respect, (v. 7.) with good discourse, (v. 8. 11.) with a sacrifice and a feast, v. 12. III. Jethro advises him about the management of his business, as a judge in Israel, to take inferior judges in to his assistance; (v. 13. 23.) Moses, after some time, takes his counsel, (v. 24. 26.) and so they part, v. 27.

1. WHEN Jethro, the priest of Midian, Moses' father-in-law, heard of all that God had done for Moses, and for Israel his people, and that the LORD had brought Israel out of Egypt; 2. Then Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, took Zipporah, Moses' wife, after he had sent her back, 3. And her two sons; of which the name of the one was Gershom; for he said, I have been an alien in a strange land: 4. And the name of the other was Eliezer; for the God of my father, said he, was mine help, and delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh: 5. And Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, came with his sons and his wife unto Moses into the wilderness, where he encamped at the mount of God: 6. And he said unto Moses, I thy father-in-law Jethro am come unto thee, and thy wife, and her two sons with her.

This incident may very well be allowed to have happened, as it is placed here, before the giving of the law, and not, as some place it, in connexion with what is recorded, Numb. 10. 11, 29, &c. Sacrifices were offered before; in these mentioned here, (v. 12.) it is observable that Jethro is said to take them, not Aaron. And as to Jethro's advising Moses to constitute judges under him, though it is intimated, (v. 13.) that the occasion of his giving that advice was on the morrow, yet it does not follow but that Moses's settling of that affair might be some time after, when the law was given as it is placed, Deut. 1. 9. It is plain that Jethro himself would not have him make this alteration in the government, till he had received instructions from God about it, (v. 23.) which he did not, till some time after. Jethro comes,

I. To congratulate the happiness of Israel, and particularly the honour of Moses his son-in-law; and now Jethro thinks himself well-paid for all the kindness he had shewed to Moses in his distress, and his daughter better-matched than he could have expected. Jethro could not but hear what all the country rang of, the glorious appearances of God for his people Israel; (v. 1.) and he comes to inquire, and inform himself more fully thereof, (see Ps. 111. 2.) and to rejoice with them, as one that had a true respect both for them and for their God. Though he, as a Midianite, was not to share with them in the promised land, yet he shared with them in the joy of their deliverance. We may thus make the comforts of others our own, by taking pleasure, as God does, in the prosperity of the righteous.

II. To bring Moses's wife and children to him. It seems, he had sent them back, probably from the inn where his wife's aversion to the circumcision of her son had like to have cost him his life; (ch. 4. 25.) he sent them home to his father-in-law, fearing lest they should prove a further hinderance; he foresaw what discouragements he was likely to meet with in the court of Pharaoh, and therefore would not take any with him in his own family. He was of that tribe that said to his father, I have not known him, when service was to be done for God, Deut. 33. 9. Thus Christ's disciples, when they were to go upon an expedition, not much unlike that of Moses, were to forsake wife and children, Matth. 19. 29. But though there might be a reason for the separation that was between Moses and his wife for a time, yet they must come together again, as soon as ever they could with any convenience. It is the law of the relation, Ye husbands, dwell with your wives, 1 Pet. 3. 7. Jethro, we may suppose, was glad of his daughter's company, and fond of her children, yet he would not keep her from her husband, nor them from their father, v. 5, 6. Moses must have his family with him, that, while he ruled the church of God, he might set a good example of prudence in family government, 1 Tim. 3. 5. Moses had now a great deal both of honour and care put upon him, and it was fit that his wife should be with him, to share with him in both.

Notice is taken of the significant names of his two sons. 1. The eldest was called Gershom, (v. 3.) a stranger; Moses designing thereby, not only a memorial of his own condition, but a memorandum to his son of his condition also; for we are all strangers upon earth, as all our fathers were. Moses had a great uncle almost of the same name, Gershon, a stranger; for though he was born in Canaan, (Gen. 46. 11.) yet even there the patriarchs confessed themselves strangers. 2. The other he called Eliezer, (v. 4.) My God a help, as we translate it; it looks back to his deliverance from Pharaoh, when he made his escape, after the slaying of the Egyptian; but, if this was (as some think) the son that was circumcised in the inn as he was going, I would rather translate it, so as to look forward, which the original will bear The Lord is mine help, and will deliver me from the sword of Pharaoh, which he had reason to expect would be drawn against him, when he was going to fetch Israel out of bondage. Note, When we are undertaking any difficult service for God in our generation, it is good for us to encourage ourselves in God as our Help: he that has delivered, does, and will.

7. And Moses went out to meet his father-in-law, and did obeisance, and kissed him; and they asked each other of their welfare; and they came into the tent. 8. And Moses told his father-in-law all that the LORD had done unto Pharaoh and to the Egyptians for Israel's sake, and all the travail that had come upon them by the way, and how the LORD delivered them. 9. And Jethro rejoiced for all the goodness which the LORD had done to Israel, whom he had delivered out of the hand of the Egyptians. 10. And Jethro said, Blessed be the LORD, who hath delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of the hand of Pharaoh, who hath delivered the people from under the hand of the Egyptians. 11. Now I know that the LORD is greater than all gods; for in the thing wherein they dealt proudly he was above them. 12. And Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, took a burnt-offering and sacrifices for God: and Aaron came, and all the elders of Israel, to eat bread with Moses' father-in-law before God.

Observe here,

I. The kind greeting that was between Moses and his father-in-law, v. 7. Though Moses was a prophet of the Lord, a great prophet, and king in Jeshurun, yet he shewed a very humble respect to his father-in-law. However God in his providence is pleased to advance us, we must make conscience of giving honour to whom honour is due, and never look with disdain upon our poor relations. Those that stand high in the favour of God, are not thereby discharged from the duty they owe to men, nor will that justify them in a stately haughty carriage. Moses went out to meet Jethro, did obeisance to him, and kissed him. Religion does not destroy good manners. They asked each other of their welfare. Even the kind How-do-you's that pass between them are taken notice of, as the expressions and improvements of mutual love and friendship.

II. The narrative that Moses gave his father-in-law of the great things God had done for Israel, v. 8. This was one thing Jethro came for, to know more fully and particularly what he had heard the general report of. Note, Conversation concerning God's wondrous works is profitable conversation; it is good, and to the use of edifying, Ps. 105. 2. Compare Ps. 145. 11, 12. Asking and telling news, and discoursing of it, are not only an allowable entertainment of conversation, but are capable of being turned to a very good account, by taking notice of God's providence, and its operations and tendencies in all occurrences.

III. The impressions this narrative made upon Jethro. 1. He congratulated God's Israel; (v. 9.) Jethro rejoiced. He not only rejoiced in the honour done to his son-in-law, but in all the goodness done to Israel, v. 9. Note, Public blessings are the joy of public spirits. While the Israelites were themselves murmuring, notwithstanding all God's goodness to them, here was a Midianite rejoicing. This was not the only time that the faith of the Gentiles shamed the unbelief of the Jews; see Matth. 8. 10. Stangers-by were more affected with the favours God had shewed to Israel, than they were that received them. 2. He gave the glory to Israel's God; (v. 10.) "Blessed be Jehovah," (for by that name he is now known,) "who hath delivered you, Moses and Aaron, out of the hand of Pharaoh, so that though he designed your death, he could not effect it, and by your ministry has delivered the people." Note, Whatever we have the joy of, God must have the praise of. 3. His faith was hereby confirmed, and he took this occasion to make a solemn profession of it; (v. 11.) Now know I that Jehovah is greater than all gods. Observe, (1.) The matter of his faith: That the God of Israel is greater than all pretenders, all false and counterfeit deities, that usurp divine honours; he silences them, subdues them, and is too hard for them all, and therefore is himself the only living and true God. He is also higher than all princes and potentates, (who also are called gods,) and has both an incontestable authority over them, and an irresistible power to controul and over-rule them; he manages them all as he pleases, and gets honour upon them, how great soever they are. (2.) The confirmation and improvement of his faith; Now know I; he knew it before, but now he knew it better; his faith grew up to a full assurance, upon this fresh evidence. Those obstinately shut their eyes against the clearest light, who do not know that the Lord is greater than all gods. (3.) The ground and reason upon which he built it; for wherein they dealt proudly, the magicians, and the idols which the Egyptians worshipped, or Pharaoh and his grandees, (they both opposed God, and set up in competition with him,) he was above them. The magicians were baffled, the idols shaken, Pharaoh humbled, his powers broken, and, in spite of all their confederacies, God's Israel was rescued out of their hands. Note, Sooner or later, God will shew himself above those that by their proud dealings contest with him. He that exalts himself against God, shall be abased.

IV. The expressions of their joy and thankfulness; they had communion with each other, both in a feast and in a sacrifice; v. 12. Jethro, being hearty in Israel's interests, was cheerfully admitted, though a Midianite, into fellowship with Moses and the elders of Israel, forasmuch as he also is a son of Abraham, though of a younger house.

1. They joined in a sacrifice of thanksgiving; Jethro took burnt-offerings for God, and, probably, offered them himself, for he was a priest in Midian, and a worshipper of the true God, and the priesthood was not yet settled in Israel. Note, Mutual friendship is sanctified by joint-worship. It is a very good thing for relations and friends, when they come together, to join in the spiritual sacrifice of prayer and praise, as those that meet in Christ, the Centre of unity.

2. They joined in a feast of rejoicing, a feast upon the sacrifice. Moses, upon this occasion, invited his relations and friends to an entertainment in his own tent, a laudable usage among friends, and which Christ himself not only warranted, but recommended, by his acceptance of such invitations. This was a temperate feast, They did eat bread; this bread, we may suppose, was manna. Jethro must see and taste that bread from heaven, and, though a Gentile, is as welcome to it as any Israelite; the Gentiles still are so to Christ, the Bread of life. It was a feast kept after a godly sort; they did eat bread before God, soberly, thankfully, in the fear of God; and their table-talk was such as became saints. Thus we must eat and drink, to the glory of God, behaving ourselves at our tables as those who believe that God's eye is upon us.

13. And it came to pass on the morrow, that Moses sat to judge the people: and the people stood by Moses from the morning unto the evening. 14. And when Moses' father-in-law saw all that he did to the people, he said, What is this thing that thou doest to the people? Why sittest thou thyself alone, and all the people stand by thee from morning unto even? 15. And Moses said unto his father-in-law, Because the people come unto me to inquire of God: 16. When they have a matter, they come unto me; and I judge between one and another, and I do make them know the statutes of God, and his laws. 17. And Moses' father-in-law said unto him, The thing that thou doest is not good. 18. Thou wilt surely wear away, both thou, and this people that is with thee: for this thing is too heavy for thee; thou art not able to perform it thyself alone. 19. Hearken now unto my voice, I will give thee counsel, and God shall be with thee: Be thou for the people to God-ward, that thou mayest bring the causes unto God: 20. And thou shalt teach them ordinances and laws, and shalt shew them the way wherein they must walk, and the work that they must do. 21. Moreover thou shalt provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness; and place such over them, to be rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens: 22. And let them judge the people at all seasons: and it shall be, that every great matter they shall bring unto thee, but every small matter they shall judge: so shall it be easier for thyself, and they shall bear the burthen with thee. 23. If thou shalt do this thing, and God command thee so, then thou shalt be able to endure, and all this people shall also go to their place in peace. 24. So Moses hearkened to the voice of his father-in-law, and did all that he had said. 25. And Moses chose able men out of all Israel, and made them heads over the people, rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens. 26. And they judged the people at all seasons: the hard causes they brought unto Moses, but every small matter they judged themselves. 27. And Moses let his father-in-law depart; and he went his way into his own land.

Here is,

I. The great zeal and industry of Moses as a magistrate. Having been employed to redeem Israel out of the house of bondage, herein he is a further type of Christ, that he is employed as a lawgiver and a judge among them.

1. He was to answer inquiries, and acquaint them with the will of God in doubtful cases, and to explain the laws of God that were already given them, concerning the sabbath, the manna, &c. beside the laws of nature, relating both to piety and equity, v. 15. They came to inquire of God; and happy it was for them that they had such an oracle to consult; we are ready to wish, many a time, that we had some such certain way of knowing God's mind, when we are at a loss what to do. Moses was faithful both to him that appointed him, and to them that consulted him, and made them know the statutes of God, and his laws, v. 16. His business was, not to make laws, but to make known God's laws; his place was but that of a servant.

2. He was to decide controversies, and determine matters in variance, judging between a man and his fellow, v. 16. And if the people were as quarrelsome one with another, as they were with God, no doubt he had a great many causes brought before him, and the more, because their trials put them to no expence, nor was the law costly to them. When a quarrel happened in Egypt, and Moses would have reconciled the contenders, they asked, Who made thee a prince and a judge? But now it was past dispute that God had made him one; and they humbly attend him whom they had then proudly rejected.

This was the business Moses was called to, and it appears that he did it, (1.) With great consideration, which, some think, is intimated in his posture; he sat to judge, (v. 13.) composed and sedate. (2.) With great condescension to the people, who stood by him, v. 14. He was very easy of access, the meanest Israelite was welcome himself to bring his cause before him. (3.) With great constancy and closeness of application. [1.] Though Jethro, his father-in-law, was with him, which might give him a good pretence for a vacation, (he might have adjourned the court for that day, or, at least, have shortened it,) yet he sits, even the next day after his coming, from the morning unto the evening. Note, Necessary business must always take place of ceremonious attentions. It is too great a compliment to our friends, to prefer the enjoyment of their company before our duty to God, which ought to be done, while yet the other is not left undone.

[2.] Though Moses was advanced to great honour, yet he did not therefore take his ease, and throw upon others the burthen of rare and business; no, he thought his preferment, instead of discharging him from service, made it more obligatory upon him. Those think of themselves above what is meet, who think it below them to do good. It is the honour even of angels themselves to be serviceable. [3.] Though the people had been provoking to him, and were ready to stone him, (ch. 17. 4.) yet still he made himself the servant of all. Note, Though others fail in their duty to us, yet we must not therefore neglect our's to them. [4.] Though he was an old man, yet he kept to his business from morning to night, and made it his meat and drink to do it. God had given him great strength both of body and mind, which enabled him to go through a great deal of work with ease and pleasure; and, for the encouragement of others to spend and be spent in the service of God, it proved, that, after all his labours, his natural force was not abated. They that wait on the Lord and his service shall renew their strength.

II. The great prudence and consideration of Jethro, as a friend. 1. He disliked the method that Moses took, and was so free with him as to tell him so, v. 14, 17, 18. He thought it was too much business for Moses to undertake alone, that it would be a prejudice to his health, and too great a fatigue to him; and also that it would make the administration of justice tiresome to the people. And therefore he tells him plainly, It is not good. Note, There may be over-doing even in well-doing, and therefore our zeal must always be governed by discretion, that our good may not be evil spoken of. Wisdom is profitable to direct, that we may neither content ourselves with less than our duty, nor over-task ourselves with that which is beyond our strength. 2. He advised him to such a model of government as would better answer the intention, which was, (1.) That he should reserve to himself all applications to God; (v. 19.) Be thou for them to God-ward; that was an honour which it was not fit any other should share with him in, Numb. 12. 6. .8. Also, whatever concerned the whole congregation in general must pass through his hand, v. 20. But, (2.) That he should appoint judges in the several tribes and families, who should try causes between man and man, and determine them, which would be done with less noise, and more despatch, than in the general assembly wherein Moses himself presided. Thus they must be governed as a nation by a king as supreme, and inferior magistrates sent and commissioned by him, 1 Pet. 11. 13, 14. Thus many hands would make light work, causes would be sooner heard, and the people eased by having justice thus brought to their tent-doors. Yet, (3.) An appeal might be, if there were just cause for it, from these inferior courts to Moses himself; at least, if the judges were themselves at a loss; (v. 22.) Every great matter they shall bring unto thee. Thus that great man would be the more serviceable by being employed only in great matters. Note, Those whose gifts and stations are most eminent, may yet be greatly furthered in their work, by the assistance of those that are every way their inferiors, which therefore they should not despise. The head has need of the hands and feet, 1 Cor. 12. 21. Great men should not only study to be useful themselves, but contrive how to make others useful, according as their capacity is.

This is Jethro's advice, by which it appears, that, though Moses excelled him in prophecy, he excelled Moses in politics. Yet he adds two qualifications to his counsel.

[1.] That great care should be taken in the choice of the persons who should be admitted into this trust; (v. 21.) they must be able men, &c. It was requisite that they should be men of the best character, First, For judgment and resolution; able men, men of good sense, that understood business, and bold men, that would not be daunted by frowns or clamours. Clear heads and stout hearts make good judges. Secondly, For piety and religion; such as fear God, as believe there is a God above them, whose eye is upon them, to whom they are accountable, and whose judgment they stand in awe of; conscientious men, that dare not do a base thing, though they could do it ever so secretly and securely. The fear of God is that principle which will best fortify a man against all temptations to injustice, Neh. 5. 15. Gen. 42. 18. Thirdly, For integrity and honesty; men of truth, whose word one may take, and whose fidelity one may rely upon; who would not for a world tell a lie, betray a trust, or act an insidious part. Fourthly, For a noble and generous contempt of worldly wealth; having covetousness, not only not seeking bribes, or aiming to enrich themselves, but abhorring the thought of it; he is fit to be a magistrate, and he alone, who despise the gain of oppressions, and shaketh his hands from the holding of bribes, Isa. 33. 15.

[2.] That he should attend God's direction in the case; (v. 23.) If thou shalt do this thing, and God command thee so. Jethro knew that Moses had a better counsellor than he was, and to his counsel he refers him. Note, Advice must be given with a humble submission to the word and providence of God, which must always over-rule.

Now Moses did not despise this advice, because it came from one not acquainted, as he was, with the words of God, and the visions of the Almighty; but he hearkened to the voice of his father-in-law, v. 24. When he came to consider the thing, he saw the reasonableness of what his father-in-law offered, and resolved to put it in practice, which he did soon afterward, when he had received directions from God in that matter. Note, Those are not so wise as they would be thought to be, who think themselves too wise to be counselled; for a wise man (one who is truly so) will hear, and will increase learning, and not slight good counsel, though given by an inferior. Moses did not leave the election of the magistrates to the people, who had already done enough to prove themselves unfit for such a trust; but he chose them, and appointed them, some for greater, others for lesser divisions, the lesser, probably, subordinate to the greater. We have reason to value government as a very great mercy, and to thank God for laws and magistrates, so that we are not like the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the lesser.

III. Jethro's return to his own land, v. 27. No doubt he took home with him the improvements he had made in the knowledge of God, and communicated them to his neighbours for their instruction. It is supposed that the Kenites (mentioned, 1 Sam. 15. 8.) were the posterity of Jethro, (compare Judg. 1. 16.) and they are there taken under special protection, for the kindness their ancestor here shewed Israel. The good-will shewed to God's people, even in the smallest instances, shall in no wise lose its reward, but shall be recompensed, at furthest, in the resurrection.

CHAP. XIX.

This chapter introduces the solemnity of the giving of the law upon mount Sinai, which was one of the most striking appearances of the Divine Glory that ever was in this lower world. We have here, I. The circumstances of time and place, v. 1, 2. II. The covenant between God and Israel settled in general. The gracious proposal God made to them; (v. 3. .6.) and their consent to the proposal, v. 7, 8. III. Notice given, three days before, of God's design to give the law out of a thick cloud, v. 9. Orders given to prepare the people to receive the law; (v. 10. .13.) and care taken to execute those orders, v. 14, 15. IV. A terrible appearance of God's glory upon mount Sinai, v. 16. .20. V. Silence proclaimed, and strict charges given to the people to observe decorum, while God spake to them, v. 21. .25.

1. IN the third month, when the children of Israel were gone forth out of the land of Egypt, the same day came they into the wilderness of Sinai. 2. For they were departed from Rephidim, and were come to the desert of Sinai, and had pitched in the wilderness; and there Israel camped before the mount. 3. And Moses went up unto God, and the Lord called unto him out of the mountain, saying, Thus shalt thou say to the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel;

4. Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself. 5. Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine: 6. And ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. These are the words which thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel. 7. And Moses came and called for the elders of the people, and laid before their faces all these words which the LORD commanded him. 8. And all the people answered together, and said, All that the LORD hath spoken we will do. And Moses returned the words of the people unto the LORD.

Here is,

I. The date of that great charter by which Israel was incorporated. 1. The time when it bears date; (v.1.) in the third month after they came out of Egypt. It is computed that the law was given just fifty days after their coming out of Egypt, in remembrance of which, the feast of Pentecost was observed the fiftieth day after the passover; and, in compliance with which, the Spirit was poured out upon the apostles, at the feast of Pentecost, fifty days after the death of Christ. In Egypt, they had spoken of a three days' journey into the wilderness to the place of their sacrifice, (ch. 5. 3.) but it proved to be almost a two months' journey; so often are we out in calculation of times; and things prove longer in the doing than we expected. 2. The place whence it bears date; from mount Sinai, a place which nature, not art, had made eminent and conspicuous, for it was the highest in all that range of mountains. Thus God put contempt upon cities, and palaces, and magnificent structures, setting up his pavilion on the top of a high mountain, in a waste and barren desert, there to carry on this treaty. It is called Sinai, from the multitude of thorny bushes that overspread it.

II. The charter itself; Moses was called up to the mountain, (on the top of which God had pitched his tent, and at the foot of which Israel had pitched their's,) and was employed as the mediator, or rather no more than the messenger, of the covenant; (v.3.) Thus shalt thou say to the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel. Here the learned Bishop Patrick observes, that the people are called by the names both of Jacob and Israel, to remind them, that they who had lately been as low as Jacob, when he went to Padan-aram, were now grown as great as God made him, when he came from thence, (justly enriched with the spoils of him that had oppressed him,) and was called Israel.

Now observe, 1. That the Maker, and first Mover, of the covenant, is God himself. Nothing was said or done by this stupid unthinking people themselves toward this settlement; no motion made, no petition put up for God's favour, but this blessed charter was granted ex mero motu—purely out of God's own goodwill. Note, In all our dealings with God, free grace prevents us with the blessings of goodness, and all our comfort is owing, not to our knowing God, but rather to our being known of him, Gal. 4. 9. We love him, visit him, and covenant with him, because he first loved us, visited us, and covenanted with us. God is the Alpha, and therefore must be the Omega. 2. That the matter of the covenant is not only just and unexceptionable, and such as puts no hardship upon them, but kind and gracious, and such as gives them the greatest privileges and advantages imaginable.

(1.) He reminds them of what he had done for them, v. 4. He had righted them, and avenged them upon their persecutors and oppressors; "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, how many lives were sacrificed to Israel's honour and interests: we had given them unparalleled instances of his favour to them, and his care of them; I bare you on eagles' wings, a high expression of the wonderful tenderness God had shewed for them; it is explained, Deut. 32. 11, 12. It denotes great speed; God not only came upon the wing for their deliverance, (when the set time was come, he rode on a cherub, and did fly,) but he hastened them out, as it were, upon the wing; he did it also with great ease, with the strength, as well as with the swiftness, of an eagle. They that faint not, nor are weary, are said to mount up with wings as eagles, Isa. 40. 31. Especially, it denotes God's particular care of them, and affection to them. Even Egypt, that iron furnace, was the nest in which these young ones were hatched, where they were first formed as the embryo of a nation; when, by the increase of their numbers, they grew to some maturity, they were carried out of that nest. Other birds carry their young in their talons, but the eagle (they say) upon her wings, so that even those archers who shoot flying cannot hurt the young ones, unless they first shoot through the old one. Thus, in the Red sea, the pillar of cloud and fire, the token of God's presence, interposed itself between the Israelites and their pursuers; (lines of defence which could not be forced, a wall which could not be penetrated;) yet this was not all; their way, so paved, so guarded, was glorious, but their end much more so; I brought you unto myself. They were brought not only into a state of liberty and honour, but into covenant and communion with God. This, this was the glory of their deliverance, as it is of our's by Christ, that he died, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God. This God aims at in all the gracious methods of his providence and grace, to bring us back to himself, from whom we have revolted, and to bring us home to himself, in whom alone we can be happy. He appeals to themselves, and their own observation and experience, for the truth of what is here insisted on. Ye have seen what I did; so that they could not disbelieve God, unless they would first disbelieve their own eyes. They saw how all that was done was purely the Lord's doing. It was not they that reached toward God, but it was he that brought them to himself. Some have well observed, that the Old-Testament church is said to be borne upon eagles' wings, denoting the power of that dispensation which was carried on with a high hand and an outstretched arm; but the New-Testament church is said to be gathered by the Lord Jesus, as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings, (Matth. 23. 37.) denoting the grace and compassion of that dispensation, and the admirable condescension and humiliation of the Redeemer.

(2.) He tells them plainly what he expected and required from them; in one word, obedience, (v. 5.) that they should obey his voice indeed, and keep his covenant. Being thus saved by him, that which he insisted upon, was, that they should be ruled by him. The reasonableness of this demand is, long after, pleaded with them, that in the day he brought them out of the land of Egypt, this was the condition of the covenant, Obey my voice; (Jer. 7. 23.) and this he is said to protest earnestly to them, Jer. 11. 4, 7. Only obey indeed, not in profession and promise only, not in pretence, but in sincerity. God had shewed them real favours, and therefore required real obedience.

(3.) He assures them of the honour he would put upon them, and the kindness he would shew them, in case they did thus keep his covenant; (v. 5, 6.) Then ye shall be a peculiar treasure to me. He does not specify any one particular favour, as giving them the land of Canaan, or the like, but expresses it in that which was inclusive of all happiness, that he would be to them a God in covenant, that they should be to him a people. [1.] God here asserts his sovereignty over, and propriety in, the whole visible creation; All the earth is mine. Therefore he needed them not; He, that had so vast a dominion, was great enough, and happy enough, without concerning himself for so small a demesne as Israel was. All nations on the earth being his, he might choose which he pleased for his peculiar, and act in a way of sovereignty. [2.] He appropriates Israel to himself. First, As a people dear unto him, You shall be a peculiar treasure; not that God was enriched by them, as a man is by his treasure, but he was pleased to value and esteem them as a man does his treasure, they were precious in his sight and honourable; (Isa. 43.4.) he set his love upon them; (Deut. 7.7.) took them under his special care and protection, as a treasure that is kept under lock and key. He looked upon the rest of the world but as trash and lumber in comparison with them. By giving them divine revelation, instituted ordinances, and promises inclusive of eternal life, by sending his prophets among them, and pouring out his Spirit upon them, he distinguished them from, and dignified them above, all people. And this honour have all the saints, they are unto God a peculiar people, (Tit. 2.14.) his when he makes up his jewels. Secondly, As a people devoted to him, and to his honour and service, (v.6.) a kingdom of priests, a holy nation. All the Israelites, if compared with other people, were priests unto God, so near were they to him, (Ps. 148.14.) so much employed in his immediate service, and such intimate communion they had with him. When they were first made a free people, it was that they might sacrifice to the Lord their God as priests; they were under God's immediate government, and the tendency of the laws given them was to distinguish them from others, and engage them for God as a holy nation. Thus all believers are, through Christ, made to our God kings and priests, (Rev. 1.6.) a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, 1 Pet. 2.9.

III. Israel's acceptance of this charter, and consent to the conditions of it. 1. Moses faithfully delivered God's message to them; (v.7.) he laid before their faces all those words; he not only explained to them what God had given him in charge, but he put it to their choice, whether they would accept these promises upon these terms, or no. His laying it to their faces, bespeaks his laying it to their consciences. 2. They readily agreed to the covenant proposed. They would oblige themselves to obey the voice of God, and take it as a great favour to be made a kingdom of priests to him. They answered together as one man, nemine contradicente—without a dissentient voice, (v.8.) All that the Lord hath spoken we will do. Thus they strike the bargain, accepting the Lord to be to them a God, and giving up themselves to be to him a people. Oh that there had been such a heart in them! 3. Moses, as a mediator, returned the words of the people to God, v.8. Thus Christ, the Mediator between us and God, as a Prophet, reveals God's will to us, his precepts and promises, and then, as a Priest, offers up to God our spiritual sacrifices, not only of prayer and praise, but of devout affections, and pious resolutions, the work of his own Spirit in us. Thus he is that blessed Days-Man who lays his hand upon us bath.

9. And the LORD said unto Moses, Lo, I come unto thee in a thick cloud, that the people may hear when I speak with thee, and believe thee for ever. And Moses told the words of the people unto the LORD. 10. And the LORD said unto Moses, Go unto the people, and sanctify them to-day and to-morrow, and let them wash their clothes, 11. And be ready against the third day: For the third day the LORD will come down in the sight of all the people upon mount Sinai. 12. And thou shalt set bounds unto the people round about, saying, Take heed to yourselves, that ye go not up into the mount, or touch the border of it: whosoever toucheth the mount shall be surely put to death. 13. There shall not an hand touch it, but he shall surely be stoned, or shot through; whether it be beast or man, it shall not live: when the trumpet soundeth long, they shall come up to the mount. 14. And Moses went down from the mount unto the people, and sanctified the people; and they washed their clothes. 15. And he said unto the people, Be ready against the third day: come not at your wives.

Here.

I. God signifies to Moses his purpose of coming down upon mount Sinai, in some visible appearance of his glory in a thick cloud; (v.9.) for he said that he would dwell in the thick darkness, (2 Chron. 6.1.) and he made it his pavilion, (Ps. 18.11.) holding back the face of his throne, then when he set it upon mount Sinai, and spreading a cloud upon it, Job, 26.9. This thick cloud was to prohibit curious inquiries into things secret, and to command an awful adoration of that which was revealed. God would come down in the sight of all the people; (v.11.) though they should see no manner of similitude, yet they should see so much as would convince them that God was among them of a truth. And so high was the top of mount Sinai, that it is supposed that not only the camp of Israel, but even the countries about, might discern some extraordinary appearance of glory upon it, which would strike a terror upon them. It seems also to have been particularly intended to put an honour upon Moses, (v.9.) that they may hear when I speak with thee, and believe thee for ever. Thus the correspondence was to be first settled by a sensible appearance of the divine glory, which was afterward to be carried on more silently by the ministry of Moses. In like manner, the Holy Ghost descended visibly upon Christ at his baptism, and all that were present heard God speak to him, (Matth. 3.17.) that afterward, without the repetition of such visible tokens, they might believe him. So likewise the Spirit descended in cloven tongues upon the apostles, (Acts, 2.3.) that they might be believed. Observe, When the people had declared themselves willing to obey the voice of God, then God promised they should hear his voice; for if any man be resolved to do his will, he shall know it, John, 7.17.

II. He ordered Moses to make preparation for this great solemnity, giving him two days' time for it.

1. He must sanctify the people, (v.10.) as Job, before this, sent and sanctified his sons, Job, 1.5. He must raise their expectation by giving them notice what God would do, and assist their preparation by directing them what they must do. "Sanctify them;" that is, "Call them off from their worldly business, and call them to religious exercises, meditation, and prayer, that they may receive the law from God's mouth with reverence and devotion. Let them be ready," v.11. Note, When we are to attend upon God in solemn ordinances, it concerns us to sanctify ourselves, and to get ready beforehand. Wandering thoughts must be gathered in, impure affections abandoned, disquieting passions suppressed, nay, and all cares about secular business for the present dismissed, and laid by, that our hearts may be engaged to approach unto God. Two things particularly were prescribed as signs and instances of their preparation. (1.) In token of their cleansing of themselves from all sinful pollutions, that they might be holy to God, they must wash their clothes, (v.10.) and they did so; (v.14.) not that God regards our clothes; but, while they were washing their clothes, he would have them think of washing their souls by repentance from the sins they had contracted in Egypt, and since their deliverance. It becomes us to appear in clean clothes when we wait upon great men; so clean hearts are required in our attendance on the great God, who sees them as plainly as men see our clothes. This is absolutely necessary to our acceptable worshipping of God. See Ps. 26.6. Isa. 1.16. 18. Heb. 10.22. (2.) In token of their devoting themselves entirely to religious exercises, upon this occasion, they must abstain even from lawful enjoyments during these three days, and not come at their wives, v.15. See 1 Cor. 7.5.

2. He must set bounds about the mountain, v.12,13. Probably, he drew a line, or ditch, round at the foot of the hill, which none were to pass, upon pain of death. This was to intimate, (1.) That humble awful reverence which ought to possess the minds of all those that worship God. We are mean creatures before a great Creator, vile sinners before a holy righteous Judge; and therefore a godly fear and shame well become us, Heb. 12.28. Ps. 2.11.

(3.) The distance which worshippers were kept at, under that dispensation, which we ought to take notice of, that we may the more value our privilege under the gospel, having boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, Heb. 10. 19.

3. He must order the people to attend upon the summons that should be given; (v. 13.) "When the trumpet soundeth long, then let them take their places at the foot of the mount, and so sit down at God's feet," as it is explained, Deut. 33. 3. Never was so great a congregation called together, and preached to, at once, as this was here. No one man's voice could have reached so many, but the voice of God did.

16. And it came to pass on the third day in the morning, that there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud; so that all the people that was in the camp trembled. 17. And Moses brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God; and they stood at the nether part of the mount. 18. And mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the LORD descended upon it in fire: and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly. 19. And when the voice of the trumpet sounded long, and waxed louder and louder, Moses spake, and God answered him by a voice. 20. And the LORD came down upon mount Sinai, on the top of the mount: and the LORD called Moses up to the top of the mount; and Moses went up. 21. And the LORD said unto Moses, Go down, charge the people, lest they break through unto the LORD to gaze, and many of them perish. 22. And let the priests also, which come near to the LORD, sanctify themselves, lest the LORD break forth upon them. 23. And Moses said unto the LORD, The people cannot come up to mount Sinai: for thou chargedst us, saying, Set bounds about the mount, and sanctify it. 24. And the LORD said unto him, Away, get thee down, and thou shalt come up, thou, and Aaron with thee: but let not the priests and the people break through to come up unto the LORD, lest he break forth upon them. 25. So Moses went down unto the people, and spake unto them.

Now, at length, is come that memorable day, that terrible day of the Lord, that day of judgment, in which Israel heard the voice of the Lord God speaking to them out of the midst of the fire, and lived, Deut. 4. 33. Never was there such a sermon preached, before or since, as this which was here preached to the church in the wilderness. For,

I. The Preacher was God himself; (v. 18.) The Lord descended in fire, and, (v. 20.) The Lord came down upon mount Sinai. The Shechinah, or Glory of the Lord, appeared in the sight of all the people; he shined forth from mount Paron, with ten thousands of his saints, (Deut. 33. 2.) that is, attended, as the Divine Majesty always is, with a multitude of the holy angels, who were both to grace the solemnity, and to assist it. Hence the law is said to be given by the disposition of angels, Acts, 7. 53.

II. The pulpit (or throne rather) was mount Sinai, hung with a thick cloud, (v. 16.) covered with smoke, (v. 18.) and made to quake greatly. Now it was that the earth trembled at the presence of the Lord, and the mountains skipped like rams; (Ps. 114. 4, 7.) that Sinai itself, the rough and rocky, melted from before the Lord God of Israel, Judg. 5. 5. Now it was that the mountains saw him, and trembled, (Hab. 3. 10.) and were witnesses against a hard-hearted unmoved people, whom nothing would influence.

III. The congregation was called together by the sound of a trumpet, exceeding loud, (v. 16.) and waxing louder and louder, v. 19. This was done by the ministry of the angels, and we read of trumpets sounded by angels, Rev. 8. 6. It was the sound of the trumpet that made all the people tremble, as those who knew their own guilt, and that they had reason to expect that the sound of this trumpet should have been to them the alarm of war.

IV. Moses brought the hearers to the place of meeting, v. 17. He that had led them out of the bondage of Egypt, now led them to receive the law from God's mouth. Public persons are then public blessings, when they lay out themselves in their places to promote the public worship of God. Moses, at the head of an assembly worshipping God, was as truly great, as Moses at the head of an army in the field.

V. The introductions to the service were thunders and lightnings, v. 16. These were designed to strike an awe upon the people, and to raise and engage their attention. Were they asleep? The thunders would waken them. Were they looking another way? The lightnings would engage them to turn their faces toward him that spake to them. Thunder and lightning have natural causes, but the scripture directs us in a particular manner to take notice of the power of God, and his terror, in them. Thunder is the voice of God, and lightning the fire of God, proper to engage the senses of sight and hearing, those senses by which we receive so much of our information.

VI. Moses is God's minister, who is spoken to, to command silence, and keep the congregation in order; (v. 19.) Moses spake. Some think that it was now that he said, I exceedingly fear and quake; (Heb. 12. 21.) but God stilled his fear by his distinguishing favour to him, in calling him up to the top of the mount, (v. 20.) by which also he tried his faith and courage. No sooner was Moses got up a little way toward the top of the mount, than he was sent down again to keep the people from breaking through to gaze, v. 21. Even the priests or princes, the heads of the houses of their fathers, who officiated for their respective families, and therefore are said to come near to the Lord at other times, must now keep their distance, and conduct themselves with a great deal of caution. Moses pleads that they needed not to have any further orders given them, effectual care was taken already to prevent any intrusions, v. 23. But God, who knew their wilfulness and presumption, and what was now in the hearts of some of them, hastens him down with this in charge, that neither the priests nor the people should offer to force the lines which were set, to come up unto the Lord, but Moses and Aaron only, the men whom God delighted to honour. Observe, 1. What it was that God forbade them—breaking through to gaze; enough was provided to awaken their consciences, but they were not allowed to gratify their vain curiosity. They might see, but not gaze. Some of them, probably, were desirous to see some similitude, that they might know how to make an image of God, which he took care to prevent, for they saw no manner of similitude, Deut. 4. 15. Note, In divine things, we must not covet to know more than God would have us know; and he has allowed us as much as is good for us. A desire of forbidden knowledge was the ruin of our first parents. Those that would be wise above what is written, and intrude into those things which they have not seen, need this admonition, that they break not through to gaze. 2. Under what penalty it was forbidden, Lest the Lord break forth upon them, (v. 22. 24.) and many of them perish. Note, (1.) The restraints and warnings of the divine law are all intended for our good, and to keep us out of that danger which otherwise we should, by our own folly, run ourselves into. (2.) It is at our peril, if we break the bounds that God has set us, and intrude upon that which he has not allowed us; the Bethshemites and Uzzah paid dear for their presumption. And even when we are called to approach God, we must remember that he is in heaven, and we upon earth, and therefore it behoves us to exercise reverence and godly fear.

CHAP. XX.

All things being prepared for the solemn promulgation of the divine law, we have, in this chapter, I. The ten commandments, as God himself spake them upon mount Sinai; (v. 1. .17.) as remarkable a portion of scripture as any in the Old Testament. II. The impressions made upon the people thereby, v. 18. .21. III. Some particular instructions, which God gave privately to Moses, to be by him communicated to the people, relating to his worship, v. 22. .26.

1. AND God spake all these words, saying, 2. I am the LORD thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage. 3. Thou shalt have no other gods before me. 4. Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth. 5. Thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the LORD thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; 6. And shewing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments. 7. Thou shalt not take the name of the LORD thy God in vain; for the LORD will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain. 8. Remember the sabbath-day, to keep it holy. 9. Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work: 10. But the seventh day is the sabbath of the LORD thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy cattle, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates: 11. For in six days the LORD made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the LORD blessed the sabbath-day, and hallowed it.

Here is,

I. The preface of the law-writer, Moses; (v. 1.) God spake all these words. The law of the ten commandments is, 1. A law of God's making. They are enjoined by the infinite eternal Majesty of heaven and earth. And where the word of the King of kings is, surely there is power. 2. It is a law of his own speaking. God has many ways of speaking to the children of men; (Job, 33. 14.) once, yea twice, by his Spirit, by conscience, by providences, by his voice; all which we ought carefully to attend to; but he never spake, at any time, upon any occasion, so as he spake the ten commandments, which therefore we ought to hear with the more earnest heed. It was not only spoken audibly, (so he owned the Redeemer by a voice from heaven, Matth. 3. 17.) but with a great deal of dreadful pomp. This law God had given to man before; (it was written in his heart by nature;) but sin had so defaced that writing, that it was necessary, in this manner, to revive the knowledge of it.

II. The preface of the Law-Maker; (v. 2.) I am the Lord thy God. Herein, 1. God asserts his own authority to enact this law in general; "I am the Lord, who command thee all that follows."

2. He proposes himself as the sole Object of that religious worship which is enjoined in the four first of the commandments. They are here bound to obedience by a threefold cord, which, one would think, could not easily be broken. (1.) Because God is the Lord—Jehovah, self-existent, independent, eternal, and the Fountain of all being and power; therefore he has an incontestable right to command us. He that gives being, may give law; and therefore he is able to bear us out in our obedience, to reward it, and to punish our disobedience. (2.) He was their God, a God in covenant with them, their God by their own consent; and if they would not keep his commandments, who would? He had laid himself under obligations to them by promise, and therefore might justly lay his obligations on them by precept. Though that covenant of peculiarity is now no more, yet there is another, by virtue of which all that are baptized are taken into relation to him as their God, and are therefore unjust, unfaithful, and very unkind, if they obey him not. (3.) He had brought them out of the land of Egypt; therefore they were bound in gratitude to obey him, because he had done them so great a kindness, had brought them out of a grievous slavery into a glorious liberty; they themselves had been eye-witnesses of the great things God had done, in order to their deliverance, and could not but have observed that every circumstance of it heightened their obligation; they were now enjoying the blessed fruits of their deliverance, and in expectation of a speedy settlement in Canaan; and could they think any thing too much to do for Him that had done so much for them? Nay, by redeeming them, he acquired a further right to rule them; they owed their service to him to whom they owed their freedom, and whose they were by purchase. And thus, Christ, having rescued us out of the bondage of sin, is entitled to the best service we can do him, Luke, 1. 74. Having loosed our bonds, he has bound us to obey him, Ps. 116. 16.

III. The law itself. The four first of the ten commandments, which concern our duty to God, (commonly called the first table) we have in these verses. It was fit that those should be put first, because man had a Maker to love, before he had a neighbour to love; and justice and charity are then only acceptable acts of obedience to God, when they flow from the principles of piety. It cannot be expected that he should be true to his brother, who is false to his God.

Now our duty to God is, in one word, to worship him, that is, to give to him the glory due to his name, the inward worship of our affections, the outward worship of solemn address and attendance. This is spoken of as the sum and substance of the everlasting gospel, (Rev. 14. 7.) Worship God.

1. The first commandment concerns the Object of our worship, Jehovah, and him only; (v. 3.) Thou shalt have no other gods before me. The Egyptians, and other neighbouring nations, had many gods, the creatures of their own fancy, strange gods, new gods; this law was prefixed, because of that transgression, and Jehovah being the God of Israel, they must entirely cleave to him, and not be for any other, either of their own invention, or borrowed from their neighbours. This was the sin they were most in danger of, now that the world was so overspread with Polytheism, which yet could not be rooted out effectually, but by the gospel of Christ. The sin against this commandment, which we are most in danger of, is, giving the glory and honour to any creature, which are due to God only. Pride makes a god of self, covetousness makes a god of money, sensuality makes a god of the belly; whatever is esteemed and loved, feared or served, delighted in, or depended on, more than God, that (whatever it is) we do in effect make a god of. This prohibition includes a precept which is the foundation of the whole law, that we take the Lord for our God, acknowledge that he is God, accept him for our's, adore him with admiration and humble reverence, and set our affections entirely upon him. There is a reason intimated in the last words, before me; it intimates, (1.) That we cannot have any other god, but he will certainly know it. There is none beside him, but what is before him. Idolaters covet secrecy; but shall not God search this out? (2.) That it is very provoking to him; it is a sin that dare him to his face, which he cannot, which he will not, overlook, or waive at. See Ps. 44. 20, 21.

2. The second commandment concerns the ordinances of worship, or the way in which God will be worshipped, which it is fit that he himself should have the appointing of. Here is,

(1.) The prohibition; we are here forbidden to worship even the true God by images, v. 4, 5. [1.] The Jews (at least after the captivity) thought themselves forbidden by this commandment to make any image or picture whatsoever. Hence the very images which the Roman armies had in their ensigns are called an abomination to them, (Matth. 24. 15.) especially when they were set up in the holy place. It is certain that it forbids making any image of God, (for to whom can we liken him? Isa. 40. 18, 25.) or the image of any creature, for a religious use; it is called the changing of the truth of God into a lie, (Rom. 1. 25.) for an image is a teacher of lies; it insinuates to us that God has a body, whereas he is an infinite Spirit, Hab. 2. 18. It also forbids us to make images of God in our fancies, as if he were a man as we are. Our religious worship must be governed by the power of faith, not by the power of imagination. They must not make such images or pictures as the heathen worshipped, lest they also should be tempted to worship them. Those who would be kept from sin, must keep themselves from the occasions of it. [2.] They must not bow down to them occasionally, that is, shew any sign of respect or honour to them, much less serve them constantly, by sacrifice or incense, or any other act of religious worship. When they paid their devotion to the true God, they must not have any image before them, for the directing, exciting, or assisting, of their devotion. Though the worship was designed to terminate in God, it would not please him if it came to him through an image. The best and most ancient lawgivers among the heathen forbade the setting up of images in their temples: it was forbidden in Rome by Numa, a pagan prince; yet commanded in Rome by the Pope, a Christian bishop, but, in this, antichristian. The use of images in the church of Rome, at this day, is so plainly contrary to the letter of this command, and so impossible to be reconciled to it, that, in all their catechisms and books of devotion which they put into the hands of the people, they leave out this commandment, joining the reason of it to the first; and so the third commandment they call the second, the fourth the third, &c.; only, to make up the number ten, they divide the tenth into two. Thus have they committed two great evils, in which they persist, and from which they hate to be reformed: they take away from God's word, and add to his worship.

(2.) The reasons to enforce this prohibition, (v. 5, 6.) which are, [1.] God's jealousy in the matters of his worship, "I the Lord Jehovah, and thy God, am a jealous God, especially in things of this nature." It intimates the care he has of his own institutions, his hatred of idolatry and all false worship, his displeasure against idolaters, and that he resents every thing in his worship that looks like, or leads to, idolatry. Jealousy is quick-sighted. Idolatry being spiritual adultery, as it is very often represented in scripture, the displeasure of God against it is fitly called jealousy. If God is jealous herein, we should be so, afraid of offering any worship to God otherwise than as he has appointed in his word. [2.] The punishment of idolaters. God looks upon them as haters of him, though they perhaps pretend love to him; he will visit their iniquity, that is, he will very severely punish it, not only as a breach of his law, but as an affront to his majesty, a violation of the covenant, and a blow at the root of all religion. He will visit it upon the children, that is, this being a sin for which churches shall be unchurched, and a bill of divorce given them, together with the parents, the children also shall be cast out of covenant and communion, as with the parents the children were at first taken in. Or, he will bring such judgments upon a people as shall be the total ruin of families. If idolaters live to be old, so as to see their children of the third or fourth generation, it shall be the vexation of their eyes, and the breaking of their hearts, to see them fall by the sword, carried captives, and enslaved. Nor is it an unrighteous thing with God, (if the parents died in their iniquity, and the children tread in their steps, and keep up false worships, because they received them by tradition from their fathers,) when the measure is full, and God comes by his judgments to reckon with them, to bring into the account the idolatries their fathers were guilty of. Though he bear long with an idolatrous people, he will not bear always, but by the fourth generation, at furthest, he will begin to visit. Children are dear to their parents; therefore, to deter men from idolatry, and to shew how much God is displeased with it, not only a brand of infamy is by it entailed upon families, but the judgments of God may for it be executed upon the poor children, when the parents are dead and gone. [3.] The favour God would shew to his faithful worshippers, Keeping mercy for thousands of persons, thousands of generations of them that love me, and keep my commandments. This intimates that the second commandment, though, in the letter of it, it is only a prohibition of false worships, yet includes a precept of worshipping God in all those ordinances which he has instituted. As the first commandment requires the inward worship of love, desire, joy, hope, and admiration, so the second requires the outward worship of prayer and praise, and solemn attendance on God's word. Note, First, Those that truly love God will make it their constant care and endeavour to keep his commandments, particularly those that relate to his worship. Those that love God, and keep those commandments, shall receive grace to keep his other commandments. Gospel-worship will have a good influence upon all manner of gospel-obedience. Secondly, God has mercy in store for such; even they need mercy, and cannot plead merit; and mercy they shall find with God; merciful protection in their obedience, and a merciful recompence of it. Thirdly, This mercy shall extend to thousands, much further than the wrath threatened to those that hate him, for that reaches but to the third or fourth generation. The streams of mercy run now as full, as free, and as fresh, as ever.

3. The third commandment concerns the manner of our worship, that it be done with all possible reverence and seriousness, v. 7.

We have here, (1.) A strict prohibition; Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain. It is supposed, that, having taken Jehovah for their God, they would make mention of his name; (for thus all people will walk every one in the name of his God;) this command gives a needful caution not to mention it in vain, and it is still as needful as ever. We take God's name in vain, [1.] By hypocrisy, making a profession of God's name, and a value for it, but not living up to that profession. They that name the name of Christ, but do not depart from iniquity, as that name binds them to do, name it in vain, their worship is vain, (Matth. 15. 7. . 9.) their oblations vain, (Isa. 1. 11, 13.) their religion vain, Jam. 1. 26. [2.] By covenant-breaking; if we make promises to God, binding our souls with those bonds to that which is good, and yet perform not to the Lord our vows, we take his name in vain, (Matth. 5. 33.) it is folly, and God has no pleasure in fools, (Ecl. 5. 4.) nor will he be mocked, Gal. 6. 7. [3.] By rash swearing, mentioning the name of God, or any of his attributes, in the form of an oath, without any just occasion for it, or due application of mind to it, but as a by-word, to no purpose at all, or to no good purpose. [4.] By false swearing, which, some think, is chiefly intended in the letter of the commandment; so it was expounded by them of old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, Matth. 5. 33. One part of the religious regard the Jews were taught to pay to their God, was, to swear by his name, Deut. 10. 20. But they affronted him, instead of doing him honour, if they called him to be Witness to a lie. [5.] By using the name of God lightly and carelessly, and without any regard to its awful significancy. The profanation of the forms of devotion is forbidden, as well as the profanation of the forms of swearing; as also the profanation of any of those things whereby God makes himself known, his word, or any of his institutions; when they are either turned into charms and spells, or into jest and sport, the name of God is taken in vain.

(2.) A severe penalty; The Lord will not hold him guiltless; magistrates, who punish other offences, may not think themselves concerned to take notice of this, because it does not immediately offer injury either to private property or the public peace; but God, who is jealous of his honour, will not thus connive at it. The sinner may perhaps hold himself guiltless, and think there is no harm in it, and that God will never call him to an account for it; to obviate which suggestion, the threatening is thus expressed, God will not hold him guiltless, as he hopes he will; but more is implied, namely, that God will himself be the Avenger of those that take his name in vain, and they will find it a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

4. The fourth commandment concerns the time of worship; God is to be served and honoured daily, but one day in seven is to be particularly dedicated to his honour, and spent in his service.

Here is,

(1.) The command itself; (v. 8.) Remember the sabbath-day, to keep it holy; and v. 10. In it thou shalt do no manner of work. It is taken for granted that the sabbath was instituted before; we read of God's blessing and sanctifying a seventh day from the beginning, (Gen. 2. 3.) so that this was not the enacting of a new law, but the reviving of an old law. [1.] They are told what is the day they must religiously observe, a seventh, after six days' labour; whether this was the seventh by computation from the first seventh, or from the day of their coming out of Egypt, or both, is not certain: now the precise day was notified to them, (ch. 16. 23.) and from this they were to observe the seventh. [2.] How it must be observed. First, As a day of rest; they were to do no manner of work on this day, in their callings or worldly business. Secondly, As a holy day, set apart to the honour of the holy God, and to be spent in holy exercises. God, by blessing it, had made it holy; they, by solemnly blessing him, must keep it holy, and not alienate it to any other purpose than that for which the difference between it and other days was instituted. [3.] Who must observe it; Thou, and thy son, and thy daughter; the wife is not mentioned, because she is supposed to be one with the husband, and present with him; and if he sanctify the sabbath, it is taken for granted that she will join with him; but the rest of the family are specified; children and servants must keep the sabbath, according to their age and capacity: in this, as in other instances of religion, it is expected that masters of families should take care, not only to serve the Lord themselves, but that their houses also should serve him, at least, that it may not be through their neglect if they do not, Josh. 24. 15. Even the proselyted strangers must observe a difference between this day and other days, which, if it laid some restraint upon them then, yet proved a happy indication of God's gracious purpose, in process of time, to bring the Gentiles in to the church, that they might share in the benefit of sabbaths. Compare Isa. 56. 6, 7. God takes notice of what we do, particularly what we do on sabbath-days, though we should be where we are strangers. [4.] A particular memorandum put upon this duty, Remember it. It is intimated that the sabbath was instituted and observed before; but in their bondage in Egypt they had either lost their computation, or were restrained by their taskmasters, or, through a great degeneracy and indifference in religion, they had let fall the observance of it, and therefore it was requisite they should be reminded of it. Note, Neglected duties remain duties still, notwithstanding our neglect. It also intimates that we are both apt to forget it, and concerned to remember it. Some think it denotes the preparation we are to make for the sabbath; we must think of it before it comes, that, when it does come, we may keep it holy, and do the duty of it.

(2.) The reasons of this command; [1.] We have time enough for ourselves on the other six days; Six days must thou labour: time enough we have to serve ourselves in those six days, on the seventh day let us serve God; and time enough to tire ourselves, on the seventh it will be a kindness to us to be obliged to rest. [2.] This is God's day, it is the sabbath of the Lord thy God, not only instituted by him, but consecrated to him; it is sacrilege to alienate it, the sanctification of it is a debt. [3.] It is designed for a memorial of the creation of the world, and therefore to be observed to the glory of the Creator, as an engagement upon ourselves to serve him, and an encouragement to us to trust in him, who made heaven and earth. By the sanctification of the sabbath, the Jews declared that they worshipped the God that made the world, and so distinguished themselves from all other nations, who worshipped gods which they themselves made. [4.] God has given us an example of rest, after six days' work; he rested the seventh day, took a complacency in himself, and rejoiced in the work of his hand, to teach us on that day to take a complacency in him, and to give him the glory of his works, Ps. 92. 4. The sabbath began in the finishing of the work of creation, so will the everlasting sabbath in the finishing of the work of providence and redemption; and we observe the weekly sabbath in expectation of that, as well as in remembrance of the former; in both conforming ourselves to him we worship. [5.] He has himself blessed the sabbath-day, and sanctified it: he has put an honour upon it, by setting it apart for himself; it is the holy of the Lord and honourable, and he has put blessings into it, which he has encouraged us to expect from him in the religious observation of that day; it is the day which the Lord hath made, let not us do what we can to unmake it; he has blessed, honoured, and sanctified it, let not us profane it, dishonour it, and level that with common time, which God's blessing has thus dignified and distinguished.

12. Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee. 13. Thou shalt not kill. 14. Thou shalt not commit adultery. 15. Thou shalt not steal. 16. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour. 17. Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's wife, nor his man-servant, nor his maid-servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is thy neighbour's.

We have here the laws of the second table, as they are commonly called, the six last of the ten commandments, comprehending our duty to ourselves and to one another, and constituting a comment upon the second great commandment, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. As religion toward God is an essential branch of universal righteousness, so righteousness toward men is an essential branch of true religion. Godliness and honesty must go together.

1. The fifth commandment concerns the duties we owe to our relations; that of children to their parents is the only duty specified; Honour thy father and thy mother, which includes, 1. A decent respect to their persons, an inward esteem of them, outwardly expressed upon all occasions in our conduct toward them; Fear them; (Lev. 19. 3.) Give them reverence, Heb. 12. 9. The contrary to this is, mocking at them and despising them, Prov. 30. 17. 2. Obedience to their lawful commands; so it is expounded; (Eph. 6. 1. . 3.) Children, obey your parents, come when they call you, go where they send you, do what they bid you, refrain from what they forbid you; and this, as children, cheerfully, and from a principle of love. Though you have said, "We will not," yet afterward repent and obey, Matth. 21. 29. 3. Submission to their rebukes, instructions, and corrections; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward, out of conscience toward God. 4. Disposing of themselves with the advice, direction, and consent, of parents, nor alienating their property, but with their approbation. 5. Endeavouring in every thing to be the comfort of their parents, and to make their old age easy to them; maintaining them if they stand in need of support, which our Saviour makes to be particularly intended in this commandment, Matth. 15. 4. . 6.

The reason annexed to this commandment is a promise; That thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee: having mentioned, in the preface to the commandments, his bringing them out of Egypt as a reason for their obedience, he here, in the beginning of the second table, mentions his bringing them into Canaan, as another reason; that good land they must have upon their thoughts, and in their eye, now that they were in the wilderness. They must also remember, when they were come to that land, that they were upon their good behaviour, and that, if they did not conduct themselves well, their days should be shortened in that land; both the days of particular persons who should be cut off from it, and the days of their nation, which should be removed out of it. But here a long life in that good land is promised particularly to obedient children. They that do their duty to their parents are most likely to have the comfort of that which their parents gather for them, and leave to them: they that support their parents shall find that God, the common Father, will support them. This promise is expounded, (Eph. 6. 3.) That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth. Those who, in conscience towards God, keep this and the rest of God's commandments, may be sure that it shall be well with them, and that they shall live as long on earth as Infinite Wisdom sees good for them, and that what they may seem to be cut short of on earth shall be abundantly made up in eternal life, the heavenly Canaan which God will give them.

II. The sixth commandment concerns our own and our neighbour's life; (v. 13.) "Thou shalt not kill; thou shalt not do any thing hurtful or injurious to the health, ease, and life, of thy own body, or any other person's, unjustly." This is one of the laws of nature, and was strongly enforced by the precepts given to Noah and his sons, Gen. 9. 5, 6. It does not forbid killing in lawful war, or in our own necessary defence, or the magistrates' putting offenders to death, for those things tend to the preserving of life; but it forbids all malice and hatred to the person of any, (for he that hateth his brother is a murderer,) and all personal revenge arising therefrom; also all rash anger upon sudden provocations, and hurt said or done, or aimed to be done, in passion; of this our Saviour expounds this commandment, Matth. 5. 22. And, as that which is worst of all, it forbids persecution, laying wait for the blood of the innocent, and excellent ones of the earth.

III. The seventh commandment concerns our own and our neighbour's chastity; (v. 14.) Thou shalt not commit adultery: this is put before the sixth by our Saviour, (Mark, 10. 19.) Do not commit adultery, do not kill; for our chastity should be as dear to us as our lives, and we should be as much afraid of that which defiles the body as of that which destroys it. This commandment forbids all acts of uncleanness, with all those fleshly lusts which produce those acts, and war against the soul, and all those practices which cherish and excite those fleshly lusts, as looking, in order to lust, which, Christ tells us, is forbidden in this commandment, Matth. 5. 28.

IV. The eighth commandment concerns our own and our neighbour's wealth, estate, and goods; (v. 15.) Thou shalt not steal: though God had lately allowed and appointed them to spoil the Egyptians, in a way of just reprisal, yet he did not intend that it should be drawn into a precedent, and that they should be allowed thus to spoil one another. This commandment forbids us to rob ourselves of what we have, by sinful spending, or of the use and comfort of it, by sinful sparing; and to rob others, by removing the ancient land-marks, invading our neighbour's rights, taking his goods from his person, or house, or field, forcibly or clandestinely, over-reaching in bargains, not restoring what is borrowed or found, withholding just debts, rents, or wages; and it forbids us, what is worst of all, to rob the public in the coin or revenue, or that which is dedicated to the service of religion.

V. The ninth commandment concerns our own and our neighbour's good name; (v. 16.) Thou shalt not bear false witness: this forbids, 1. Speaking falsely on any matter, lying, equivocating, and any way devising and designing to deceive our neighbour. 2. Speaking unjustly against our neighbour, to the prejudice of his reputation; and, 3. (which involves the guilt of both these offences,) Bearing false witness against him, laying to his charge things that he knows not, either judicially, upon oath, by which the third commandment, and the sixth or eighth, as well as this, are broken; or extrajudicially, in common converse, slandering, backbiting, tale-bearing, aggravating what is done amiss, and making it worse than it is, and any way endeavouring to raise our own reputation upon the ruin of our neighbours.

VI. The tenth commandment strikes at the root; (v. 17.) Thou shalt not covet. The foregoing commands implicitly forbid all desire of doing that which will be an injury to our neighbour; this forbids all inordinate desire of having that which will be a gratification to ourselves. "Oh that such a man's house were mine! Such a man's wife mine! Such a man's estate mine!" This is certainly the language of discontent at our own lot, and envy at our neighbour's; and these are the sins principally forbidden here. St. Paul, when the grace of God caused the scales to fall from his eyes, perceived that this law, Thou shalt not covet, forbids all those irregular appetites and desires which are the first-born of the corrupt nature, the first risings of the sin that dwelleth in us, and the first beginnings of all the sin that is committed by us: this is that lust which, he says, he had not known the evil of, if this commandment, when it came to his conscience in the power of it, had not shewed it him, Rom. 7. 7. God give us all to see our face in the glass of this law, and to lay our hearts under the government of it!

18. And all the people saw the thunderings, and the lightnings, and the noise of the trumpet, and the mountain smoking: and when the people saw it, they removed, and stood afar off. 19. And they said unto Moses, Speak thou with us, and we will hear: but let not God speak with us, lest we die. 20. And Moses said unto the people, Fear not: for God is come to prove you, and that his fear may be before your faces, that ye sin not. 21. And the people stood afar off, and Moses drew near unto the thick darkness where God was.

Observe,

I. The extraordinary terror with which the law was given: never was any thing delivered with such awful pomp; every word was accented, and every sentence paused, with thunder and lightning, much louder and brighter, no doubt, than ordinary. And why was the law given in this dreadful manner, and with all this tremendous ceremony? 1. It was designed (once for all) to give a sensible discovery of the glorious majesty of God, for the assistance of our faith concerning it, that, knowing the terror of the Lord, we may be persuaded to live in his fear. 2. It was a specimen of the terrors of the general judgment, in which sinners will be called to an account for the breach of this law: the archangel's trumpet will then sound an alarm, to give notice of the Judge's coming, and a fire shall devour before him. 3. It was an indication of the terror of those convictions which the law brings into conscience, to prepare the soul for the comforts of the gospel. Thus was the law given by Moses in such a way as might startle, affright, and humble, men, that the grace and truth which come by Jesus Christ might be the more welcome. The apostle largely describes this instance of the terror of that dispensation, as a foil to set off our privileges, as Christians, in the light, liberty, and joy, of the New-Testament dispensation, Heb. 12. 18, &c.

II. The impression which this made, for the present, upon the people; they must have had stupid hearts indeed if this had not affected them. 1. They removed, and stood afar off, v. 16. Before God began to speak, they were thrusting forward to gaze; (ch. 19. 21.) but now they were effectually cured of their presumption, and taught to keep their distance. 2. They entreated that the word should not be so spoken to them any more, (Heb. 12. 19.) but begged that God would speak to them by Moses, v. 19. Hereby they obliged themselves to acquiesce in the mediation of Moses, they themselves nominating him as a fit person to deal between them and God, and promising to hearken to him as to God's messenger; hereby also they teach us to acquiesce in that method which Infinite Wisdom takes of speaking to us by men like ourselves, whose terror shall not make us afraid, nor their hand be heavy upon us. Once, God tried the expedient of speaking to the children of men immediately, but it was found that they could not bear it, it rather drove men from God than brought them to him, and, as it proved in the issue, though it terrified them, it did not deter them from idolatry, for, soon after this, they worshipped the golden calf; let us therefore rest satisfied with the instructions given us by the scriptures and the ministry; for, if we believe not them, neither should we be persuaded though God should speak to us in thunder and lightning, as he did from mount Sinai: here that matter was determined.

III. The encouragement Moses gave them, explaining the design of God in his terror; (v. 20.) Fear not, that is, "Think not that the thunder and fire are designed to consume you," which was the thing they feared, (v. 19.) lest we die; thunder and lightning constituted one of the plagues of Egypt; but Moses would not have them think it was sent to them on the same errand on which it was sent to the Egyptians: no, it was intended, 1. To prove them, to try how they would like dealing with God immediately, without a mediator, and so to convince them how admirably well God had chosen for them, in putting Moses into that office. Ever since Adam fled, upon hearing God's voice in the garden, sinful man could not bear either to speak to God, or hear from him immediately. 2. To keep them to their duty, and prevent their sinning against God. He encourages them, saying, Fear not, and yet tells them that God thus spake to them, that his fear might be before their face. We must not fear with amazement—with that fear which has torment, which only works upon the fancy for the present, which sets us a trembling, which genders to bondage, which betrays us to Satan, and alienates us from God; but we must always have in our minds a reverence of God's majesty, a dread of his displeasure, and an obedient regard to his sovereign authority over us; this fear will quicken us to our duty, and make us circumspect in our walking; thus stand in awe, and sin not, Ps. 4. 4.

IV. The progress of their communion with God by the mediation of Moses, v. 21. While the people continued to stand afar off, conscious of guilt, and afraid of God's wrath, Moses drew near unto the thick darkness; he was made to draw near, so the word is: Moses of himself durst not have ventured into the thick darkness, if God had not called him, and encouraged him, and, as some of the rabbins suppose, sent an angel to take him by the hand, and lead him up. Thus it is said of the great Mediator, I will cause him to draw near; (Jer. 30. 21.) and by him it is that we also are introduced, Eph. 3. 12.

22. And the Lord said unto Moses, Thus thou shalt say unto the children of Israel, Ye have seen that I have talked with you from heaven. 23. Ye shall not make with me gods of silver, neither shall ye make unto you gods of gold. 24. An altar of earth thou shalt make unto me, and shalt sacrifice thereon thy burnt-offerings, and thy peace-offerings, thy sheep, and thine oxen: In all places where I record my name, I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee. 25. And if thou wilt make me an altar of stone, thou shalt not build it of hewn stone: for if thou lift up thy tool upon it, thou hast polluted it. 26. Neither shalt thou go up by steps unto mine altar, that thy nakedness be not discovered thereon.

Moses being gone into the thick darkness where God was, God there spake in his hearing only, privately and without terror, all that follows from hence to the end of ch. 23. which is mostly an exposition of the ten commandments; and he was to transmit it by word of mouth first, and afterward in writing, to the people. The laws in these verses related to God's worship.

I. They are here forbidden to make images for worship; (v. 22, 23.) Ye have seen that I have talked with you from heaven; (such was his wonderful condescension, much more than for some mighty prince to talk familiarly with a company of poor beggars;) now ye shall not make gods of silver. This repetition of the second commandment comes in here, either, 1. As pointing to that which God had chiefly in view in giving them this law in this manner, that is, their peculiar addictedness to idolatry, and the peculiar sinfulness of that crime. Ten commandments God had given them, but Moses is ordered to inculcate upon them especially the two first. They must not forget any of them, but they must be sure to remember those. Or, 2. As pointing to that which might properly be inferred from God's speaking to them as he had done. He had given them sufficient demonstration of his presence among them; they needed not to make images of him, as if he were absent. Besides, they had only seen that he talked with them, they had seen no manner of similitude, so that they could not make any image of God; and his manifesting himself to them only by a voice, plainly shewed them that they must not make any such image, but keep up their communion with God by his word, and not otherwise.

Two arguments are here hinted against image-worship. (1.) That thereby they would affront God, intimated in that, Ye shall not make with me gods: though they pretended to worship them but as representations of God, yet really they made them rivals with God, which he would not endure. (2.) That thereby they would abuse themselves, intimated in that, Ye shall not make unto you gods; while ye think by them to assist your devotion, ye will really corrupt it, and put a cheat upon yourselves." At first, it should seem, they made their images for worship of gold and silver, pretending, by the richness of those metals, to honour God, and, by the brightness of them, to affect themselves with his glory; but even in these they changed the truth of God into a lie, and so by degrees were justly given up to such strong delusions as to worship images of wood or stone.

II. They are here directed in making altars for worship: it is meant of occasional altars, such as they reared now in the wilderness, before the tabernacle was erected, and afterward, upon special emergencies, for present use, such as Gideon built, (Judg. 6. 24.) Manoah, (Judg. 13. 19.) Sammel, (1 Sam. 7. 17.) and many others. We may suppose, now that the people of Israel were so much affected, as it appears they were, with this glorious discovery which God had made of himself to them, that many of them would incline, in this pang of devotion, to offer sacrifice to God; and, it being necessary to sacrifice that there be an altar, they are here appointed,

1. To make their altars very plain, either of earth or of unhewn stone, v. 24, 25. That they might not be tempted to think of a graven image, they must not so much as hew into shape the stones that they made their altars of, but pile them up as they were, in the rough. This rule being prescribed before the establishment of the ceremonial law, which appointed altars much more costly, intimates, that, after the period of that law, plainness should be accepted as the best ornament of the external services of religion, and that gospel-worship should not be performed with external pomp and gaiety. The beauty of holiness needs no paint, nor do those do any service to the spouse of Christ that dress her in the attire of a harlot, as the church of Rome does: an altar of earth does best.

2. To make their altars very low, (v. 26.) so that they might not go up by steps to them. That the higher the altar was, and the nearer heaven, the more acceptable the sacrifice was, was a foolish fancy of the heathen, who therefore chose high places; in opposition to which, and to shew that it is the elevation of the heart, not of the sacrifice, that God looks at, they were here ordered to make their altars low: we may suppose that the altars they reared in the wilderness, and other occasional altars, were designed only for the sacrifice of one beast at a time: but the altar in Solomon's temple, which was to be made much longer and broader, that it might contain many sacrifices at once, was made ten cubits high, that the height might bear a decent proportion to the length and breadth; and to that it was requisite they should go up by steps, which yet, no doubt, were so contrived as to prevent the inconvenience here spoken of, the discovering of their nakedness thereon.

III. They are here assured of God's gracious acceptance of their devotions, wherever they were paid according to his will; (v. 24.) In all places where I record my name, or where my name is recorded, that is, where I am worshipped in sincerity, I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee. Afterward, God chose one particular place wherein to record his name; but that being taken away now under the gospel, when men are encouraged to pray every where, this promise revives in its full extent, that, wherever God's people meet in his name to worship him, he will be in the midst of them: he will honour them with his presence, and reward them with the gifts of his grace; there he will come unto them, and will bless them, and more than this we need not desire for the beautifying of our solemn assemblies.

CHAP. XXI.

The laws recorded in this chapter relate to the fifth and sixth commandments; and though they are not accommodated to our constitution, especially in point of servitude, nor are the penalties annexed binding on us, yet they are of great use for the explanation of the moral law, and the rules of natural justice. Here are several enlargements, I. Upon the fifth commandment, which concerns particular relations. 1. The duty of masters toward their servants; their menservants, (v. 2. 6.) and maid-servants, v. 7. 11. 2. The punishment of disobedient children that strike their parents, (v. 15.) or curse them, v. 17. II. Upon the sixth commandment, which forbids all violence offered to the person of a man. Here is, 1. Concerning murder, v. 12. 14. 2. Man-stealing, v. 16. 3. Assault and battery, v. 18, 19. 4. Correcting a servant, v. 20, 21. 5. Hurting a woman with child, v. 22, 23. 6. The law of retaliation, v. 24, 25. 7. Maiming a servant, v. 26, 27. 8. An ox goring, v. 28. 32. 9. Damage by opening a pit, v. 33, 34. 10. Cattle fighting, v. 35, 36.

1. NOW these are the judgments which thou shalt set before them. 2. If thou buy an Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve: and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing. 3. If he came in by himself, he shall go out by himself; if he were married, then his wife shall go out with him. 4. If his master have given him a wife, and she have born him sons or daughters; the wife and her children shall be her master's, and he shall go out by himself. 5. And if the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children; I will not go out free: 6. Then his master shall bring him unto the judges; he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door-post; and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl; and he shall serve him for ever. 7. And if a man sell his daughter to be a maid-servant, she shall not go out as the menservants do. 8. If she please not her master, who hath betrothed her to himself, then shall he let her be redeemed: to sell her unto a strange nation he shall have no power, seeing he hath dealt deceitfully with her. 9. And if he have betrothed her unto his son, he shall deal with her after the manner of daughters. 10. If he take him another wife; her food, her raiment, and her duty of marriage, shall he not diminish. 11. And if he do not these three unto her, then shall she go out free without money.

The first verse is the general title of the laws contained in this and the two following chapters; some of them relating to the religious worship of God, but most of them relating to matters between man and man. Their government being purely a Theocracy, that which in other states is to be settled by human prudence was directed among them by a divine appointment, so that the constitution of their government was peculiarly adapted to make them happy. These laws are called judgments, because they are framed in infinite wisdom and equity, and because their magistrates were to give judgment according to them. God delivered them privately to Moses, and he was to communicate them to the people. In the doubtful cases that had hitherto occurred, Moses had particularly inquired of God for them, as appeared, ch. 18. 15. but now God gave him statutes in general by which to determine particular cases, which likewise he must apply to other like cases that might happen, which, falling under the same reason, fell under the same rule.

He begins with the laws concerning servants, commanding mercy and moderation toward them. The Israelites had lately been servants themselves; and now that they were become, not only their own masters, but masters of servants too, lest they should abuse their servants, as they themselves had been abused and ruled with rigour by the Egyptian task-masters, provision was made by these laws for the mild and gentle usage of servants. Note, If those who have had power over us, have been injurious to us, that will not in the least excuse us if we be in like manner injurious to those who are under our power, but will rather aggravate our crime, because, in that case, we may the more easily put our souls into their souls' stead.

Here is,

1. A law concerning men-servants, sold, either by themselves, or their parents, through poverty, or by the judges, for their crimes; even those of the latter sort (if Hebrews) were to continue in slavery but seven years at the most, in which time it was taken for granted that they would sufficiently smart for their folly or offence. At seven years' end, the servant should either go out free, (v. 2, 3.) or his servitude should from thenceforward be his choice, v. 5, 6. If he had a wife given him by his master, and children, he might either leave them and go out free himself, or, if he had such a kindness for them, that he would rather tarry with them in bondage than go out at liberty without them, he was to have his ear bored through to the door-post, and serve till the death of his master, or the year of jubilee. By this law, God taught, (1.) The Hebrew servants' generosity, and a noble love of liberty, for they were the Lord's freemen; a mark of disgrace must be put upon him who refused liberty when he might have it, though he refused it upon considerations otherwise laudable enough. Thus Christians, being bought with a price, and called unto liberty, must not be the servants of men, not of the lusts of men, 1 Cor. 7. 23. There is a free and princely spirit that much helps to uphold a Christian, Ps. 51. 12. He likewise taught, (2.) The Hebrew masters not to trample upon their poor servants, knowing, not only that they had been by birth upon a level with them, but that, in a few years, they would be so again. Thus Christian masters must look with respect on believing servants, Philem. 16. This law will be further useful to us, [1.] To illustrate the right God has to the children of believing parents, as such, and the place they have in his church. They are by baptism enrolled among his servants, because they are born in his house, for they are therefore born unto him, Ezek. 16. 20. David owns himself God's servant, as he was the son of his hand-maid, (Ps. 116. 16.) and therefore entitled to protection, Ps. 36. 16. [2.] To explain the obligation which the great Redeemer laid upon himself to prosecute the work of our salvation, for he says, (Ps. 40. 6.) Mine ears hast thou opened, which seems to allude to this law. He loved his Father, and his captive-spouse, and the children that were given him, and would not go out free from his undertaking, but engaged to serve in it for ever, Isa. 42. 1, 4. Much more reason have we thus to engage ourselves to serve God for ever; we have all the reason in the world to love our Master and his work, and to have our ears bored to his door-posts, as those who desire not to go out free from his service, but to be found more and more free to it, and in it, Ps. 84. 10.

2. Concerning maid-servants, whom their parents, through extreme poverty, had sold when they were very young, to such as they hoped would marry them when they grew up; if they did not, yet they must not sell them to strangers, but rather study how to make them amends for their disappointment; if they did, they must maintain them handsomely, v. 7. 11. Thus did God provide for the comfort and reputation of the daughters of Israel, and has taught husbands to give honour to their wives, (he their extraction ever so mean,) as to the weaker vessels, 1 Pet. 3. 7.

12. He that smiteth a man, so that he die, shall be surely put to death. 13. And if a man lie not in wait, but God deliver him into his hand; then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. 14. But if a man come presumptuously upon his neighbour, to slay him with guile; thou shalt take him from mine altar, that he may die. 15. And he that smiteth his father, or his mother, shall be surely put to death. 16. And he that stealeth a man, and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death. 17. And he that curseth his father or his mother, shall surely be put to death. 18. And if men strive together, and one smite another with a stone, or with his fist, and he die not, but keepeth his bed: 19. If he rise again, and walk abroad upon his staff, then shall he that smote him, be quit: only he shall pay for the loss of his time, and shall cause him to be thoroughly healed. 20. And if a man smite his servant, or his maid, with a rod, and he die under his hand; he shall be surely punished. 21. Notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished: for he is his money.

Here is,

1. A law concerning murder; he had lately said, Thou shalt not kill; here he provides, (1.) For the punishing of wilful murder; (v. 12.) He that smiteth a man, whether upon a sudden passion, or in malice prepense, so that he die, the government must take care that the murderer be put to death, according to that ancient law, (Gen. 9. 6.) Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed. God, who, by his providence, gives and maintains life, thus, by his law, protects it: so that mercy shewed to a wilful murderer is real cruelty to all mankind besides: such a one, God here says, shall be taken even from his altar, (v. 14.) to which he might flee for protection; and if God will not shelter him, let him flee to the pit, and let no man stay him. (2.) For the relief of such as were killed by accident, per infortunium—by misfortune, as our law expresses it, or chance-medley, when a man, in doing a lawful act, without intent of hurt to any, happens to kill another, or, as it is here described, God delivers him into his hand; for nothing comes to pass by chance; what seems to us purely casual, is ordered by the Divine Providence, for wise and holy ends, secret to us. In this case, God provided cities of refuge for the protection of those whose infelicity it was, but not their fault, to occasion the death of another, v. 13. With us, who know no avengers of blood but the magistrates, the law itself is a sufficient sanctuary for those whose minds are innocent, though their hands are guilty, and there needs no other.

2. Concerning rebellious children; it is here made a capital crime, to be punished with death, for children, either, (1.) To strike their parents, (v. 15.) so as either to draw blood, or to make the place struck, black and blue. Or, (2.) To curse their parents, (v. 17.) if they profaned any name of God in doing it, as the rabbins say. Note, The undutiful behaviour of children toward their parents is a very great provocation to God our common Father; and if men do not punish it, he will. Those are perfectly lost to all virtue, and abandoned to all wickedness, that have broken through the bonds of filial reverence and duty to such a degree as in word or action to abuse their own parents. What yoke will they bear, that have shaken off this? Let children take heed of entertaining in their minds any such thought or passions toward their parents as savour of undutifulness and contempt; for the righteous God searches the heart.

3. Here is a law against man-stealing; (v. 16.) He that steals a man, woman, or child, with a design to sell them to the Gentiles, (for no Israelites would buy them,) was adjudged to death by this statute; which is ratified by the apostle, (1 Tim. 1. 10.) where men-stealers are reckoned among those wicked ones against whom laws must be made by Christian princes.

4. Care is here taken, that satisfaction be made for hurt done to a person, though death do not ensue, v. 18, 19. He that did the hurt must be accountable for damages, and pay, not only for the cure, but for the loss of time; to which the Jews add, that he must likewise give some recompence, both for the pain and for the blemish, if there were any.

5. Direction is given what should be done, if a servant died by his master's correction. This servant must not be an Israelite, but a Gentile slave, as the negroes to our planters; and it is supposed that he smite him with a rod, and not with any thing that was likely to give a mortal wound; yet, if he died under his hand, he should be punished for his cruelty, at the discretion of the judges, upon consideration of circumstances, v. 20. But if he continued a day or two after the correction given, the master was supposed to suffer enough by losing his servant, v. 21. Our law makes the death of a servant, by his master's reasonable beating of him, but chance-medley. Yet let all masters take heed of tyrannizing over their servants; the gospel teaches them even to forbear, and moderate threatenings, (Eph. 6. 9.) considering, with holy Job, What shall I do, when God riseth up? Job, 31. 13. 15.

22. If men strive, and hurt a woman with child, so that her fruit depart from her, and yet no mischief follow: he shall be surely punished, according as the woman's husband will lay upon him; and he shall pay as the judges determine.

23. And if any mischief follow, then thou shalt give life for life, 24. Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, 25. Burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe. 26. And if a man smite the eye of his servant, or the eye of his maid, that it perish; he shall let him go free for his eye's sake. 27. And if he smite out his man-servant's tooth, or his maid servant's tooth; he shall let him go free for his tooth's sake. 28. If an ox gore a man or a woman, that they die: then the ox shall be surely stoned, and his flesh shall not be eaten; but the owner of the ox shall be quit. 29. But if the ox were wont to push with his horn in time past, and it hath been testified to his owner, and he hath not kept him in, but that he hath killed a man or a woman; the ox shall be stoned, and his owner also shall be put to death. 30. If there be laid on him a sum of money, then he shall give for the ransom of his life whatsoever is laid upon him. 31. Whether he have gored a son, or have gored a daughter, according to this judgment shall it be done unto him. 32. If the ox shall push a man-servant or maid-servant; he shall give unto their master thirty shekels of silver, and the ox shall be stoned. 33. And if a man shall open a pit, or if a man shall dig a pit, and not cover it, and an ox or an ass fall therein; 34. The owner of the pit shall make it good, and give money unto the owner of them; and the dead beast shall be his. 35. And if one man's ox hurt another's, that he die; then they shall sell the live ox, and divide the money of it; and the dead ox also they shall divide. 36. Or if it be known that the ox hath used to push in time past, and his owner hath not kept him in; he shall surely pay ox for ox; and the dead shall be his own.

Observe here,

1. The particular care which the law took of women with child, that no hurt should be done them, which might occasion their miscarrying. The law of nature obliges us to be very tender in that case, lest the tree and fruit be destroyed together, v. 22, 23. Women with child, who were thus taken under the special protection of the law of God, if they live in his fear, may still believe themselves under the special protection of the providence of God, and hope that they shall be saved in child-bearing. On this occasion comes in that general law of retaliation, which our Saviour refers to, Matth. 5. 38. An eye for an eye. Now, 1. The execution of this law is not hereby put into the hands of private persons, as if every man might avenge himself; which would introduce universal confusion, and make men like the fishes of the sea. The tradition of the elders seems to have put this corrupt gloss upon it; in opposition to which, our Saviour commands us to forgive injuries, and not to meditate revenge, Matth. 5. 39. 2. God often executes it in the course of his providence, making the punishment, in many cases, to answer to the sin, as Judg. 1. 7. Isa. 33. 1. Hab. 2. 13. Matth. 26. 52. 3. Magistrates ought to have an eye to this rule, in punishing offenders, and doing right to those that are injured. Consideration must be had of the nature, quality, and degree, of the wrong done, that reparation may be made to the party injured, and others deterred from doing the like; either an eye shall go for an eye, or the forfeited eye shall be redeemed by a sum of money. Note, He that does wrong must expect, one way or other, to receive according to the wrong he has done, Col. 3. 25. God sometimes brings men's violent dealings upon their own heads; (Ps. 7. 16.) and magistrates are in this the ministers of his justice, that they are avengers, (Rom. 13. 4.) and they shall not bear the sword in vain.

II. The care God took of servants; if their masters maimed them, though it was only striking out a tooth, that should be their discharge, v. 26, 27. This was intended, 1. To prevent their being abused; masters would be careful not to offer them any violence, lest they should lose their service. 2. To comfort them, if they were abused; the loss of a limb should be the gaining of their liberty, which would do something toward balancing both the pain and disgrace they underwent. Nay,

III. Does God take care for oxen? Yes, it appears, by the following ing laws in this chapter, that he does, for our sakes, 1 Cor. 9. 9, 10. The Israelites are here directed what to do,

1. In case of hurt done by oxen, or any other brute-creature; for the law, doubtless, was designed to extend to all parallel cases. (1.) As an instance of God's care of the life of man, (though forfeited a thousand times into the hands of divine justice,) and in token of his detestation of the sin of murder; if an ox killed any man, woman, or child, the ox was to be stoned, v. 28. And because the greatest honour of the inferior creatures, is, to be serviceable to man, the criminal is denied that honour, his flesh shall not be eaten. Thus God would keep up in the minds of his people, a rooted abhorrence of the sin of murder, and every thing that was barbarous. (2.) To make men careful that none of their cattle might do hurt, but that, by all means possible, mischief might be prevented; if the owner of the beast knew that he was mischievous he must answer for the hurt done, and, according as the circumstances of the case proved him to be more or less necessary, he must either be put to death, or ransom his life with a sum of money, v. 29, 32. Some of our ancient books make this felony, by the common-law of England, and give this reason, "The owner, by suffering his beast to go at liberty, when he knew it to be mischievous, shews that he was very willing that hurt should be done." Note, It is not enough for us not to do mischief ourselves, but we must take care that no mischief be done by those whom it is in our power to restrain, whether man or beast.

2. In case of hurt done to oxen, or other cattle. If they fall into a pit, and perish there, he that opened the pit must make good the loss, v. 33, 34. Note, We must take heed, not only of doing that which will be hurtful, but of doing that which may be so. It is not enough not to design and devise mischief, but we must contrive to prevent mischief; else we become accessory to our neighbours' damage: mischief done in malice is the great transgression; but mischief done through negligence, and for want of due care and consideration, is not without fault, but ought to be reflected upon with regret, according as the degree of the mischief is: especially, we must be careful that we do nothing to make ourselves accessory to the sins of others, by laying an occasion of offence in our brother's way, Rom. 14. 13.

If cattle fight, and one kill another, the owners shall equally share in the loss, v. 35. Only, if the beast that had done the harm was known to the owner to have been mischievous, he shall answer for the damage, because he ought either to have killed him, or kept him up, v. 36. The determinations of these cases carry with them the evidence of their own equity, and give such rules of justice as were then, and are still, in use, for the deciding of similar controversies that arise between man and man. But I conjecture that these cases might be specified, rather than others, (though some of them seem minute,) because they were then cases in fact actually depending before Moses; for, in the wilderness, where they lay closely encamped, and had their flocks and herds among them, such mischiefs as these last mentioned were likely enough to occur. That which we are taught by these laws, is, that we be very careful to do no wrong, either directly or indirectly; but that, if we have done wrong, we must be very willing to make satisfaction, and desirous that nobody may lose by us.

CHAP. XXII.

The laws of this chapter relate, I. To the eighth commandment, concerning theft; (v. 1. 4.) Trecpass by cattle; (v. 5.) Damage by fire; (v. 6.) Trusts (v. 7. 13.) Borrowing cattle, (v. 11, 15.) or money, v. 25. 27. II. To the seventh commandment, Against fornication; (v. 16, 17.) Bestiality, v. 19. III. To the first table, forbidding witchcraft, (v. 18.) Idolatry, v. 20. Commanding to offer the first fruits, v. 29, 30. IV. To the poor, v. 21. 24. V. To the civil government, v. 25. VI. To the peculiarity of the Jewish nation, v. 31.

I. IF a man shall steal an ox, or a sheep, and kill it, or sell it; he shall restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep. 2. If a thief be found breaking up, and be smitten that he die, there shall no blood be shed for him. 3. If the sun be risen upon him, there shall be blood shed for him; for he should make full restitution; if he have nothing, then he shall be sold for his theft. 4. If the theft be certainly found in his hand alive, whether it be ox, or ass, or sheep; he shall restore double. 5. If a man shall cause a field or vineyard to be eaten, and shall put in his beast, and shall feed in another man's field; of the best of his own field, and of the best of his own vineyard, shall he make restitution. 6. If fire break out, and catch in thorns, so that the stacks of corn, or the standing corn, or the field, be consumed therewith; he that kindled the fire shall surely make restitution.

Here are the laws.

1. Concerning theft, which are these; (1.) If a man steal any cattle, (in which the wealth of those times chiefly consisted,) and they be found in his custody, he must restore double, v. 4. Thus he must both satisfy for the wrong, and suffer for the crime. But it was afterward provided, that, if the thief were touched in conscience, and voluntarily confessed it, before it was discovered or inquired into by any other, then he should only make restitution of what he had stolen, and add to it a fifth part, Lev. 6. 4, 5. (2.) If he had killed or sold the sheep or ox he had stolen, and thereby persisted in his crime, he must restore five oxen for an ox, and four sheep for a sheep; (v. 1.) more for an ox than for a sheep, because the owner, beside all the other profit, lost the daily labour of his ox. This law teaches us, that fraud and injustice, so far from enriching men, will impoverish them: if we unjustly get and keep that which is another's, it will not only waste itself, but it will consume that which is our own. (3.) If he was not able to make restitution, he must be sold for a slave, v. 3. The court of judgment was to do it, and it is probable that the person robbed had the money. Thus with us, in some cases, felons are transported into plantations where alone Englishmen know what slavery is. (4.) If a thief broke a house in the night, and was killed in the doing of it, his blood was upon his own head, and should not be required at the hand of him that shed it, v. 2. As he that does an unlawful act bears the blame of the mischief that follows to others, so likewise of that which follows to himself. A man's house is his castle, and God's law, as well as man's, sets a guard upon it; he that assaults it does it at his peril. Yet if it were in the day-time that the thief was killed, he that killed him must be accountable for it, (v. 3.) unless it were in the necessary defence of his own life. Note, We ought to be tender of the lives even of bad men; the magistrate must right us, and we must not avenge ourselves.

2. Concerning trespass, v. 5. He that wilfully put his cattle into his neighbour's field, must make restitution of the best of his own. Our law makes a much greater difference between this and other thefts, than the law of Moses did. The Jews hence observed it as a general rule, that restitution must always be made of the best, and that no man should keep any cattle that were likely to trespass upon his neighbours, or do them any damage. We should be more careful not to do wrong, than not to suffer wrong, because to suffer wrong is only an affliction, but to do wrong is a sin, and sin is always worse than affliction.

3. Concerning damage done by fire, v. 6. He that designed only the burning of thorns, might become accessory to the burning of corn, and should not be held guiltless. Men of hot and eager spirits should take heed, lest, while they pretend only to pluck up the tares, they root out the wheat also. If the fire did mischief, he that kindled it must answer for it, though it could not be proved that he designed the mischief. Men must suffer for their carelessness, as well as for their malice. We must take heed of beginning strife; for, though it seem but little, we know not how great a matter it may kindle, which we must bear the blame of, if, with the madman, we cast fire-brands, arrows, and death, and pretend we mean no harm. It will make us very careful of ourselves, if we consider that we are accountable, not only for the hurt we do, but for the hurt we occasion, through inadvertency.

7. If a man shall deliver unto his neighbour money or stuff to keep, and it be stolen out of the man's house; if the thief be found, let him pay double. 8. If the thief be not found, then the master of the house shall be brought unto the judges, to see whether he have put his hand unto his neighbour's goods. 9. For all manner of trespass, whether it be for ox, for ass, for sheep, for raiment, or for any manner of lost thing, which another challengeth to be his, the cause of both parties shall come before the judges; and whom the judges shall condemn, he shall pay double unto his neighbour. 10. If a man deliver unto his neighbour an ass, or an ox, or a sheep, or any beast, to keep; and it die, or be hurt, or driven away, no man seeing it: 11. Then shall an oath of the Lord be between them both, that he hath not put his hand unto his neighbour's goods; and the owner of it shall accept thereof, and he shall not make it good. 12. And if it be stolen from him, he shall make restitution unto the owner thereof. 13. If it be torn in pieces, then let him bring it for witness, and he shall not make good that which was torn. 14. And if a man borrow ought of his neighbour, and it be hurt, or die, the owner thereof being not with it, he shall surely make it good. 15. But if the owner thereof be with it, he shall not make it good: if it be an hired thing, it came for his hire.

These laws are,

1. Concerning trusts, v. 7. .13. If a man deliver goods, suppose to a carrier, to be conveyed, or to a warehouse-keeper, to be preserved, or cattle to a farmer, to be fed, upon a valuable consideration; and if a special confidence be reposed in the person they are lodged with; in case these goods be stolen or lost, perish or be damaged, if it appear that it was not by any fault of the trustee, the owner must stand to the loss; otherwise, he that has been false to his trust must be compelled to make satisfaction. The trustee must aver his innocence upon oath before the judges, if the case was such as afforded no other proof, and they were to determine the matter according as it appeared. This teaches us, (1.) That we ought to be very careful of every thing we are intrusted with; as careful of it, though it be another's, as if it were our own. It is unjust and base, and that which all the world cries shame on, to betray a trust. (2.) That there is such a general failing of truth and justice upon earth, as gives too much occasion to suspect men's honesty, whenever it is their interest to be dishonest. (3.) That an oath for confirmation is an end of strife, Heb. 6. 16. It is called an oath for the Lord, (v. 11.) because to Him the appeal is made, not only as to a Witness of truth, but as to an avenger of wrong and falsehood. Those that had offered injury to their neighbour by doing any unjust thing, yet, it might be hoped, had not so far debauched their consciences as to profane an oath of the Lord, and call the God of truth to be Witness to a lie: perjury is a sin which natural conscience startles at as much as any other. The religion of an oath is very ancient, and a plain indication of the universal belief of a God, and a providence, and judgment to come. (4.) That magistracy is an ordinance of God, designed, among other intentions, to assist men both in discovering rights disputed, and recovering rights denied; and great respect ought to be paid to the determination of the judges. (5.) That there is no reason why a man should suffer for that which he could not help: masters should consider this in dealing with their servants, and not rebuke that as a fault which was a mischance, and which they themselves, had they been in their servants' places, could not have prevented.

2. Concerning loans, v. 14, 15. If a man (suppose) lent his team to his neighbour, if the owner was with it, or was to receive profit for the loan of it, whatever harm befel the cattle, the owner must stand to the loss of: but if the owner were so kind to the borrower, as to lend it him gratis, and put such a confidence in him, as to trust it from under his own eye, then, if any harm happened, the borrower must make it good. Let us learn hence to be very careful not to abuse any thing that is lent us; it is not only unjust, but base and disingenuous, inasmuch as it is rendering evil for good; we should much rather choose to lose ourselves, than that any should sustain loss by their kindness to us; Alas! master, for it was borrowed, 2 Kings, 6. 5.

16. And if a man entice a maid that is not betrothed, and lie with her, he shall surely endow her to be his wife. 17. If her father utterly refuse to give her unto him, he shall pay money according to the dowry of virgins. 18. Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live. 19. Whosoever lieth with a beast shall surely be put to death. 20. He that sacrificeth unto any god, save unto the LORD only, he shall be utterly destroyed. 21. Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt. 22. Ye shall not afflict any widow, or fatherless child. 23. If thou afflict them in any wise, and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry; 24. And my wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword; and your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless.

Here is,

1. A law, that he who debauched a young woman should be obliged to marry her, v. 16, 17. If she was betrothed to another, it was death to debauch her, (Deut. 22. 23, 24.) but the law here mentioned respects her as single. But if the father refused her to him, he was to give satisfaction in money for the injury and disgrace he had done her. This law puts an honour upon marriage, and shews likewise how improper a thing it is, that children should marry without their parents' consent: even here, where the divine law appointed the marriage, both as a punishment to him that had done wrong, and a recompence to her that had suffered wrong, yet there was an express reservation for the father's power; if he denied his consent, it must be no marriage.

2. A law which makes witchcraft a capital crime, v. 18. Witchcraft not only gives that honour to the Devil which is due to God alone, but bids defiance to the Divine Providence, wages war with God's government, and puts his work into the Devil's hand, expecting him to do good and evil, and so making him, indeed, the God of this world; justly, therefore, was it punished with death, especially among a people that were blessed with a divine revelation, and cared for by Divine Providence above any people under the sun. By our law, consulting, covenanting with, invoking, or employing, any evil spirit, to any intent whatsoever, and exercising any enchantment, charm, or sorcery, whereby hurt shall be done to any person whatsoever, is made felony, without benefit of clergy; also pretending to tell where goods lost or stolen may be found, or the like, is an iniquity punishable by the judge, and the second offence with death. The justice of our law herein is supported by the law of God here.

3. Unnatural abominations are here made capital; such beasts in the shape of men as are guilty of them are unfit to live; v. 19. Whosoever lies with a beast shall die.

4. Idolatry is also made capital, v. 20. God having declared himself jealous in this matter, the civil powers must be jealous in it too, and utterly destroy those persons, families, and places of Israel, that worshipped any god, save the Lord: this law might have prevented the woeful apostacies of the Jewish nation, in aftertimes, if those that should have executed it had not been ringleaders in the breach of it.

5. A caution against oppression; because those who were empowered to punish other crimes were themselves most in danger of this, God takes the punishing of it into his own hands.

(1.) Strangers must not be abused, (v. 21.) not wronged in judgment by the magistrates, not imposed upon in contracts, nor must any advantage be taken of their ignorance or necessity; no, nor must they be taunted, trampled upon, treated with contempt, or upbraided with being strangers; for all these were vexatious, and would discourage strangers from coming to live among them, or would strengthen their prejudices against their religion, to which, by all kind and gentle methods, they should endeavour to proselyte them. The reason given why they should be kind to strangers, is, Ye were strangers in Egypt, and knew what it was to be vexed and oppressed there." Note, [1.] Humanity is one of the laws of religion, and obliges us particularly to be tender of those that lie most under disadvantages and discouragements, and to extend our compassionate concern to strangers, and those to whom we are not under the obligations of alliance or acquaintance. Those that are strangers to us are known to God, and he preserves them, Ps. 146. 9. [2.] Those that profess religion should study to oblige strangers, that they may thereby recommend religion to their good opinion, and take heed of doing any thing that may tempt them to think ill of it, or its professors, 1 Pet. 2. 12. [3.] Those that have themselves been in poverty and distress, if Providence enrich and enlarge them, ought to shew a particular tenderness toward those that are now in such circumstances as they were in formerly, doing now by them as they then wished to be done by.

(2.) Widows and fatherless must not be abused; (v. 22.) Ye shall not afflict them, that is, "Ye shall comfort and assist them, and be ready upon all occasions to shew them kindness." In making just demands from them, their condition must be considered, who have lost those that should deal for them, and protect them; they are supposed to be unversed in business, destitute of advice, timorous, and of a tender spirit, and therefore must be treated with kindness and compassion; no advantage must be taken against them, nor any hardship put upon them, which a husband or a father would have sheltered them from. For, [1.] God takes particular cognizance of their case, v. 23. Having no one else to complain and appeal to, they will cry unto God, and he will be sure to hear them; for his law and his providence are guardians to the widows and fatherless, and if men do not pity them, and will not hear them, he will. Note, It is a great comfort for those who are injured and oppressed by men, that they have a God to go to, who will do more than give them the hearing; and it ought to be a terror to those who are oppressive, that they have the cry of the poor against them, which God will hear. Nay, [2.] He will severely reckon with those that do oppress them; though they escape punishment from men, God's righteous judgments will pursue and overtake them, v. 24. Men that have a sense of justice and honour will espouse the injured cause of the weak and helpless; and shall not the righteous God do it? Observe the equity of the sentence here passed upon those that oppress the widows and fatherless; their wives shall become widows, and their children fatherless; and the Lord is known by these judgments, which he sometimes executes still.

25. If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury. 26. If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down: 27. For that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep? And it shall come to pass, when he crieth unto me, that I will hear; for I am gracious. 28. Thou shalt not revile the gods, nor curse the ruler of thy people. 29. Thou shalt not delay to offer the first of thy ripe fruits, and of thy liquors: the first-born of thy sons shalt thou give unto me. 30. Likewise shalt thou do with thine oxen, and with thy sheep: seven days it shall be with his dam; on the eighth day thou shalt give it me. 31. And ye shall be holy men unto me: neither shall ye eat any flesh that is torn of beasts in the field; ye shall cast it to the dogs.

Here is,

1. A law against extortion, in lending. (1.) They must not receive usury for money from any that borrowed for necessity, (v. 25.) as in that case, Neh. 5. 5, 7. And such provision the law made for the preserving of estates to their families by the year of jubilee, that a people who had little concern in trade could not be supposed to borrow money, but for necessity, and therefore it is generally forbidden among themselves; but to a stranger they were allowed to lend upon usury, whom yet they might not oppress: this law, therefore, in the strictness of it, seems to have been peculiar to the Jewish state; but, in the equity of it, it obliges us to shew mercy to those of whom we might take, and to be content to share with those we lend to, in loss, as well as profit, if Providence cross them; and, upon this condition, it seems as lawful to receive interest for my money, which another takes pains with, improves, and runs the hazard of, in husbandry. (2.) They must not take a poor man's bed-clothes in pawn; but, if they did, must restore them by bed-time, v. 26, 27. Those who lie soft and warm themselves, should consider the hard and cold lodging of many poor people, and not do any thing to make bad worse, or to add affliction to the afflicted.

2. A law against the contempt of authority; (v. 28.) Thou shalt not revile the gods, that is, the judges and magistrates, for their executing of these laws; they must do their duty, whoever suffer by it; magistrates ought not to fear the reproach of men, or their revilings, but to despise them as long as they keep a good conscience; but they that do revile them for their being a terror to evil works and workers, reflect upon God himself, and will have a great deal to answer for, another day. We find those under a black character, and a heavy doom, that despise dominion and speak evil of dignities, Jude, 8. Princes and magistrates are our fathers, whom the fifth commandment obliges us to honour, and forbids us to revile. St. Paul applies this law to himself, and owns that he ought not to speak evil of the ruler of his people; no, not though the ruler was then his most unrighteous persecutor, Acts, 23. 5. See Eccl. 10. 20.

3. A law concerning the offering of their first-fruits to God, v. 29, 30. It was appointed before, (ch. 13.) and it is here repeated; The first-born of thy sons shalt thou give unto me; and much more reason have we to give ourselves, and all we have, to God, who spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all. The first ripe of their corn they must not delay to offer; there is danger, if we delay our duty, lest we wholly omit it; and, by slipping the first opportunity, in expectation of another, we suffer Satan to cheat us of all our time. Let not young people delay to offer to God the first-fruits of their time and strength, lest their delays come, at last, to be denials, through the deceitfulness of sin, and the more convenient season they promise themselves, never arrive. Yet it is provided, that the firstlings of their cattle should not be dedicated to God till they were past seven days old, for then they began to be good for something. Note, God is the first and best, and therefore must have the first and best.

4. A distinction put between the Jews and all other people; Ye shall be holy men unto me; and one mark of that honourable distinction is appointed in their diet, which was, that they should not eat any flesh that was torn of beasts, (v. 31.) not only because it was unwholesome, but because it was paltry, and base, and covetous, and a thing below those who were holy men unto God, to eat the leavings of the beasts of prey. We, that are sanctified to God, must not be curious in our diet; but we must be conscientious, not feeding ourselves without fear, but eating and drinking by rule, the rule of sobriety, to the glory of God.

CHAP. XXIII.

This chapter continues and concludes the acts that passed in the first session (if I may so call it) upon mount Sinai. Here are, I. Some laws of universal obligation, relating especially to the ninth commandment, against bearing false witness, (v. 1.) and giving false judgment, v. 2, 3, 6, 8. Also a law of doing good to our enemies, (v. 4, 5.) and not oppressing strangers, v. 9. II. Some laws peculiar to the Jews. The sabbatical year, (v. 10, 11.) the three annual feasts, (v. 14, 17.) with some laws pertaining thereto. III. Gracious promises of the completing of the mercy God had begun for them, upon condition of their obedience. That God would conduct them through the wilderness, (v. 20, 24.) That he would prosper all they had, (v. 25, 26.) That he would put them in possession of Canaan, v. 27, 31. But they must not mingle themselves with the nations, v. 32, 33.

1. THOU shalt not raise a false report: put not thine hand with the wicked to be an unrighteous witness. 2. Thou shalt not follow a multitude to do evil; neither shalt thou speak in a cause to decline after many to wrest judgment: 3. Neither shalt thou countenance a poor man in his cause. 4. If thou meet thine enemy's ox or his ass going astray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again. 5. If thou see the ass of him that hateth thee lying under his burthen, and wouldest forbear to help him, thou shalt surely help with him. 6. Thou shalt not wrest the judgment of thy poor in his cause. 7. Keep thee far from a false matter; and the innocent and righteous slay thou not: for I will not justify the wicked. 8. And thou shalt take no gift: for the gift blindeth the wise, and perverteth the words of the righteous, 9. Also thou shalt not oppress a stranger; for ye know the heart of a stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt.

Here are,

I. Cautions concerning judicial proceedings; it was not enough that they had good laws, better than ever any nation had, but care must be taken for the due administration of justice according to those laws.

1. The witnesses are here cautioned, that they neither occasion an innocent man to be indicted, by raising a false report of him, and setting common fame against him, nor assist in the prosecution of an innocent man, or one whom they do not know to be guilty, by putting their hand in swearing, as witnesses against him, v. 1. Bearing false witness against a man, in a matter that touches his life, has in it all the guilt of lying, perjury, malice, theft, murder, with the additional stains of colouring all with a pretence of justice, and involving many others in the same guilt. There is scarcely any one act of wickedness that a man can possibly be guilty of, which has in it a greater complication of villainies than this has. Yet the former part of this caution is to be extended to common conversation, and not only to judicial proceedings; so that slandering and backbiting are a species of false-witness bearing; a man's reputation lies as much at the mercy of every company, as his estate or life does at the mercy of a judge or jury; so that he who raises, or knowingly spreads, a false report against his neighbour, especially if the report be made to wise and good men, whose esteem one would desire to enjoy, sins as much against the laws of truth, justice, and charity, as a false witness does—with this further mischief, that he leaves it not in the power of the person injured to right himself. That which we translate, Thou shalt not raise, the margin reads, Thou shalt not receive, a false report; for sometimes the receiver, in this case, is as bad as the thief; and a backbiting tongue would not do so much mischief as it does, if it were not countenanced. Sometimes we cannot avoid hearing a false report, & it we must not receive it, that is, we must not hear it with pleasure and delight, as those that rejoice in iniquity; nor give credit to it, as long as there remains any cause to question the truth of it. This is charity to our neighbour's good name, and doing as we would be done by.

2. The judges are here cautioned not to pervert judgment.

(1.) They must not be over-ruled, either by might or multitude, to go against their consciences in giving judgment, v. 2. With the Jews, causes were tried by a bench of Justices, and judgment given according to the majority of votes; in which case, every particular justice must go according to truth, as it appeared to him upon the strictest and most impartial inquiry, though the multitude of the people, and their outcries, or the sentence of the Rabbin, (we translate it many;) the more ancient and honourable of the justices, went the other way. Therefore (as with us) among the Jews, the junior upon the bench voted first, that he might not be swayed or over-ruled by the authority of the senior. Judges must not respect the persons either of the parties, or of their fellow-judges. The former part of this verse also gives a general rule for all, as well as judges, not to follow a multitude to do evil. General usage will never excuse us in a bad practice; nor is the broad way ever the better or safer, for its being tracked and crowded. We must inquire what we ought to do, not what the majority do; because we must be judged by our Master, not by our fellow-servants; and it is too great a compliment, to be willing to go to hell for company.

(2.) They must not pervert judgment, no, not in favour of a poor man, v. 3. Right must in all cases take place, and wrong must be punished, and justice never biassed, nor injury connived at, under pretence of charity and compassion. If a poor man be a bad man, and do a bad thing, it is foolish pity to let him fare the better for his poverty, Deut. 1. 16, 17.

(3.) Neither must they pervert judgment, in prejudice to a poor man, nor suffer him to be wronged, because he had not wherewithal to right himself; in such cases, the judges themselves must become advocates for the poor, as far as their cause was good and honest; v. 6. "Thou shalt not wrest the judgment of the poor; remember they are thy poor, bone of thy bone, thy poor neighbours, thy poor brethren, let them not, therefore, fare the worse for being poor."

(4.) They must dread the thoughts of assisting or abetting a bad cause; v. 7. "Keep thee far from a false matter; do not only keep thee free from it, nor think it enough to say, thou art unconcerned in it, but keep thee far from it, dread it as a dangerous snare. The innocent and righteous thou wouldest not, for all the world, slay with thine own hands; keep thee therefore from a false matter, for thou knowest not but it may end in that; and the righteous God will not leave such wickedness to go unpunished. I will not justify the wicked," that is, "I will condemn him that unjustly condemns others." Judges themselves are accountable to the Great Judge.

(5.) They must not take bribes, v. 8. They must not only not be swayed by a gift to give an unjust judgment, either to condemn the innocent, or acquit the guilty, or adjudge a man's right from him; but they must not so much as take a gift, lest it should have a bad influence upon them, and over-rule them, contrary to their intentions, for it has a strange tendency to blind those that otherwise would do well.

(6.) They must not oppress a stranger, v. 9. Though aliens might not inherit lands among them, yet they must have justice done them, must peaceably enjoy their own, and be righted if they were wronged, though they were strangers to the common-wealth of Israel. It is an instance of the equity and goodness of our law, that, if an alien be tried for any crime except treason, the one half of his jury, if he desire it, shall be foreigners; they call it a trial per medietatem lingue, a kind provision that strangers may not be oppressed. The reason here given is the same with that, (ch. 22. 21.) Ye were strangers; which is here elegantly enforced, Ye know the heart of a stranger; ye know something of the griefs and fears of a stranger, by sad experience, and therefore, being delivered, can the more easily put your souls into their souls' stead.

II. Commandments concerning neighbourly kindnesses; we must be ready to do all good offices, as there is occasion for anybody, yea, even for those who have done us ill offices, v. 4, 5. The command of loving our enemies, and doing good to them that hate us, is not only a new, but an old, commandment, Prov. 25. 21, 22. Infer from hence, 1. If we must do this kindness for an enemy, much more for a friend, though an enemy only is mentioned, because it is supposed that a man would not be unneighbourly to any, unless such as he has a particular spleen against. 2. If it be wrong not to prevent our enemy's loss and damage, how much worse is it to occasion harm and loss to him, or any thing he has. 3. If we must bring back our neighbours' cattle when they go astray, much more must we endeavour, by prudent admonitions and instructions, to bring back our neighbours themselves, when they go astray in any sinful path. See Jam. 5. 19. And if we must endeavour to help up a fallen ass, much more should we endeavour, by comforts and encouragements, to help up a sinking spirit, saying to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong. We must seek the relief and welfare of others as our own, Phil. 2. 4. If thou sayest, Behold, we know it not, doth not he that pondereth the heart consider it? See Prov. 24. 11, 12.

10. And six years thou shalt sow thy land, and shalt gather in the fruits thereof: 11. But the seventh year thou shalt let it rest and lie still; that the poor of thy people may eat: and what they leave the beasts of the field shall eat. In like manner thou shalt deal with thy vineyard, and with thy olive-yard. 12. Six days thou shalt do thy work, and on the seventh day thou shalt rest: that thine ox and thine ass may rest, and the son of thy handmaid, and the stranger, may be refreshed. 13. And in all things that I have said unto you be circumspect: and make no mention of the names of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth. 14. Three times thou shalt keep 2 feast unto me in the year. 15. Thou shalt keep the feast of unleavened bread: thou shalt eat unleavened bread seven days, as I commanded thee, in the time appointed of the month Abib; for in it thou camest out from Egypt: and none shall appear before me empty: 16. And the feast of harvest, the first-fruits of thy labours, which thou hast sown in the field: and the feast of ingathering, which is in the end of the year, when thou hast gathered in thy labours out of the field. 17. Three times in the year all thy males shall appear before the LORD God. 18. Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice with leavened bread; neither shall the fat of my sacrifice remain until the morning. 19. The first of the first-fruits of thy land thou shalt bring into the house of the LORD thy God. Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk.

Here i,

I. The institution of the sabbatical year, v. 10, 11. Every seventh year the land was to rest; they must not plough or sow it at the beginning of the year, and then they could not expect any great harvest at the end of the year; but what the earth did produce of itself should be eaten from hand to mouth, and not laid up. Now this was designed, 1. To shew what a plentiful land that was into which God was bringing them—that so numerous a people could have rich maintenance out of the produce of so small a country, without foreign trade, and yet could spare the increase of every seventh year. 2. To remind them of their dependance upon God their great Landlord, and their obligation to use the fruit of the land as he should direct. Thus he would try their obedience in a matter that nearly touched their interest. Afterward we find that their disobedience to this command was a forfeiture of the promises, 2 Chron. 36. 21. 3. To teach them a confidence in the Divine Providence, while they did their duty; that, as the sixth day's manna served for two days' meat, so the sixth year's increase should serve for two year's subsistence. Thus they must learn not to take thought for their life, Matth. 6. 25. If we are prudent and diligent in our affairs, we may trust Providence to furnish us with the bread of the day in its day.

II. The repetition of the law of the fourth commandment concerning the weekly sabbath, v. 12. Even in the year of rest, they must not think that the sabbath-day was laid in common with the other days, but, even that year, it must be religiously observed; yet thus some have endeavoured to take away the observation of the sabbath, by pretending that every day must be a sabbath-day.

III. All manner of respect to the gods of the heathen is here strictly forbidden, v. 13. A general caution is prefixed to this, which has reference to all these precepts; In all things that I have said unto you, be circumspect. We are in danger of missing our way on the right hand and on the left, and it is at our peril if we do, therefore we have need to look about us. A man may ruin himself through mere carelessness, but he cannot save himself without great care and circumspection: particularly, since idolatry was a sin which they were much addicted to, and would be greatly tempted to, they must endeavour to blot out the remembrance of the gods of the heathen, and must disuse and forget all their superstitious forms of speech, and never mention them but with detestation. In Christian schools and academies, (for it is in vain to think of reforming the play-houses,) it were to be wished that the names and stories of the heathen deities, or demons rather, were not so commonly and familiarly used as they are, even with intimations of respect, and sometimes with forms of invocation. Surely we have not so learned Christ.

IV. Their solemn religious attendance on God in the place which he should choose, is here strictly required, v. 14. 17. 1. Thrice a year, all their males must come together in a holy convocation, that they might the better know and love one another, and keep up their communion as a dignified and peculiar people. 2. They must come together before the Lord, (v. 17.) to present themselves before him, looking toward the place where his honour dwelt, and to pay their homage to him as their great Lord, and under whom they held all their enjoyments. 3. They must feast together before the Lord, eating and drinking together, in token of their joy in God, and their grateful sense of his goodness to them; for a feast is made for laughter, Ecc. 10. 19. Oh what a good Master do we serve, who has made it our duty to rejoice before him, who feasts his servants when they are in waiting? Never let religion be called a melancholy thing, when its solemn services are solemn feasts. 4. They must not appear before God empty, v. 15. Some free-will offering or other they must bring, in token of their respect and gratitude to their great Benefactor. As then they were not allowed to come empty-handed, so now we must not come to worship God empty-hearted; our souls must be filled with grace, with pious and devout affections; holy desires toward him, and dedications of ourselves to him; for with such sacrifices God is well-pleased. 5. The passover, pentecost, and feast of tabernacles, in spring, summer, and autumn, were the three times appointed for their attendance; not in the midst of their harvest, because then they were otherwise employed; so that they had no reason to say that he made them to serve with an offering, or wearied them with incense.

V. Some particular directions are here given about the three feasts, though not so fully as afterward. 1. As to the passover, it was not to be offered with leavened bread, for at that feast all leaven was to be cast out, nor was the fat of it to remain until the morning, lest it should become offensive, v. 18. 2. At the feast of pentecost, when they were to begin their harvest, they must bring the first of their first-fruits to God, by the pious presenting of which the whole harvest was sanctified, v. 19. 3. At the feast of ingathering, as it is called, (v. 16.) they must give God thanks for the harvest-mercies they had received, and must depend upon him for the next harvest, and must not think to receive benefit by that superstitious usage of some of the Gentiles, who, it is said, at the end of their harvest, seethed a kid in its own dam's milk, and sprinkled that milk-pottage, in a magical way, upon their gardens and fields, to make them more fruitful next year. But Israel must abhor such foolish customs.

20. Behold, I send an angel before thee, to keep thee in the way, and to bring thee into the place which I have prepared. 21. Beware of him, and obey his voice, provoke him not: for he will not pardon your transgressions: for my name is in him. 22. But if thou shalt indeed obey his voice, and do all that I speak; then I will be an enemy unto thine enemies, and an adversary unto thine adversaries. 23. For mine angel shall go before thee, and bring thee in unto the Amorites, and the Hittites, and the Perizzites, and the Canaanites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites: and I will cut them off. 24. Thou shalt not bow down to their gods, nor serve them, nor do after their works: but thou shalt utterly overthrow them, and quite break down their images. 25. And ye shall serve the LORD your God, and ye shall bless thy bread, and thy water; and I will take sickness away from the midst of thee. 26. There shall nothing cast their young, nor be barren, in thy land: the number of thy days I will fulfil. 27. I will send my fear before thee, and will destroy all the people to whom thou shalt come, and I will make all thine enemies turn their backs unto thee. 28. And I will send hornets before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite, from before thee. 29. I will not drive them out from before thee in one year; lest the land become desolate, and the beast of the field multiply against thee. 30. By little and little I will drive them out from before thee, until thou be increased, and inherit the land. 31. And I will set thy bounds from the Red sea even unto the sea of the Philistines, and from the desert unto the river: for I will deliver the inhabitants of the land into your hand; and thou shalt drive them out before thee. 32. Thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor with their gods. 33. They shall not dwell in thy land, lest they make thee sin against me: for if thou serve their gods, it will surely be a snare unto thee.

Three gracious promises are here made to Israel, to engage them to their duty, and encourage them in it; and each of the promises has some needful precepts and cautions joined to it.

I. It is here promised that they should be guided and kept in their way through the wilderness to the land of promise, Behold, I send an Angel before thee, (v. 20.) mine Angel, (v. 23.) a created angel, say some, a minister of God's providence, employed in conducting and protecting the camp of Israel; that it might appear that God took a particular care of them, he appointed one of his chief servants to make it his business to attend them, and see that they wanted for nothing. Others suppose it to be the Son of God, the Angel of the covenant: for the Israelites in the wilderness are said to tempt Christ; and we may as well suppose him God's Messenger, and the Church's Redeemer, before his incarnation, as the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world. And we may the rather think he was pleased to undertake the deliverance and conduct of Israel, because they were typical of his great undertaking. It is promised that this blessed Angel should keep them in the way, though it lay through a wilderness first, and afterward through their enemies' country; thus God's spiritual Israel shall be kept through the wilderness of this earth, and from the insults of the gates of hell. It is also promised that he should bring them into the place which God had not only designed, but prepared for them: and thus Christ has prepared a place for his followers, and will preserve them to it, for he is faithful to him that appointed him.

The precept joined with this promise, is, that they be observant of, and obedient to, this Angel whom God would send before them; (v. 21.) "Beware of him, and obey his voice in every thing, provoke him not in any thing, for it is at your peril if you do, he will visit your iniquity." Note, 1. Christ is the Author of salvation to those only that obey him. The word of command is, Hear ye him, Matth. 17. 5. Observe what he hath commanded. Matth. 26, 20. 2. Our necessary dependence upon the divine power and goodness should awe us into obedience. We do well to take heed of provoking our Protector and Benefactor; because, if our Defence depart from us, and the streams of his goodness be cut off, we are undone. Therefore, "Beware of him, and carry it toward him with all possible reverence and caution. Fear the Lord, and his goodness." 3. Christ will be faithful to those who are faithful to him, and will espouse their cause who adhere to his; (v. 22.) I will be an Adversary to thine adversaries. The league shall be offensive and defensive, like that with Abraham, I will bless him that blesseth thee, and curse him that curseth thee. Thus is God pleased to twist his interests and friendships with his people's.

It is promised that they should have a comfortable settlement in the land of Canaan, which they hoped now, (though it proved otherwise,) within a few months, to be in the possession of, v. 24. . 26. Observe, 1. How reasonable the conditions of this promise are—only that they should serve their own God, who was indeed the only true God, and not the gods of the nations, which were no gods at all, and which they had no reason at all to have any respect for. They must not only not worship their gods, but they must utterly overthrow them, in token of their great abhorrence of idolatry, their resolution never to worship idols themselves, and their care to prevent any other from worshipping them; as the converted conjurers burnt their books, Acts, 19. 19. 2. How rich the particulars of this promise are. (1.) The comfort of their food; He shall bless thy bread and thy water; and God's blessing will make bread and water more refreshing and nourishing than a feast of fat things and wines on the lees, without that blessing. (2.) The continuance of their health; I will take sickness away, either prevent it, or remove it. The land shall not be visited with epidemical diseases, which are very dreadful, and sometimes have laid countries waste. (3.) The increase of their wealth; their cattle should not be barren, nor cast their young; which is mentioned as an instance of prosperity, Job, 21. 10. (4.) The prolonging of their lives to old age; "The number of thy days I will fulfil, and they shall not be cut off in the midst by untimely deaths." Thus hath godliness the promise of the life that now is.

III. It is promised that they should conquer and subdue their enemies, the present occupants of the land of Canaan, who must be driven out to make room for them. This God would do, 1. Effectually by his power; (v. 27, 28.) not so much by the sword and bow of Israel, as by the terrors which he would strike into the Canaanites. Though they were so obstinate as not to be willing to submit to Israel, resign their country, and retire elsewhere, which they might have done; yet they were so dispirited, that they were not able to stand before them. This completed their ruin; such power had the Devil in them, that they would resist; but such power had God over them, that they could not. I will send my fear before thee; and they that fear will soon flee. Hosts of hornets made way for the hosts of Israel; such mean creatures can God make use of for the chastising of his people's enemies; as in the plagues of Egypt. When God pleases, hornets can drive out Canaanites as well as lions could, Josh. 24. 12. 2. He would do it gradually, in wisdom, (v. 29, 30.) not all at once, but by little and little. As the Canaanites had kept possession till Israel was grown into a people, so there should still be some remains of them, till Israel should grow so numerous as to replenish the whole. Note, The wisdom of God is to be observed in the gradual advances of the church's interests. It is in real kindness to the church, that its enemies are subdued by little and little, for thus we are kept upon our guard, and in a continual dependence upon God. Corruptions are thus driven out of the hearts of God's people: not all at once, but by little and little; the old man is crucified, and therefore dies slowly. God, in his providence, often delays mercy, because we are not ready for it. Canaan has room enough to receive Israel, but Israel is not numerous enough to occupy Canaan; we are not straitened in God; if we are straitened, it is in ourselves. The land of Canaan is promised them, (v. 31.) in its utmost extent, which yet they were not possessed of till the days of David; and by their sins they soon lost possession.

The precept annexed to this promise, is, that they should not make any friendship, nor have any familiarity, with idolaters, v. 32, 33. Idolaters must not so much as sojourn in their land, unless they renounced their idolatry. Thus they must avoid the reproach of intimacy with the worshippers of false gods, and the danger of being drawn to worship with them. By familiar converse with idolaters, their dread and detestation of the sin would wear off; they would think it no harm, in compliment to their friends, to pay some respect to their gods, and so by degrees would be drawn into the fatal snare. Note, Those that would be kept from bad courses must keep from bad company; it is dangerous living in a bad neighbourhood; others' sins will be our snares, if we look not well to ourselves. We must always look upon our greatest danger to be from those that would make us sin against God. Whatever friendship is pretended, that is really our worst enemy that draws us from our duty.

CHAP. XXIV.

Moses, as mediator between God and Israel, having received divers laws and ordinances from God privately, in the three foregoing chapters, in this chapter, I. Comes down to the people, acquaints them with the laws he had received, and takes their consent to those laws, (v. 3.) writes the laws, and reads them to the people, who repeat their contents, (v. 4. .7.) and then, by sacrifice, and the sprinkling of blood, ratifies the covenant between them and God, v. 5, 6, 8. II. He returns to God again, to receive further directions. When he was dismissed from his former attendance, he was ordered to attend again, v. 1, 2. He did so with seventy of the elders, to whom God made a discovery of his glory, v. 9. .11. Moses is ordered up into the mount, (v. 12, 13.) the rest are ordered down to the people, v. 14. The cloud of glory is seen by all the people on the top of mount Sinai, (v. 15. .17.) and Moses is there with God forty days, and forty nights, v. 18.

1. AND he said unto Moses, Come up unto the LORD, thou, and Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel; and worship ye afar off. 2. And Moses alone shall come near the LORD: but they shall not come nigh; neither shall the people go up with him. 3. And Moses came and told the people all the words of the LORD, and all the judgments: and all the people answered with one voice, and said, All the words which the LORD hath said will we do. 4. And Moses wrote all the words of the LORD, and rose up early in the morning, and builded an altar under the hill, and twelve pillars, according to the twelve tribes of Israel. 5. And he sent young men of the children of Israel, which offered burnt-offerings, and sacrificed peace-offerings of oxen unto the LORD. 6. And Moses took half of the blood, and put it in basins; and half of the blood he sprinkled on the altar. 7. And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they said, All that the LORD hath said will we do, and be obedient. 8. And Moses took the blood, and sprinkled it on the people, and said, Behold the blood of the covenant, which the LORD hath made with you concerning all these words.

The two first verses are the appointment of a second session upon mount Sinai, for the making of laws, when an end was put to the first. When a communion is begun between God and us, it shall never fail on his side, if it do not first fail on our's. Moses is directed to bring Aaron and his sons, and the seventy elders of Israel, that they might be witnesses of the glory of God, and that communion with him to which Moses was admitted; and that their testimony might confirm the people's faith. In this approach, 1. They must all be very reverent; Worship ye afar off, v. 1. Before they came near, they must worship. Thus we must enter into God's gates with humble and solemn adorations, draw near, as those that know our distance, and admire the condescensions of God's grace in admitting us to draw near. Are great princes approached with the profound reverences of the body? And shall not the soul that draws near to God be bowed before him? 2. They must none of them come so near as Moses, v. 2. They must come up to the Lord, (and those that would approach to God ascend;) but Moses alone must come near; therein a type of Christ, who, as the High Priest, entered alone into the most holy place.

In the following verses, we have the solemn covenant made between God and Israel, and the exchanging of the ratifications; and a very solemn transaction it was, typifying the covenant of grace between God and believers, through Christ.

1. Moses told the people the words of the Lord, v. 3. He did not lead them blindfold into the covenant, nor teach them a devotion that was the daughter of ignorance; but laid before them all the precepts, general and particular, in the foregoing chapters; and fairly put it to them, Whether they were willing to submit to these laws or no?

II. The people unanimously consented to the terms proposed, without reservation or exception; All the words which the Lord hath said will we do. They had before consented in general to be under God's government; (ch. 19. 8.) here they consent in particular to these laws now given. Oh that there had been such a heart in them! How well were it if people would but be always in the same good mind that sometimes they seem to be in! Many consent to the law, and yet do not live up to it; they have nothing to except against it, and yet will not persuade themselves to be ruled by it.

This is the tenor of the covenant, "That, if they would observe the foregoing precepts, God would perform the foregoing promises. "Obey, and be happy." Here is the bargain made. Observe,

1. How it was engrossed in the book of the covenant; Moses wrote the words of the Lord, (v. 4.) that there might be no mistake; probably, he had written them as God dictated them on the mount. As soon as ever God had separated to himself a peculiar people in the world, he governed them by a written word, as he has done ever since, and will do while the world stands, and the church in it. Moses, having engrossed the articles of agreement concluded upon between God and Israel, read them in the audience of the people, (v. 7.) that they might be perfectly apprized of the thing, and might try whether their second thoughts were the same with their first, upon the whole matter. And we may suppose they were so; for their words (v. 7.) are the same with what they were, (v. 3.) but something stronger; All that the Lord hath said (be it good, or be it evil, to flesh and blood, Jer. 42. 6.) we will do; so they had said before, but now they add, "And will be obedient; not only we will do what has been commanded, but in every thing which shall further be ordained we will be obedient." Bravely resolved! if they had but stuck to their resolution. See here, That God's covenants and commands are so uncontestably equitable in themselves, and so highly advantageous to us, that the more we think of them, and the more plainly and fully they are set before us, the more reason we shall see to comply with them.

2. How it was sealed by the blood of the covenant, that Israel might receive strong consolations from the ratifying of God's promises to them, and might lie under strong obligations from the ratifying of their promises to God. Thus has Infinite Wisdom devised means that we may be confirmed both in our faith and in our obedience; may be both encouraged in our duty, and engaged to it. The covenant must be made by sacrifice, (Ps. 50. 5.) because, since man has sinned, and forfeited his Creator's favour, there can be no fellowship by covenant, till there be first friendship and atonement by sacrifice.

(1.) In preparation, therefore, for the parties interchangeably putting their seals to this covenant, [1.] Moses builds an altar, to the honour of God, which was principally intended in all the altars that were built, and which was the first thing to be looked at in the covenant they were now to seal. No addition to the perfections of the divine nature can be made by any of God's dealings with the children of men, but in them his perfections are manifested and magnified, and his honour shewed forth; therefore he will now be represented by an altar, to signify, that all he expected from them, was, that they should do him honour, and that, being his people, they should be to him for a name and a praise. [2.] He erects twelve pillars, according to the number of the tribes; these were to represent the people, the other party to the covenant; and we may suppose that they were set up over against the altar, and that Moses, as mediator, passed to and fro between them. Probably, each tribe set up and knew its own pillar, and their elders stood by it. [3.] He appointed sacrifices to be offered upon the altar, (v.5.) burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, which yet were designed to be expiatory. We are not concerned to inquire who these young men were that were employed in offering these sacrifices; for Moses was himself the priest, and what they did, was purely as his servants, by his order and appointment. No doubt, they were men who by their bodily strength were qualified for the service, and by their station among the people were fittest for the honour.

(2.) Preparation being thus made, their ratifications were very solemnly exchanged. [1.] The blood of the sacrifice which the people offered was (part of it) sprinkled upon the altar, (v.6.) which signifies the people's dedicating of themselves, their lives, and beings, to God, and to his honour. In the blood (which is the life) of the dead sacrifices, all the Israelites were presented unto God as living sacrifices, Rom. 12. 1. [2.] The blood of the sacrifice which God had owned and accepted was (the remainder of it) sprinkled either upon the people themselves, (v.8.) or upon the pillars that represented them; which signified God's gracious conferring of his favour upon them, and all the fruits of that favour, and his giving them all the gifts they could expect or desire from a God reconciled to them, and in covenant with them by sacrifice. This part of the ceremony was thus explained, "Behold the blood of the covenant; see here how God has sealed to you to be a God, and you seal to him to be to him a people; his promises to you, and your's to him, are both yea, and amen."

Thus our Lord Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant, (of whom Moses was a type,) having offered up himself a sacrifice upon the cross, that his blood might be indeed the blood of the covenant, sprinkled it upon the altar in his intercession, (Heb. 9. 12.) and sprinkles it upon his church by his word and ordinances, and the influences and operations of the Spirit of promise, by whom we are sealed. He himself seemed to allude to this solemnity, when, in the institution of the Lord's supper, he said, This cup is the New Testament, (or Covenant,) in my blood. Compare with this, Heb. 9. 19, 20.

9. Then went up Moses, and Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel: 10. And they saw the God of Israel: and there was under his feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the body of heaven in his clearness. 11. And upon the nobles of the children of Israel he laid not his hand: also they saw God, and did eat and drink.

The people having, beside their submission to the ceremony of the sprinkling of blood, declared their well-pleas'dness in their God and his law, again and again, God here gives to their representatives some special tokens of his favour to them; for God meets him that rejoices and works righteousness, and admits them nearer to him than they could have expected. Thus, in the New-Testament church, we find the four living creatures, and the four and twenty elders, honoured with places round the throne, being redeemed unto God, by the blood of the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne, Rev. 4. 4, 6.—5. 3, 9. Observe,

1. They saw the God of Israel, (v.10.) that is, they had some glimpse of his glory, in light and fire, though they saw no manner of similitude, and his being no man hath seen or can see,

1 Tim. 6. 16. They saw the place where the God of Israel stood, (so the LXX.) something that came near a similitude, but was not; whatever they saw, it was certainly something of which no image or picture could be made, and yet enough to satisfy them that God was with them of a truth.

Nothing is described but that which was under his feet: for our conceptions of God are all below him, and fall infinitely short of being adequate. They saw not so much as God's feet, but at the bottom of the brightness they saw (such as they never saw before or after, and, as the footstool or pedestal of it) a most rich and splendid pavement, as it had been of sapphires, azure, or sky-coloured. The heavens themselves are the pavement of God's palace, and his throne is above the firmament. See how much better Wisdom is than the precious onyx or the sapphires, for Wisdom was, from eternity, God's delight, (Prov. 8. 30.) and lay in his bosom, but the sapphires are the pavement under his feet; there let us put all the wealth of this world, and not in our hearts.

2. Upon the nobles, or elders, of Israel, he laid not his hand, v. 11. Though they were men, the dazzling splendour of his glory did not overwhelm them; but it was so moderated, (Job, 26. 9.) and they were so strengthened, (Dan. 10. 19.) that they were able to bear it. Nay, though they were sinful men, and obnoxious to God's justice, yet he did not lay his punishing avenging hand upon them, as they feared he would. When we consider what a consuming fire God is, and what stubble we are before him, we shall have reason to say, in all our approaches to him, It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed.

3. They saw God, and did eat and drink; they had not only their lives preserved, but their vigour, courage, and comfort; it cast no damp upon their joy, but rather increased and elevated it. They feasted upon the sacrifice, before God, in token of their cheerful consent to the covenant now made, their grateful acceptance of the benefits of it, and their communion with God in pursuance of that covenant. Thus believers eat and drink with Christ at his table, Luke, 22. 30. Blessed are they that shall eat bread in the kingdom of our Father, and drink of the new wine there.

12. And the LORD said unto Moses, Come up to me into the mount, and be there: and I will give thee tables of stone, and a law, and commandments which I have written; that thou mayest teach them. 13. And Moses rose up, and his minister Joshua: and Moses went up into the mount of God. 14. And he said unto the elders, Tarry ye here for us, until we come again unto you: and, behold, Aaron and Hur are with you: if any man have any matters to do, let him come unto them. 15. And Moses went up into the mount, and a cloud covered the mount. 16. And the glory of the LORD abode upon mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it six days: and the seventh day he called unto Moses out of the midst of the cloud. 17. And the sight of the glory of the LORD was like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the eyes of the children of Israel. 18. And Moses went into the midst of the cloud, and gat him up into the mount: and Moses was in the mount forty days and forty nights.

The public ceremony of sealing the covenant being over, Moses is called up to receive further instructions, which we have in the following chapters.

I. He is called up into the mount, and there he remained ^s days at some distance. Orders are given him, (v. 12.) Come up to the mount, and be there, that is, "Expect to continue there .9

some considerable time." Those that would have communion with God must not only come to ordinances, but they must abide by them. Blessed are they that dwell in his house, not that merely call there; "Come up, and I will give thee a law, that thou mayest teach them." Moses taught them nothing but what he had received from the Lord, and he received nothing from the Lord but what he taught them; for he was faithful both to God and Israel, and did neither add nor diminish, but kept close to his instructions.

Having received these orders, 1. He appointed Aaron and Hur to be as lords justices in his absence, to keep the peace and good order in the congregation, v. 14. The care of his government he would leave behind him when he went up into the mount, that he might not have that to distract his mind; and yet he would not leave the people as sheep having no shepherd, no, not for a few days. Good princes find their government a constant care, and their people find it a constant blessing. 2. He took Joshua up with him into the mount, v. 13. Joshua was his minister, and it would be a satisfaction to him to have him with him as a companion, during the six days that he tarried in the mount, before God called to him. Joshua was to be his successor, and therefore thus he was honoured before the people, above the rest of the elders, that they might afterward the more readily take him for their governor; and thus he was prepared for service, by being trained up in communion with God. Joshua was a type of Christ, and (as the learned Bishop Pearson well observes) Moses takes him with him into the mount, because, without Jesus, in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, there is no looking into the secrets of Heaven, nor approaching the glorious presence of God. 3. A cloud covered the mount six days; a visible token of God's special presence there, for he so shews himself to us, as, at the same time, to conceal himself from us. He lets us know so much as to assure us of his presence, power, and grace, but intimates to us that we cannot find him out to perfection. During these six days, Moses staid waiting upon the mountain for a call into the presence-chamber, v. 15, 16. God thus tried the patience of Moses, and his obedience to that command, (v. 12.) Be there. If Moses had been tired before the seventh day, (as Saul, 1 Sam. 13. 8, 9.) and had said, What should I wait for the Lord any longer, he had lost the honour of entering into the cloud; but communion with God is worth waiting for. And it is fit we should address ourselves to solemn ordinances with a solemn pause, taking time to compose ourselves, Ps. 108. 1.

II. He is called up into the cloud, on the seventh day, probably on the sabbath-day, v. 16. Now the thick cloud opened in the sight of all Israel, and the glory of the Lord brake forth like devouring fire, v. 17. God, even our God, is a consuming fire, and so he was pleased to manifest himself in the giving of the law; that, knowing the terrors of the Lord, we may be persuaded to obey, and may by them be prepared for the comforts of the gospel, and that the grace and truth which come by Jesus Christ may be the more acceptable.

Now, 1. The entrance of Moses into the cloud was very wonderful; Moses went into the midst of the cloud, v. 18. It was an extraordinary presence of mind, which the grace of God furnished him with by six days' preparation, else he durst not have ventured into the cloud, especially when it brake out in devouring fire. Moses was sure that he who called him would protect him; and even those glorious attributes of God, which are most terrible to the wicked, the saints with a humble reverence rejoice in. He that walks righteously, and speaks uprightly, is able to dwell even with this devouring fire, as we are told, Isa. 33. 14, 15. There are persons and works that will abide the fire, 1 Cor. 3. 12, &c. and some that will have confidence before God.

2. His continuance in the cloud was no less wonderful; he was there forty days and forty nights. It should seem, the six days (v. 16.) were not part of the forty; for, during those six days, Joshua was with Moses, who did eat of the manna, and drink of the brook, mentioned, Dent. 9. 21. and, while they were together, it is probable that Moses did eat and drink with him; but when Moses was called into the midst of the cloud, he left Joshua with out, who continued to eat and drink daily while he waited for Moses's return, but from thenceforward Moses fasted. Doubtless, God could have said what he had now to say to Moses, in one day, but, for the greater solemnity of the thing, he kept him with him in the mount forty days and forty nights. We are hereby taught to spend much time in communion with God, and to think that time best spent which is so spent. They that would get the knowledge of God's will must meditate thereon day and night.

CHAP. XXV.

At this chapter begins an account of the orders and instructions God gave to Moses upon the mount, for the erecting and furnishing of a tabernacle to the honour of God. We have here, I. Orders given for a collection to be made among the people for this purpose, v. 1..9. II. Particular instructions, 1. Concerning the ark of the covenant, v. 10..22. 2. The table of shew-bread, v. 23..30. 3. The golden candlestick, v. 31..40.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, that they bring me an offering: of every man that giveth it willingly with his heart ye shall take my offering. 3. And this is the offering which ye shall take of them; gold, and silver, and brass. 4. And blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats hair, 5. And rams' skins dyed red, and badgers' skins, and shittim-wood, 6. Oil for the light, spices for anointing oil, and for sweet incense, 7. Onyx stones, and stones to be set in the ephod, and in the breast-plate. 8. And let them make me a sanctuary; that I may dwell amongst them. 9. According to all that I shew thee, after the pattern of the tabernacle, and the pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it.

We may suppose that when Moses went into the midst of the cloud and abode there so long, where the holy angels attended the Shechinah, or Divine Majesty, he saw and heard very glorious things relating to the upper world, but they were things which it was not lawful or possible to utter; and therefore, in the records he kept of the transactions there, he said nothing to satisfy the curiosity of those who would intrude into the things which they have not seen, but writes that only which he was to speak to the children of Israel. For the scripture is designed to direct us in our duty, not to fill our heads with speculations, or to please our fancies.

In these verses, God tells Moses his intention, in general, that the children of Israel should build him a sanctuary, for he designed to dwell among them; (v. 8.) and some think that, though there were altars and groves used for religious worship, before this, yet there never was any house, or temple, built for sacred uses in any nation, before this tabernacle was erected by Moses; and that all the temples which were afterward so much celebrated among the heathen took rise from this, and pattern by it. God had chosen the people of Israel to be a peculiar people to himself, (above all people,) among whom divine revelation, and a religion according to it, should be lodged and established: he himself would be their King. As their King, he had already given them laws for the government of themselves, and their dealings one with another, with some general rules for religious worship, according to the light of reason and the law of nature, in the ten commandments, and the following comments upon them. But this was not thought sufficient to distinguish them from other nations, or to answer to the extent of that covenant which God would make with them to be their God, and therefore he orders a royal palace to be set up among them for himself, here called a sanctuary, or holy place, or habitation.

of which it is said, (Jer. 17. 12.) A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary. This sanctuary is to be considered, 1. As ceremonial; consonant to the other institutions of that dispensation, which consisted in carnal ordinances; (Heb. 9. 10.) hence it is called a worldly sanctuary, Heb. 9. 1. God in it kept his court as Israel's King. (1.) There he manifested his presence among them, and it was intended for a sign or token of his presence, that, while they had that in the midst of them, they might never again ask, Is the Lord among us or not? And because in the wilderness they dwelt in tents, even this royal palace was ordered to be a tabernacle too, that it might move with them, and might be an instance of the condescension of the divine favour. (2.) There he ordered his subjects to attend him with their homage and tribute. Thither they must come to consult his oracles, thither they must bring their sacrifices, and there all Israel must meet, to pay their joint respects to the God of Israel. 2. As typical; the holy places made with hands were the figures of the true, Heb. 9. 24. The gospel-church is the true tabernacle which the Lord hath pitched, and not man, Heb. 8. 2. The body of Christ, in and by which he made atonement, was the greater and more perfect tabernacle, Heb. 9. 11. The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, as in a tabernacle.

Now, when Moses was to erect this palace, it was requisite that he should first be instructed where he must have the materials, and where he must have the model; for he could neither contrive it by his own ingenuity, nor build it at his own charge, he is therefore directed here concerning both.

I. The people must furnish him with the materials, not by a tax imposed upon them, but by a voluntary contribution. This is the first thing concerning which orders are here given; (v. 2.) Speak unto the children of Israel, that they bring me an offering; and there was all the reason in the world that they should, for, 1. It was God himself that had not only enlarged them, but enriched them with the spoils of the Egyptians; he had instructed them to borrow, and he had inclined the Egyptians to lend, so that from him they had their wealth, and therefore it was fit they should devote it to him, and use it for him, and thus make a grateful acknowledgment of the favours they had received. Note, (1.) The best use we can make of our worldly wealth is, to honour God with it in works of piety and charity. (2.) When we have been blessed with some remarkable success in our affairs, and have had, as we say, a good turn, it may be justly expected that we should do something more than ordinary for the glory of God, consecrating our gain, in some reasonable proportion of it, to the Lord of the whole earth, Mic. 4. 13. 2. The sanctuary that was to be built was intended for their benefit and comfort, and therefore they must be at the expense of it. They had been unworthy of the privilege if they had grudged at the charge. They might well afford to offer liberally for the honour of God, while they lived at free quarters, having food for themselves and their families rained upon them daily from heaven. We also must own that we have our all from God's bounty, and therefore ought to use all for his glory. Since we live upon him, we must live to him.

This offering must be given willingly, and with the heart, that is, (1.) It was not prescribed to them what or how much they must give, but it was left to their generosity, that they might shew their good-will to the house of God and the offices thereof, and might do it with a holy emulation, the zeal of a few provoking many, 2 Cor. 9. 2. We should ask not only, "What must we do?" but, "What may we do for God?" (2.) Whatever they gave they must give it cheerfully, not grudgingly and with reluctance, for God loves a cheerful giver, 2 Cor. 9. 7. What is laid out in the service of God we must reckon well bestowed.

The particulars are here mentioned which they must offer; (v. 3. . 7.) all of them things that there would be occasion for in the tabernacle, or the service of it. Some observe that here was gold, silver, and brass, provided, but no iron; that is the military metal, and this was to be a house of peace. Every thing that was provided was very rich and fine, and the best of the sort; for God, who is the best, should have the best.

II. God himself would furnish him with the model; (v. 9.) According to all that I shew thee. God shewed him an exact plan of it in miniature, which he must conform to in all points. Thus Ezekiel saw in vision the form of the house and the fashion thereof, Ezek. 43. 11. Note, Whatsoever is done in God's service must be done by his direction, and not otherwise. Yet God did not only shew him the model, but gave him also directions how to frame the tabernacle, according to that model, in all the parts of it, which he goes over distinctly in this and the following chapters. When Moses, in the beginning of Genesis, was to describe the creation of the world, though it is such a stately and curious fabric, and made up of such a variety and vast number of particulars, yet he gave a very short and general account of it, and nothing compared with what the wisdom of this world would have desired and expected from one that wrote by divine revelation; but when he comes to describe the tabernacle, he does it with the greatest niceness and accuracy imaginable. He that gave us no account of the lines and circles of the globe, the diameter of the earth, or the height and magnitude of the stars, has told us particularly the measure of every board and curtain of the tabernacle; for God's church and instituted religion are more precious to him and more considerable than all the rest of the world. And the scriptures were written, not to describe to us the works of nature, a general view of which is sufficient to lead us to the knowledge and service of the Creator, but to acquaint us with the methods of grace, and those things which are purely matters of divine revelation. The blessedness of the future state is more fully represented under the notion of a new Jerusalem than under the notion of new heavens and a new earth.

10. And they shall make an ark of shittim wood: two cubits and a half shall be the length thereof, and a cubit and a half the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof. 11. And thou shalt overlay it with pure gold, within and without shalt thou overlay it, and shalt make upon it a crown of gold round about. 12. And thou shalt cast four rings of gold for it, and put them in the four corners thereof; and two rings shall be in the one side of it, and two rings in the other side of it. 13. And thou shalt make staves of shittim wood, and overlay them with gold. 14. And thou shalt put the staves into the rings by the sides of the ark, that the ark may be borne with them. 15. The staves shall be in the rings of the ark: they shall not be taken from it. 16. And thou shalt put into the ark the testimony which I shall give thee. 17. And thou shalt make a mercy-seat of pure gold: two cubits and a half shall be the length thereof, and a cubit and a half the breadth thereof. 18. And thou shalt make two cherubims of gold; of beaten work shalt thou make them, in the two ends of the mercy-seat. 19. And make one cherub on the one end, and the other cherub on the other end: even of the mercy-seat shall ye make the cherubims on the two ends thereof. 20. And the cherubims shall stretch forth their wings on high, covering the mercy-seat with their wings, and their faces shall look one to another; toward the mercy-seat shall the faces of the cherubims be. 21. And thou shalt put the mercy-seat above upon the ark; and in the ark thou shalt put the testimony that I shall give thee. 22. And there I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy-seat, from between the two cherubims which are upon the ark of the testimony, of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Israel.

The first thing which is here ordered to be made, is, the ark with its appurtenances, the furniture of the most holy place, and the special token of God's presence; the tabernacle was erected to be the receptacle of that.

I. The ark itself was a chest or coffer, in which the two tables of the law, written with the finger of God, were to be honourably deposited, and carefully kept. The dimensions of it are exactly ordered; if the Jewish cubit was, as some learned men compute, three inches longer than our half-yard, (twenty-one inches in all,) the chest or cabinet was about fifty-two inches long, thirty-one broad, and thirty-one deep. It was overlaid within and without with thin plates of gold. It had a crown, or cornice, of gold, round it, with rings and staves to carry it with; and in it he must put the testimony, v. 10. 16. The tables of the law are called the testimony, because God did in them testify his will: his giving them that law was in token of his favour to them; and their acceptance of it was in token of their subjection and obedience to him. This law was a testimony to them, to direct them in their duty, and would be a testimony against them, if they transgressed. The ark is called the ark of the testimony, (ch. 30. 6.) and the tabernacle, the tabernacle of the testimony, (Numb. 10. 11.) or witness, Matth. 24. 14. It is observable, 1. That the tables of the law were carefully preserved in an ark for the purpose; to teach us to make much of the word of God, and to hide it in our hearts, in our innermost thoughts, as the ark was placed in the holy of holies. It intimates likewise the care which Divine Providence ever did, and ever will, take, to preserve the records of divine revelation in the church, so that even in the latter days there shall be seen in his temple the ark of his testament. See Rev. 11. 19. 2. That this ark was the chief token of God's presence; which teaches us that the first and great evidence and assurance of God's favour is, the putting of his law in the heart. God dwells where that rules, Heb. 8. 10. 3. That provision was made for the carrying of this ark about with them in all their removes; which intimates to us, that, wherever we go, we should take our religion along with us, always hearing about with us the love of the Lord Jesus and his law.

II. The mercy-seat was the covering of the ark or chest, made of solid gold, exactly to fit the dimensions of the ark, v. 17, 21. This propitiatory covering, as it might well be translated, was a type of Christ, the great Propitiation, whose satisfaction fully answers the demands of the law, covers our transgressions, and comes between us and the curse we deserve. Thus he is the end of the law for righteousness.

III. The cherubims of gold were fixed to the mercy-seat, and of a piece with it, and spread their wings over it, v. 18. It is supposed that these cherubims were designed to represent the holy angels, who always attended the Shechinah, or Divine Majesty, particularly at the giving of the law; not by any effigies of an angel, but some emblem of the angelical nature; probably some one of those four faces spoken of Ezek. 1. 10. Whatever the faces were, they looked one towards another, and both downward toward the ark, while their wings were stretched out so as to touch one another. The apostle calls them Cherubims of glory shadowing the mercy-seat, Heb. 9. 5. It denotes their attendance upon the Redeemer, to whom they were ministering spirits, their readiness to do his will, their special presence in the assemblies of saints, (Ps. 68. 17. 1 Cor. 11. 10.) and their desire to look into the mysteries of the gospel, which they diligently contemplate. 1 Pet. 1. 12. God is said to dwell, or sit, between the cherubims on the mercy-seat, (Ps. 80. 1.) and from thence he here promises for the future, to meet with Moses, and to commune with him, v. 22. There he would give law, and there he would give audience, as a prince on his throne; and thus he manifests himself willing to be reconciled to us, and keep up communion with us, in and by the mediation of Christ. In allusion to this mercy-seat, we are said to come boldly to the throne of grace, (Heb. 4. 16.) for we are not under the law, that is covered, but under grace, that is displayed; its wings are stretched out, and we are invited to come under the shadow of them, Rev. 2. 12

23. Thou shalt also make a table of shittim wood: two cubits shall be the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof. 24. And thou shalt overlay it with pure gold, and make thereto a crown of gold round about. 25. And thou shalt make unto it a border of an hand breadth round about, and thou shalt make a golden crown to the border thereof round about. 26. And thou shalt make for it four rings of gold, and put the rings in the four corners that are on the four feet thereof. 27. Over against the border shall the rings be for places of the staves to bear the table. 28. And thou shalt make the staves of shittim wood, and overlay them with gold, that the table may be borne with them. 29. And thou shalt make the dishes thereof, and spoons thereof, and covers thereof, and bowls thereof, to cover withal: of pure gold shalt thou make them. 30. And thou shalt set upon the table shew bread before me alway.

1. A table ordered to be made of wood overlaid with gold, which was to stand, not in the holy of holies, (nothing was in that but the ark with its appurtenances,) but in the outer part of the tabernacle, called the sanctuary, or holy place, Heb. 9. 2. v. 23 &c. There must also be the usual furniture of the sideboard, dishes and spoons, &c. and all of gold, v. 29.

2. This table was to be always spread, and furnished with the shew-bread, (v. 30.) or bread of faces, twelve loaves, one for each tribe, set in two rows, six in a row: see the law concerning them, Lev. 24. 5, &c. The tabernacle being God's house, in which he was pleased to say that he would dwell among them, he would shew that he kept a good house. In the royal palace it was fit that there should be a royal table. Some make the twelve loaves to represent the twelve tribes, set before God as his people, and the corn of his floor, as they are called, Isa. 21. 10. As the ark signified God's being present with them, so the twelve loaves signified their being presented to God. This bread was designed to be, (1.) A thankful acknowledgment of God's goodness to them, in giving them their daily bread, manna in the wilderness, where he prepared a table for them, and, in Canaan, the corn of the land. Hereby they owned their dependence upon Providence, not only for the corn in the field, which they gave thanks for in offering the sheaf of first-fruits, but for the bread in their houses, that, when it was brought home, God did not blow upon it, Hag. 1. 9. Christ has taught us to pray every day for the bread of the day. (2.) A token of their communion with God; this bread on God's table being made of the same corn with the bread on their own tables, God and Israel did, as it were, eat together, as a pledge of friendship and fellowship; he supped with them, and they with him. (3.) A type of the spiritual provision which is made in the church by the gospel of Christ, for all that are made priests to our God.

In our Father's house there is bread enough, and to spare, a loaf for every tribe. All that attend in God's house shall be abundantly satisfied with the goodness of it, Ps. 36. 8. Divine consolations are the continual feast of holy souls, notwithstanding there are those to whom the table of the Lord, and the meat thereof, (because it is plain bread,) are contemptible, Mal. 1. 12. Christ has a table in his kingdom, at which all his saints shall for ever eat and drink with him, Luke, 22. 30.

31. And thou shalt make a candlestick of pure gold: of beaten work shall the candlestick be made: his shaft, and his branches, his bowls, his knops, and his flowers, shall be of the same. 32. And six branches shall come out of the sides of it; three branches of the candlestick out of the one side, and three branches of the candlestick out of the other side: 33. Three bowls made like unto almonds, with a knop and a flower in one branch; and three bowls made like almonds in the other branch, with a knop and a flower: so in the six branches that come out of the candlestick. 34. And in the candlestick shall be four bowls made like unto almonds, with their knops and their flowers. 35. And there shall be a knop under two branches of the same, and a knop under two branches of the same, and a knop under two branches of the same, according to the six branches that proceed out of the candlestick. 36. Their knops and their branches shall be of the same: all of it shall be one beaten work of pure gold. 37. And thou shalt make the seven lamps thereof: and they shall light the lamps thereof, that they may give light over against it. 38. And the tongs thereof, and the snuff dishes thereof, shall be of pure gold. 39. Of a talent of pure gold shall he make it, with all these vessels. 40. And look that thou make them after their pattern, which was shewed thee in the mount.

The next thing ordered to be made for the furnishing of God's palace, was, a rich stately candlestick, all of pure gold, not hollow, but solid. The particular directions here given concerning it shew, 1. That it was very magnificent, and a great ornament to the place; it had many branches drawn from the main shaft, which had not only their bowls, (to put the oil and the kindled wick in,) for necessity, but knops and flowers, for ornament. 2. That it was very convenient, and admirably well contrived both to scatter the light and to keep the tabernacle clean from smoke and snuffs. 3. That it was very significant. The tabernacle had no windows by which to let in the light of the day, all its light was candle-light; which intimates the comparative darkness of that dispensation, while the Sun of righteousness was not as yet risen, nor had the day-star from on high yet visited his church; yet God left not himself without witness, nor them without instruction; the commandment was a lamp, and the law a light, and the prophets were branches from that lamp, which gave light in their several ages to the Old-Testament church. The church is still dark, as the tabernacle was, in comparison with what it will be in heaven; but the word of God is the candlestick, a light shining in a dark place; (2 Pet. 1. 19.) and a dark place indeed the world would be without it. The Spirit of God, in his various gifts and graces, is compared to the seven lamps which burn before the throne, Rev. 4. 5. The churches are golden candlesticks, the lights of the world, holding forth the word of life, as the candlestick does the light, Philip. 2. 15, 16. Ministers are to light the lamps and snuff them, (v. 37.) by opening the scriptures. The treasure of this light is now put into earthen vessels, 2 Cor. 4. 6, 7. The branches of the candlestick spread every way, to denote the diffusing of the light of the gospel into all parts by the Christian ministry, Matth. 5. 14, 15. There is a diversity of gifts, but the same Spirit gives to each to profit withal.

Lastly, There is, in the midst of these instructions, an express caution given to Moses to take heed of varying from his model; (v. 40.) Make them after the pattern shewed thee. Nothing was left to his own invention, or the fancy of the workmen, or the people's humour; but the will of God must be religiously observed in every particular. Thus, (1.) All God's providences are exactly according to his counsels, and the copy never varies from the original. Infinite Wisdom never changes its measures; whatever is purposed shall undoubtedly be performed. (2.) All his ordinances must be administered according to his institutions. Christ's instruction to his disciples, (Matth. 28. 20.) is like this here, Observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you.

CHAP. XXVI.

Moses here receives instructions, I. Concerning the inner curtains of the tent or tabernacle, and the coupling of those curtains, v. 1. .6. II. Concerning the outer curtains, which were of goats' hair, to strengthen the former, v. 7. .13. III. Concerning the case or cover which was to secure it from the weather, v. 14. IV. Concerning the boards which were to be reared up to support the curtains, with their bars and sockets, v. 15. .30. V. The partition between the holy place and the most holy, v. 31. .35. VI. The rail for the door; v. 36, 37. These particulars, thus largely recorded, seem of little use to us now; yet, having been of great use to Moses and Israel, and God having thought fit to preserve down to us the remembrance of them, we ought not to overlook them. Even the antiquity renders this account venerable.

1 MOREOVER thou shalt make the tabernacle with ten curtains of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet: with cherubims of cunning work shalt thou make them. 2. The length of one curtain shall be eight and twenty cubits, and the breadth of one curtain four cubits: and every one of the curtains shall have one measure. 3. The five curtains shall be coupled together one to another; and other five curtains shall be coupled one to another. 4. And thou shalt make loops of blue upon the edge of the one curtain from the selvedge in the coupling; and likewise shalt thou make in the uttermost edge of another curtain, in the coupling of the second. 5. Fifty loops shalt thou make in the one curtain, and fifty loops shalt thou make in the edge of the curtain that is in the coupling of the second; that the loops may take hold one of another. 6. And thou shalt make fifty taches of gold, and couple the curtains together with the taches: and it shall be one tabernacle.

The house must be a tabernacle or tent, such as soldiers now use in the camp, which was both a mean dwelling and a movable one; and yet the ark of God had no better till Solomon built the temple, 480 years after this, 1 Kings, 6. 1. God manifested his presence among them thus in a tabernacle, 1. In compliance with their present condition in the wilderness, that they might have him with them wherever they went. Note, God suits the tokens of his favour, and the gifts of his grace, to his people's wants and necessities, according as they are; accommodating his mercy to their state, prosperous or adverse, settled or unsettled. When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee, Isa. 43. 2. 2. That it might represent the state of God's church in this world, it is a tabernacle state, Ps. 15. 1. We have here no continuing city; being strangers in this world, and travellers towards a better, we shall never be fixed till we come to heaven. Church-privileges are moveable goods from one place to another; the gospel is not tied to any place; the candlestick is in a tent, and may easily be taken away, Rev. 2. 5. If we make much of the tabernacle, and improve the privilege of it, wherever we go it will accompany us; but, if we neglect and disgrace it, wherever we stay it will forsake us; What hath my beloved to do in my house? Jer. 11. 15.

Now, (1.) The curtains of the tabernacle were to be very rich, the best of the kind, five twined linen; and colours very pleasing, blue, and purple, and scarlet. (2.) They were to be embroidered with cherubims, (v. 1.) to intimate that the angels of God pitch their tents round about the church, Ps. 34. 7. As there were cherubims over the mercy-seat, so there were round the tabernacle; for we find the angels compassing, not only the throne, but the elders: see Rev. 5. 11. (3.) There were to be two hangings, five breadths in each, sewed together, and the two hangings coupled together with golden clasps, or tacks, so that it might be all one tabernacle, v. 6. Thus the churches of Christ and the saints, though they are many, yet they are one, being fitly joined together in holy love, and, by the unity of the Spirit, so growing into one holy temple in the Lord, Eph. 2. 21, 22.—4. 16. This tabernacle was very strait and narrow; but, at the preaching of the gospel, the church is bid to enlarge the place of her tent, and to stretch forth her curtains, Isa. 54. 2.

7. And thou shalt make curtains of goats' hair to be a covering upon the tabernacle: eleven curtains shalt thou make. 8. The length of one curtain shall be thirty cubits, and the breadth of one curtain four cubits: and the eleven curtains shall be all of one measure. 9. And thou shalt couple five curtains by themselves, and six curtains by themselves, and shalt double the sixth curtain in the forefront of the tabernacle. 10. And thou shalt make fifty loops on the edge of the one curtain that is outmost in the coupling, and fifty loops in the edge of the curtain which coupleth the second. 11. And thou shalt make fifty taches of brass, and put the taches into the loops, and couple the tent together, that it may be one. 12. And the remnant that remaineth of the curtains of the tent, the half curtain that remaineth, shall hang over the backside of the tabernacle. 13. And a cubit on the one side, and a cubit on the other side of that which remaineth in the length of the curtains of the tent, it shall hang over the sides of the tabernacle, on this side and on that side, to cover it. 14. And thou shalt make a covering for the tent of rams' skins dyed red, and a covering above of badgers' skins.

Moses is here ordered to make a double covering for the tabernacle, that it might not rain in, and that the beauty of those fine curtains might not be damaged.

1. There was to be a covering of hair camlet curtains, which were somewhat larger every way than the inner curtains, because they were to inclose them, and probably were stretched out at some little distance from them, v. 7, &c. These were coupled together with brass clasps. The stuff being less valuable, the tacks were so; but the brass tacks would answer the intention as effectually as the golden ones. The bonds of unity may be as strong between curtains of goats' hair as between those of purple and scarlet.

2. Over this there was to be another covering, and that a double one; (v. 14.) one of rams' skins dyed red, probably dressed with the wool on; another of badgers' skins, so we translate it; but it should rather seem to have been some strong sort of leather, (but very fine,) for we read of the best sort of shoes being made of it, Ezek. 16. 10. Now observe here, (1.) That the outside of the tabernacle was coarse and rough, the beauty of it was in the inner curtains. Those in whom God dwells, must labour to be better than they seem to be. Hypocrites put the best side outward, like whited sepulchres; but the king's daughter is all glorious within; (Ps. 45. 13.) in the eye of the world, black as the tents of Kedar, but in the eye of God, comely as the curtains of Solomon, Cant. 1. 5. Let our adorning be that of the hidden man of the heart, which God values, 1 Pet. 3. 4. (2.) That where God places his glory, he will create a defence upon it; even upon the habitations of the righteous there shall be a covert, Isa. 6. 5, 6. The protection of Providence shall always be upon the beauty of holiness. God's tent will be a pavilion, Ps. 27. 5.

15. And thou shalt make boards for the tabernacle of shittim wood standing up. 16. Ten cubits shall be the length of a board, and a cubit and a half shall be the breadth of one board. 17. Two tenons shall there be in one board, set in order one against another: thus shalt thou make for all the boards of the tabernacle. 18. And thou shalt make the boards for the tabernacle, twenty boards on the south side southward. 19. And thou shalt make forty sockets of silver under the twenty boards; two sockets under one board for his two tenons, and two sockets under another board for his two tenons. 20. And for the second side of the tabernacle on the north side there shall be twenty boards: 21. And their forty sockets of silver; two sockets under one board, and two sockets under another board. 22. And for the sides of the tabernacle westward thou shalt make six boards. 23. And two boards shalt thou make for the corners of the tabernacle in the two sides. 24. And they shall be coupled together beneath, and they shall be coupled together above the head of it unto one ring; thus shall it be for them both; they shall be for the two corners. 25. And they shall be eight boards, and their sockets of silver, sixteen sockets; two sockets under one board, and two sockets under another board. 26. And thou shalt make bars of shittim wood; five for the boards of the one side of the tabernacle, 27. And five bars for the boards of the other side of the tabernacle, and five bars for the boards of the side of the tabernacle, for the two sides westward. 28. And the middle bar in the midst of the boards shall reach from end to end. 29. And thou shalt overlay the boards with gold, and make their rings of gold for places for the bars: and thou shalt overlay the bars with gold. 30. And thou shalt rear up the tabernacle according to the fashion thereof which was shewed thee in the mount.

Very particular directions are here given about the boards of the tabernacle, which were to bear up the curtains, as the stakes of a tent, which had need to be strong, Isa. 54.2. These boards had tenons, which fell into the mortises, that were made for them in silver bases. God took care to have every thing strong, as well as fine, in his tabernacle. Curtains without boards would have been shaken by every wind; but it is a good thing to have the heart established with grace, which is as the boards to support the curtains of profession, which otherwise will not hold out long. The boards were coupled together with gold rings at top and bottom, (v. 24.) and kept firm with bars that ran through golden staples in every board; (v. 26.) and the boards and bars were all richly gilded, v. 29. Thus every thing in the tabernacle was very splendid, agreeable to that infant state of the church, when such things were proper enough to please children, to possess the minds of the worshippers with a reverence of the divine glory, and to affect them with the greatness of that Prince who said, Here will I dwell; in allusion to this, the new Jerusalem is said to be of pure gold, Rev. 21. 18. But the builders of the gospel-church said, Silver and gold have we none; and yet the glory of their building far exceeded that of the tabernacle, 2 Cor. 3. 10, 11. How much better is wisdom than gold! No orders are given here about the floor of the tabernacle; probably, that also was boarded; for we cannot think that within all these fine curtains they trod upon the cold or wet ground; if it were so left, it may remind us of ch. 20. 24. An altar of earth shalt thou make unto me.

31. And thou shalt make a veil of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen of cunning work: with cherubims shall it be made: 32. And thou shalt hang it upon four pillars of shittim-wood, overlaid with gold: their hooks shall be of gold, upon the four sockets of silver. 33. And thou shalt hang up the veil under the taches, that thou mayest bring in thither within the veil the ark of the testimony: and the veil shall divide unto you between the holy place and the most holy. 34. And thou shalt put the mercy-seat upon the ark of the testimony in the most holy place. 35. And thou shalt set the table without the veil, and the candlestick over against the table on the side of the tabernacle toward the south: and thou shalt put the table on the north side. 36. And thou shalt make an hanging for the door of the tent, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen, wrought with needle-work. 37. And thou shalt make for the hanging five pillars of shittim-wood, and overlay them with gold, and their hooks shall be of gold: and thou shalt cast five sockets of brass for them.

Two veils are here ordered to be made, 1. One for a partition between the holy place and the most holy: which not only forbade any to enter, but forbade them so much as to look into, the holiest of all, v. 31, 33. Under that dispensation, divine grace was veiled, but now we behold it with open face, 2 Cor. 3. 18. The apostle tells us, (Heb. 9. 8.) what was the meaning of this veil; it intimated that the ceremonial law could not make the comers thereunto perfect, nor would the observance of it bring men to heaven; the way into the holiest of all was not made manifest, while the first tabernacle was standing; life and immortality lay concealed, till they were brought to light by the gospel; which was therefore signified by the rending of this veil at the death of Christ, Matth. 27. 51. We have now boldness to enter into the holiest, in all acts of devotion, by the blood of Jesus; yet such as obliges us to a holy reverence, and a humble sense of our distance. 2. Another veil was for the outer door of the tabernacle, v. 36, 37. Through this first veil the priests went in every day to minister in the holy place, but not the people, Heb. 9. 6. This veil was all the defence the tabernacle had against thieves and robbers, which might easily be broken through, for it could be neither locked nor barred, and the abundance of wealth in the tabernacle, one would think, might be a temptation; but by leaving it thus exposed, (1.) The priests and Levites would be so much the more obliged to keep a strict watch upon it, and, (2.) God would show his care of his church on earth, though it is weak and defenceless, and continually exposed. A curtain shall be (if God please to make it so) as strong a defence to his house, as gates of brass and bars of iron.

CHAP. XXVII.

In this chapter, directions are given, I. Concerning the brazen altar for burnt-offerings, v. 1. . 8. II. Concerning the court of the tabernacle, with the hangings of it, v. 9. . 19. III. Concerning oil for the lamp, v. 20. 21.

1. AND thou shalt make an altar of shittim-wood, five cubits long, and five cubits broad; the altar shall be four-square: and the height thereof shall be three cubits. 2. And thou shalt make the horns of it upon the four corners thereof: his horns shall be of the same: and thou shalt overlay it with brass. 3. And thou shalt make his pans to receive his ashes, and his shovels, and his basins, and his flesh-hooks, and his fire-pans: all the vessels thereof thou shalt make of brass. 4. And thou shalt make for it a grate of network of brass; and upon the net shalt thou make four brazen rings in the four corners thereof. 5. And thou shalt put it under the compass of the altar beneath, that the net may be even to the midst of the altar. 6. And thou shalt make staves for the altar, staves of shittim-wood, and overlay them with brass. 7. And the staves shall be put into the rings, and the staves shall be upon the two sides of the altar, to bear it. 8. Hollow with boards shalt thou make it: as it was shewed thee in the mount, so shall they make it.

As God intended in the tabernacle to manifest his presence among his people, so there they were to pay their devotions to him, not in the tabernacle itself, (into that only the priests entered as God's domestic servants,) but in the court before the tabernacle, where, as common subjects, they attended. There an altar was ordered to be set up, to which they must bring their sacrifices, and on which their priests must offer them to God; and this altar was to sanctify their gifts; hence they were to present their services to God, as from the mercy-seat he gave his oracles to them; and thus a communion was settled between God and Israel. Moses is here directed about, 1. The dimensions of it; it was four-square, v. 1. 2. The horns of it, (v. 2.) which were for ornament and for use; the sacrifices were bound with cords to the horns of the altar, and to them malefactors fled for refuge. 3. The materials; it was of wood overlaid with brass, v. 1, 2. 4. The appurtenances of it, (v. 3.) which were all of brass. 5. The grate, which was set into the hollow of the altar, about the middle of it, in which the fire was kept, and the sacrifice burnt; it was made of net-work like a sieve, and hung hollow, that the fire might burn the better, and that the ashes might fall through into the hollow of the altar, v. 4, 5. 6. The staves with which it must be carried, v. 6, 7. And, lastly, He is referred to the pattern shewed him, v. 8.

Now this brazen altar was a type of Christ dying to make atonement for our sins: the wood had been consumed by the fire from heaven, if it had not been secured by the brass; nor could the human nature of Christ have borne the wrath of God, if it had not been supported by a divine power. Christ sanctified himself for his church, as their altar, (John, 17. 19.) and by his mediation sanctifies the daily services of his people, who also have a right to eat of this altar, (Heb. 13. 10.) for they serve at it as spiritual priests. To the horns of this altar poor sinners fly for refuge when justice pursues them, and there they are safe in the virtue of the sacrifice there offered.

9. And thou shalt make the court of the tabernacle for the south side southward; there shall be hangings for the court of fine twined linen of an hundred cubits long for one side: 10. And the twenty pillars thereof and their twenty sockets shall be of brass; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets shall be of silver. 11. And likewise for the north side in length there shall be hangings of an hundred cubits long, and his twenty pillars and their twenty sockets of brass; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets of silver. 12. And for the breadth of the court on the west side shall be hangings of fifty cubits: their pillars ten, and their sockets ten. 13. And the breadth of the court on the east side eastward shall be fifty cubits. 14. The hangings of one side of the gate shall be fifteen cubits: their pillars three, and their sockets three. 15. And on the other side shall be hangings fifteen cubits: their pillars three, and their sockets three. 16. And for the gate of one court shall be an hanging of twenty cubits, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen, wrought with needle-work: and their pillars shall be four, and their sockets four. 17. All the pillars round about the court shall be filleted with silver; their hooks shall be of silver, and their sockets of brass. 18. The length of the court shall be an hundred cubits, and the breadth fifty every where, and the height five cubits, of fine twined linen, and their sockets of brass. 19. All the vessels of the tabernacle in all the service thereof, and all the pins thereof, and all the pins of the court, shall be of brass.

Before the tabernacle there was to be a court or yard, enclosed with hangings, of the finest linen that was used for tents. This court, according to the common computation of cubits, was fifty yards long, and twenty-five broad. Pillars were set up at convenient distances, in sockets of brass, the pillars filleted with silver, and silver tenter-hooks in them, on which the linen hangings were fastened; the hanging which served for the gate was finer than the rest, v. 16. This court was a type of the church, enclosed and distinguished from the rest of the world. The enclosure supported by pillars, denoting the stability of the church, hung with the clean linen, which is said to be the righteousness of saints, Rev. 19. 8. These were the courts David longed for, and coveted to reside in, (Ps. 84. 2, 10.) and into which the people of God entered with praise and thanksgiving; (Ps. 100. 4.) yet this court would contain but a few worshippers; thanks be to God, now, under the gospel, the enclosure is taken down; God's will is, that men pray every where: and there is room for all that in every place call on the name of Jesus Christ.

20. And thou shalt command the children of Israel, that they bring thee pure oil-olive beaten for the light, to cause the lamp to burn always.

21. In the tabernacle of the congregation without the vail, which is before the testimony, Aaron and his sons shall order it from evening to morning before the LORD: It shall be a statute for ever unto their generations on the behalf of the children of Israel.

We read of the candlestick in the twenty-fifth chapter; here is an order given for the keeping of the lamps constantly burning in it, else it was useless; in every candlestick there should be a burning and shining light; candlesticks without candles are as wells without water, or as clouds without rain. Now, 1. The people were to provide the oil; from them the Lord's ministers must have their maintenance. Or, rather, the pure oil signified the gifts and graces of the Spirit, which are communicated to all believers from Christ the good Olive, of whose fulness we receive, (Zech. 4. 11, 12.) and without which our light cannot shine before men. 2. The priests were to light the lamps, and to tend them: it was part of their daily service to cause the lamp to burn always night and day; thus it is the work of ministers, by the preaching and expounding of the scriptures, which are as a lamp,) to enlighten the church, God's tabernacle upon earth, and to direct the spiritual priests in his service. This is to be a statute for ever, that the lamps of the word be lighted as duly as the incense of prayer and praise is offered.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Orders being given for the fitting up of the place of worship, in this and the following chapter, care is taken about the priests that were to minister in this holy place, as the menial servants of the God of Israel. He hired servants, as a token of his purpose to reside among them. In this chapter, I. He pitches upon the persons who should be his servants, v. 1. II. He appoints their livery; their work was holy, and so must their garments be; and answerable to the glory of the house which was now to be erected, v. 2. .5. 1. He appoints the garments of his head servant, the high priest, which were very rich. (1.) An ephod and girdle, v. 6. .14. (2.) A breast-plate of judgment, (v. 15. .29.) in which must be put the Urin and Thunmin, v. 30. (3.) The robe of the ephod, v. 31. .35. (4.) The mitre, v. 36. .39. 2. The garments of the inferior priests, v. 40. .43. And these also were shadows of good things to come.

1. AND take thou unto thee Aaron thy brother and his sons with him, from among the children of Israel, that he may minister unto me in the priest's office, even Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar, Aaron's sons. 2. And thou shalt make holy garments for Aaron thy brother for glory and for beauty. 3. And thou shalt speak unto all that are wise-hearted, whom I have filled with the spirit of wisdom, that they may make Aaron's garments to consecrate man, that he may minister unto me in the priest's office. 4. And these are the garments which they shall make; a breast-plate, and an ephod, and a robe, and a brodered coat, a mitre, and a girdle: and they shall make holy garments for Aaron thy brother, and his sons, that he may minister unto me in the priest's office. 5. And they shall take gold, and blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen.

We have here,

I. The priests nominated, Aaron and his sons, v. 1. Hitherto, every master of a family was priest to his own family, and offered, as he saw cause, upon altars of earth; but now that the families of Israel began to be incorporated into a nation, and a tabernacle of the congregation was to be erected, as a visible centre of their unity; it was requisite there should be a public priesthood instituted. Moses, who had hitherto officiated, and is therefore reckoned among the priests of the Lord, (Ps. 99. 6.) had enough to do as their prophet to consult the oracle for them, and as their prince to judge among them; nor was he desirous to engross all the honours to himself, or to entail that of the priesthood, which alone was hereditary, upon his own family, but was very well pleased to see his brother Aaron invested in this office, and his sons after him, while (how great soever he was) his sons after him would be but common Levites. It is an instance of the humility of that great man, and an evidence of his sincere regard for the glory of God, that he had so little regard to the preferment of his own family. Aaron, who had humbly served as a prophet to his younger brother Moses, and did not decline the office, (ch. 7. 1.) is now advanced to be a priest, a High-Priest, to God; for he will exalt those that abase themselves. Nor could any man have taken this honour to himself, but he that was called of God to it, Heb. 5. 4. God had said of Israel in general, that they should be to him a kingdom of priests, ch. 19. 6. But because it was requisite that those who ministered at the altar should give themselves wholly to the service, and because that which is every body's work, will soon come to be nobody's work, God here chose from among them one to be a family of priests, the father and his four sons; and from Aaron's loins descended all the priests of the Jewish church, whom we read so often of, both in the Old Testament and in the New. A blessed thing it is, when real holiness goes, as this ceremonial holiness did, by succession in a family.

II. The priests' garments, appointed for glory and beauty, v. 2. Some of the richest materials were to be provided, (v. 5.) and the best artists employed in the making of them, whose skill God, by a special gift for this purpose, would improve to a very high degree, v. 3. Note, Eminence, even in common arts, is a gift of God, it comes from him, and, as there is occasion, it ought to be used for him. He that teaches the husbandman discretion, teaches the tradesman also; both therefore ought to honour God with their gain. Human learning ought particularly to be consecrated to the service of the priesthood, and employed for the adorning of those that minister about holy things.

The garments appointed were, 1. Four, which both the High-Priest, and the inferior priests, wore, namely, the linen breeches, the linen coat, the linen girdle which fastened it to them, and the bonnet or turban; that which the High-Priest wore, is called a mitre. 2. Four more, which were peculiar to the High-Priest, namely, the ephod, with the curious girdle of it, the breast-plate of judgment, the long robe with the bells and pomegranates at the bottom of it, and the golden plate on his forehead. These glorious garments were appointed, (1.) That the priests themselves might be reminded of the dignity of their office, and might behave themselves with due decorum. (2.) That the people might thereby be possessed with a holy reverence of that God, whose ministers appeared in such array. (3.) That the priests might be types of Christ who should offer himself without spot to God, and of all christians who have the beauty of holiness put upon them, in which they are consecrated to God. Our adorning, now under the gospel, both that of ministers and christians, is not to be of gold, and pearl, and costly array, but the garments of salvation, and the robe of righteousness, Isa. 61. 10. Ps. 132. 9, 16. As the filthy garments wherewith Joshua the High-Priest was clothed, signified the iniquity which cleaved to his priesthood, from which care was taken that it should be purged, (Zech. 3. 3, 4.) so those holy garments signified the perfect purity that there is in the priesthood of Christ; he is holy, harmless, and undefiled.

6. And they shall make the ephod, of gold, of blue, and of purple, of scarlet, and fine twined linen, with cunning work. 7. It shall have the two shoulder-pieces thereof joined at the two edges thereof; and so it shall be joined together. 8. And the curious girdle of the ephod, which is upon it, shall be of the same, according to the work thereof; even of gold, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen. 9. And thou shalt take two onyx-stones, and grave on them the names of the children of Israel: 10. Six of their names on one stone, and the other six names of the rest on the other stone, according to their birth. 11. With the work of an engraver in stone, like the engravings of a signet, shalt thou engrave the two stones with the names of the children of Israel: thou shalt make them to be set in ouches of gold. 12. And thou shalt put the two stones upon the shoulders of the ephod for stones of memorial unto the children of Israel: and Aaron shall bear their names before the LORD upon his two shoulders for a memorial. 13. And thou shalt make ouches of gold; 14. And two chains of pure gold at the ends; of wreathen work shalt thou make them, and fasten the wreathen chains to the ouches.

Directions are here given concerning the ephod, which was the utmost garment of the High-Priest; linen ephods were worn by the inferior priests, 1 Sam. 22. 18. Samuel wore one when he was a child, (1 Sam. 2. 18.) and David when he danced before the ark; (2 Sam. 6. 14.) but this which the High-Priest only wore, was called a golden ephod, because there was a great deal of gold woven into it: it was a short coat without sleeves, buttoned close to him with a curious girdle of the same stuff; (v. 6—8.) the shoulder-pieces were buttoned together with two precious stones set in gold, one on each shoulder, on which were graven the names of the children of Israel, v. 9—12. In allusion to this, 1. Christ, our High-Priest, appeared to John, girt about the paps with a golden girdle, such as was the curious girdle of the ephod, Rev. 1. 13. Righteousness is the girdle of his loins, (Isa. 11. 5.) and should be of ours, Eph. 6. 14. He is girt with strength for the work of our salvation, and is ready for it. 2. The government is said to be upon his shoulders, (Isa. 9. 6.) as Aaron had the names of all Israel upon his shoulders in precious stones. He presents to himself and to his Father a glorious church, Eph. 5. 27. He has power to support them, interest to recommend them, and it is in him that they are remembered with honour and favour: he bears them before the Lord for a memorial, (v. 12.) in token of his appearing before God, as the Representative of all Israel, and an Advocate for them.

15. And thou shalt make the breast-plate of judgment with cunning work; after the work of the ephod thou shalt make it; of gold, of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, and of fine twined linen, shalt thou make it. 16. Four-square it shall be being doubled; a span shall be the length thereof, and a span shall be the breadth thereof. 17. And thou shalt set in it settings of stones, even four rows of stones: the first row shall be a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle: this shall be the first row. 18. And the second row shall be an emerald, a sapphire, and a diamond. 19. And the third row a ligure, an agate, and an amethyst. 20. And the fourth row a beryl, and an onyx, and a jasper: they shall be set in gold in their enclosings. 21. And the stones shall be with the names of the children of Israel, twelve, according to their names, like the engravings of a signet; every one with his name shall they be, according to the twelve tribes. 22. And thou shalt make upon the breast-plate chains at the ends of wreathen work of pure gold. 23. And thou shalt make upon the breast-plate two rings of gold, and shalt put the two rings on the two ends of the breast-plate. 24. And thou shalt put the two wreathen chains of gold in the two rings which are on the ends of the breast-plate. 25. And the other two ends of the two wreathen chains thou shalt fasten in the two ouches, and put them on the shoulder-pieces of the ephod before it. 26. And thou shalt make two rings of gold, and thou shalt put them upon the two ends of the breast-plate in the border thereof, which is in the side of the ephod inward. 27. And two other rings of gold thou shalt make, and shalt put them on the two sides of the ephod underneath, toward the forepart thereof, over-against the other coupling thereof, above the curious girdle of the ephod. 28. And they shall bind the breast-plate by the rings thereof unto the rings of the ephod with a lace of blue, that it may be above the curious girdle of the ephod, and that the breast-plate be not loosed from the ephod. 29. And Aaron shall bear the names of the children of Israel in the breast-plate of judgment upon his heart, when he goeth in unto the holy place, for a memorial before the LORD continually. 30. And thou shalt put in the breast-plate of judgment the Urim and the Thummim; and they shall be upon Aaron's heart, when he goeth in before the LORD: and Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the LORD continually.

that, being doubled, it was a spansquare, v. 16. This was fastened to the ephod with wreathen chains of gold, (v. 13, 14, 22, &c.) both at top and bottom, so that the breast-plate might not be loosed from the ephod, v. 28. The ephod was the garment of service, the breast-plate of judgment was an emblem of honour; these two must by no means be separated. If any man will minister unto the Lord, and do his will, he shall know his doctrine. In this breast-plate,

1. The tribes of Israel were recommended to God's favour in twelve precious stones, v. 17..21, 29. Some question whether Levi had a precious stone with his name on or no. If not, Ephraim and Manasseh were reckoned distinct, as Jacob had said they should be, and the high priest himself, being head of the tribe of Levi, sufficiently represented that tribe. If there was a stone for Levi, as is intimated by that, that they were engraven according to their birth, (v. 10.) Ephraim and Manasseh were one in Joseph. Aaron was to bear their names for a memorial before the Lord continually, being ordained for men, to represent them in things pertaining to God, herein typifying our great High Priest, who always appears in the presence of God for us. 1. Though the people were forbidden to come near, and obliged to keep their distance, yet, by the high priest, who had their names on his breast-plate, they entered into the holiest; so believers, even while they are here on this earth, not only enter into the holiest, but by faith are made to sit with Christ in heavenly places, Eph. 2. 6. 2. The name of each tribe was engraven in a precious stone, to signify how precious, in God's sight, believers are, and how honourable, Isa. 43. 4. They shall be his in the day he makes up his jewels, Mal. 3. 17. How small and poor soever the tribe was, it was a precious stone in the breast-plate of the high priest; thus are all the saints dear to Christ; and his delight is in them as the excellent ones of the earth, however men esteem them as earthen pitchers, Lam. 4. 2. 3. The high priest had the names of the tribes both on his shoulders and on his breast, intimating both the power and the love with which our Lord Jesus intercedes for those that are his. He not only bears them up in his arms with an almighty strength, but he bears them upon his heart, as the expression here is; (v. 29.) carries them in his bosom, (Isa. 40. 11.) with the most tender affection. How near should Christ's name be to our hearts, since he is pleased to lay our names so near his; and what a comfort is it to us, in all our addresses to God, that the great High Priest of our profession has the names of all his Israel upon his breast before the Lord, for a memorial, presenting them to God, as the people of his choice, who were to be made accepted in the Beloved! Let not any good Christians fear that God has forgotten them, nor question his being mindful of them upon all occasions, when they are not only graven upon the palms of his hands, (Isa. 49. 16.) but graven upon the heart of the great Intercessor. See Cant. 8. 6.

II. The Urim and Thummim, by which the will of God was made known in doubtful cases, were put in this breast-plate, which is therefore called the breast-plate of judgment, v. 30. Urim and Thummim signify light and integrity; many conjectures there are among the learned what they were; we have no reason to think they were any thing that Moses was to make, more than what was before ordered; so that either God made them himself, and gave them to Moses, for him to put into the breast-plate, when other things were prepared, (Lev. 8. 8.) or, no more is meant than a declaration of the further use of what was already ordered to be made. I think the words may be read thus: And thou shalt give, or add, or deliver, to the breast-plate of judgment, the illuminations and perfections, and they shall be upon the heart of Aaron: that is, "He shall be endued with the power of knowing and making known the mind of God in all difficult doubtful cases, relating either to the civil or ecclesiastical state of the nation." Their government was a theocracy; God was their King, the high priest was, under God, their ruler, the Urim and Thummim were his cabinet council; probably Moses wrote upon the breast-plate, or wove into it, these words, Urim and Thummim, to signify that the high priest, having on him this breast-plate, and asking coun-

The most considerable of the ornaments of the high priest was this breast-plate, a rich piece of cloth, curiously wrought with gold and purple, &c. two spans long, and a span broad, so of God in any emergency relating to the public, should be directed to take those measures, and give that advice, which God would own. If he was standing before the ark, (but without the veil,) probably he received instructions from off the mercy-seat, as Moses did; (ch. 25. 22.) thus, it should seem, Phineas did, Judg. 20. 27, 28. If he was at a distance from the ark, as Abiathar was when he inquired of the Lord for David, (1 Sam. 23. 6, &c.) then the answer was given either by a voice from heaven, or rather by an impulse upon the mind of the High-Priest, which last is perhaps intimated in that expression, He shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart. This oracle was of great use to Israel; Joshua consulted it, (Numb. 27. 21.) and, it is likely, the judges after him. It was lost in the captivity, and never regained afterwards, though, it should seem, it was expected, Ezra. 2. 63. But it was a shadow of good things to come, and the substance is Christ. He is our Oracle; by him God in these last days makes known himself and his mind to us, Heb. 1. 1. John. 1. 18. Divine revelation centres in him, and comes to us through him; he is the Light, the true Light, the faithful Witness, the Truth itself, and from him we receive the Spirit of truth, who leads into all truth. The joining of the breast-plate to the ephod denotes that his prophetic office was founded in his priesthood; and it was by the merit of his death that he purchased this honour for himself, and this favour for us. It was the Lamb that had been slain, that was worthy to take the book, and to open the seals, Rev. 5. 9.

31. And thou shalt make the robe of the ephod all of blue. 32. And there shall be an hole in the top of it, in the midst thereof: it shall have a binding of woven work round about the hole of it, as it were the hole of an habergeon, that it be not rent. 33. And beneath upon the hem of it thou shalt make pomegranates of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, round about the hem thereof; and bells of gold between them round about: 34. A golden bell and a pomegranate, a golden bell and a pomegranate, upon the hem of the robe round about. 35. And it shall be upon Aaron to minister: and his sound shall be heard when he goeth in unto the holy place before the LORD, and when he cometh out, that he die not. 36. And thou shalt make a plate of pure gold, and grave upon it, like the engravings of a signet, HOLINESS TO THE LORD. 37. And thou shalt put it on a blue lace, that it may be upon the mitre; upon the fore-front of the mitre it shall be. 38. And it shall be upon Aaron's forehead, that Aaron may bear the iniquity of the holy things, which the children of Israel shall hallow in all their holy gifts; and it shall be always upon his forehead, that they may be accepted before the LORD. 39. And thou shalt embroider the coat of fine linen, and thou shalt make the mitre of fine linen, and thou shalt make the girdle of needle-work.

Here is,

1. Direction given concerning the robe of the ephod, v. 31. . 35. This was next under the ephod, and reached down to the knees, without sleeves, and was put on over their head, having holes on the sides to put the arms through, or, as Maimonides describes it, was not sewed together on the sides at all. The hole on the top, through which the head was put, was carefully bound about, that it might not tear in the putting on. In religious worship, care must be taken to prevent every thing that may distract the minds of the worshippers, or render the service despicable. Round the skirts of the robe were hung golden bells, and the representations of pomegranates made of yarn of divers colours. The pomegranates added to the beauty of the robe, and the sound of the bells gave notice to the people in the outer court, when he went in to the holy place to burn incense, that they might then apply themselves to their devotions at the same time, (Luke. 1. 10.) in token of their concurrence with him in his offering, and their hopes of the ascent of their prayers to God in the virtue of the incense he offered. Aaron must come near, to minister in the garments that were appointed him, that he die not. It is at his peril if he attend otherwise than according to the institution. This intimates, that we must serve the Lord with fear and holy trembling, as those that know we deserve to die, and are in danger of making some fatal mistake. Some make the bells of the holy robe to typify the sound of the gospel of Christ in the world, giving notice of his entrance within the veil for us; Blessed are they that hear this joyful sound, Ps. 89. 15. The joining of the pomegranates, which are a fragrant fruit, denotes the sweet savour of the gospel, as well as the joyful sound of it, for it is a savour of life unto life. The church is called an orchard of pomegranates.

2. Concerning the golden plate fixed upon Aaron's forehead, on which must be engraven, Holiness to the Lord, (v. 36, 37.) or the Holiness of Jehovah. Aaron must hereby be reminded that God is holy, and that his priests must be holy; Holiness becomes his house and household. The High-Priest must be sequestered from all pollution, and consecrated to God and to his service and honour, and so must all his ministrations be. All that attend in God's house must have Holiness to the Lord engraven upon their foreheads, that is, they must be holy, devoted to the Lord, and designing his glory in all they do. This must appear in their forehead, in an open profession of their relation to God, as those that are not ashamed to own it, and in a conversation in the world answerable to it. It must likewise be engraven like the engravings of a signet, so deep, so durable, not painted to be washed off, but sincere and lasting; such must our holiness to the Lord be. Aaron must have this upon his forehead, that he may bear the iniquity of the holy things, (v. 38.) and that they may be accepted before the Lord. Herein he was a type of Christ, the great Mediator between God and man, through whom it is that we have to do with God. (1.) Through him what is amiss in our services is pardoned. The divine law is strict; in many things we come short of our duty, so that we cannot but be conscious to ourselves of much iniquity cleaving even to our holy things; when we would do good, evil is present; even this would be our ruin if God should enter into judgment with us. But Christ, our High-Priest, bears this iniquity, bears it for us, so as to bear it from us, and through him it is forgiven to us, and not laid to our charge. (2.) Through him, what is good is accepted; our persons, our performances, are pleasing to God upon the account of Christ's intercession, and not otherwise, 1 Pet. 2. 5. His being Holiness to the Lord, recommends all those to the divine favour that are interested in his righteousness, and clothed with his Spirit. And therefore he has said, it was for our sakes that he sanctified himself, John. 17. 19. Having such a High-Priest, we come boldly to the throne of grace, Heb. 4. 14. . 16.

3. The rest of the garments are but named, (v. 39.) because there was nothing extraordinary in them. The embroidered coat of fine linen was the innermost of the priestly garments; it reached to the feet, and the sleeves to the wrists, and was bound to the body with a girdle or sash of needle-work. The mitre, or diadem, was of linen, such as kings anciently wore in the East, typifying the kingly office of Christ. He is a Priest upon a throne, (Zech. 6. 13.) a Priest with a crown. These two God has joined, and we must not think to separate them.

40. And for Aaron's sons thou shalt make coats and thou shalt make for them girdles, and bonnets shalt thou make for them, for glory and for beauty. 41. And thou shalt put them upon Aaron thy brother, and his sons with him; and shalt anoint them, and consecrate them, and sanctify them, that they may minister unto me in the priest's office. 42. And thou shalt make them linen breeches to cover their nakedness; from the loins even unto the thighs they shall reach: 43. And they shall be upon Aaron, and upon his sons, when they come in unto the tabernacle of the congregation, or when they come near unto the altar to minister in the holy place; that they bear not iniquity, and die: It shall be a statute for ever unto him, and his seed after him.

We have here,

1. Particular orders about the vestments of the inferior priests. They were to have coats, and girdles, and bonnets, of the same materials with those of the high priest; but there was a difference in shape between their bonnets and his mitre. Their's, as his, were to be for glory and beauty, (v. 40.) that they might look great in their ministration: yet all this glory was nothing compared with the glory of grace, this beauty nothing to the beauty of holiness, of which these holy garments were typical. They are particularly ordered, in their ministration, to wear linen breeches, v. 42. This teaches us modesty and decency of garb and gesture, at all times, especially in public worship, in which a veil is becoming, 1 Cor. 11. 5, 6, 10. It also intimates what need our souls have of a covering, when we come before God, that the shame of their nakedness may not appear.

2. A general rule concerning the garments both of the high priest, and of the inferior priests, that they were to be put upon them, at first, when they were consecrated, in token of their being invested in the office; (v. 41.) and then, they were to wear them in all their ministrations, but not at other times, (v. 43.) and this, at their peril, lest they bear iniquity, and die. Those who are guilty of omissions in duty, as well as omissions of duty, shall bear their iniquity. If the priests perform the instituted service, and do not do it in the appointed garments, it is (say the Jewish doctors) as if a stranger did it, and the stranger that comes nigh shall be put to death. Nor will God connive at the presumptions and irreverences even of those whom he causes to draw most near to him; if Aaron himself put a slight upon the divine institution, he shall bear iniquity, and die. To us these garments typify, (1.) The righteousness of Christ; if we appear not before God in that, we shall bear iniquity, and die. What have we to do at the wedding-feast, without a wedding garment? or at God's altar, without the array of his priests? Matth. 22. 12, 13. (2.) The armour of God prescribed, Eph. 6. 13. If we venture without that armour, our spiritual enemies will be the death of our souls, and we shall bear the iniquity, our blood will be upon our own heads. Blessed is he therefore that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, Rev. 16. 15.

Lastly, This is said to be a statute for ever, that is, it is to continue as long as the priesthood continues. But it is to have its perpetuity in the substance, of which these things were the shadows.

CHAP. XXIX.

Particular orders are given in this chapter, I. Concerning the consecration of the priests, and the sanctification of the altar, v. 1..37. II. Concerning the daily sacrifice, v. 38..41. To which gracious promises are annexed, that God would own and bless them in all their services, v. 42..46.

AND this is the thing that thou shalt do unto them to hallow them, to minister unto me in the priest's office: Take one young bullock, and two rams without blemish, 2. And unleavened bread, and cakes unleavened tempered with oil, and wafers unleavened anointed with oil: of wheaten flour shalt thou make them. 3. And thou shalt put them into one basket, and bring them in the basket, with the bullock and the two rams. 4. And Aaron and his sons thou shalt bring unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and shalt wash them with water. 5. And thou shalt take the garments, and put upon Aaron the coat, and the robe of the ephod, and the ephod, and the breast-plate, and gird him with the curious girdle of the ephod: 6. And thou shalt put the mitre upon his head, and put the holy crown upon the mitre. 7. Then shalt thou take the anointing oil, and pour it upon his head, and anoint him. 8. And thou shalt bring his sons, and put coats upon them. 9. And thou shalt gird them with girdles, Aaron and his sons, and put the bonnets on them: and the priest's office shall be their's for a perpetual statute: and thou shalt consecrate Aaron and his sons. 10. And thou shalt cause a bullock to be brought before the tabernacle of the congregation: and Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the bullock. 11. And thou shalt kill the bullock before the LORD, by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 12. And thou shalt take of the blood of the bullock, and put it upon the horns of the altar with thy finger, and pour all the blood beside the bottom of the altar. 13. And thou shalt take all the fat that covereth the inwards, and the caul that is above the liver, and the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, and burn them upon the altar. 14. But the flesh of the bullock, and his skin, and his dung, shalt thou burn with fire without the camp; it is a sin-offering. 15. Thou shalt also take one ram; and Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the ram. 16. And thou shalt slay the ram, and thou shalt take his blood, and sprinkle it round about upon the altar. 17. And thou shalt cut the ram in pieces, and wash the inwards of him, and his legs, and put them unto his pieces, and unto his head. 18. And thou shalt burn the whole ram upon the altar: it is a burnt-offering unto the LORD: it is a sweet savour, an offering made by fire unto the LORD. 19. And thou shalt take the other ram; and Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the ram. 20. Then shalt thou kill the ram, and take of his blood, and put it upon the tip of the right ear of Aaron, and upon the tip of the right ear of his sons, and upon the thumb of their right hand, and upon the great toe of their right foot, and sprinkle the blood upon the altar round about. 21. And thou shalt take of the blood that is upon the altar, and of the anointing oil, and sprinkle it upon Aaron, and upon his garments, and upon his sons, and upon the garments of his sons with him: and he shall be hallowed, and his garments, and his sons, and his sons' garments with him. 22. Also thou shalt take of the ram the fat and the rump, and the fat that covereth the inwards, and the caul above the liver, and the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, and the right shoulder; for it is a ram of consecration: 23. And one loaf of bread, and one cake of oiled bread, and one wafer out of the basket of the unleavened bread that is before the LORD: 24. And thou shalt put all in the hands of Aaron, and in the hands of his sons; and shalt wave them for a wave offering before the LORD. 25. And thou shalt receive them of their hands, and burn them upon the altar for a burnt-offering, for a sweet savour before the LORD: it is an offering made by fire unto the LORD. 26. And thou shalt take the breast of the ram of Aaron's consecration, and wave it for a wave-offering before the LORD: and it shall be thy part. 27. And thou shalt sanctify the breast of the wave-offering, and the shoulder of the heave-offering, which is waved, and which is heaved up, of the ram of the consecration, even of that which is for Aaron, and of that which is for his sons: 28. And it shall be Aaron's and his sons' by a statute for ever from the children of Israel: for it is an heave-offering: and it shall be an heave-offering from the children of Israel of the sacrifice of their peace-offerings, even their heave-offering unto the LORD. 29. And the holy garments of Aaron shall be his sons' after him, to be anointed therein, and to be consecrated in them. 30. And that son that is priest in his stead shall put them on seven days, when he cometh into the tabernacle of the congregation to minister in the holy place. 31. And thou shalt take the ram of the consecration, and seethe his flesh in the holy place. 32. And Aaron and his sons shall eat the flesh of the ram, and the bread that is in the basket, by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 33. And they shall eat those things wherewith the atonement was made, to consecrate and to sanctify them: but a stranger shall not eat thereof, because they are holy. 34. And if aught of the flesh of the consecrations, or of the bread, remain unto the morning, then thou shalt burn the remainder with fire; it shall not be eaten, because it is holy. 35. And thus shalt thou do unto Aaron, and to his sons, according to all things which I have commanded thee: seven days shalt thou consecrate them. 36. And thou shalt offer every day a bullock for a sin-offering for atonement: and thou shalt cleanse the altar, when thou hast made an atonement for it, and thou shalt anoint it, to sanctify it. 37. Seven days thou shalt make an atonement for the altar, and sanctify it; and it shall be an altar most holy: whatsoever toucheth the altar shall be holy.

Here is,

1. The law concerning the confirmation of Aaron and his sons to the priest's office, which was to be done with a great deal of ceremony and solemnity, that they themselves might be duly affected with the greatness of the work to which they were called, and that the people also might learn to magnify the office, and none might dare to invade it. The ceremonies wherewith it was to be done were very fully and particularly appointed, because nothing of this kind had been done before, and because it was to be a statute for ever, that the high priest should be thus inaugurated. Now,

1. The work to be done was the consecrating of the persons whom God had chosen to be priests; by which they devoted and gave up themselves to the service of God, and God declared his acceptance of them; and the people were made to know that they glorified not themselves to be made priests, but were called of God. Heb. 5. 4, 5. They were thus distinguished from common men, sequestered from common services, and set apart for God and an immediate attendance on him. Note, All that are to be employed for God are to be sanctified to him. The person must first be accepted, and then the performance. The Hebrew phrase for consecrating, is, filling the hand; (v. 9.) Thou shalt fill the hand of Aaron and his sons, and the ram of consecration is the ram of fillings, v. 22, 26. The consecrating of them was the perfecting of them; Christ is said to be perfected or consecrated for evermore; Heb. 7. 28. Probably, the phrase here is borrowed from the putting of the sacrifice into their hand, to be waved before the Lord, v. 24. But it intimates, (1.) That ministers have their hands full; they have no time to trifle, so great, so copious, so constant, is their work. (2.) That they must have their hands filled. Of necessity, they must have something to offer, and they cannot find it in themselves, it must be given them from above. They cannot fill the people's hearts, unless God fill their hands; to him therefore they must go, and receive from his fullness.

2. The person to do it was Moses, by God's appointment. Though he was ordained for men, yet the people were not to consecrate him; Moses the servant of the Lord, and his agent herein, must do it. By God's special appointment he now did the priest's work, and therefore that which was the priest's part of the sacrifice was here ordered to be his, v. 26.

3. The place was at the door of the tabernacle of meeting, v. 4. God was pleased to dwell in the tabernacle, the people attending in the courts, so that the door between the court and the tabernacle was the fittest place for them to be consecrated in, who were to mediate between God and man, and so to stand between both, and lay their hands (as it were) upon both. They were consecrated at the door, for they were to be door-keepers.

4. It was done with many ceremonies. (1.) They were to be washed, (v. 4.) signifying that they must be clean who bear the vessels of the Lord, Isa. 52. 11. They that would perfect holiness, must cleanse themselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, 2 Cor. 7. 1. Isa. 1. 16. 18. They were now washed all over; but afterward, when they went in to minister, they washed only their hands and feet; (ch. 30. 19.) for he that is washed, needs no more, John, 13. 10. (2.) They were to be clothed with the holy garments, (v. 5, 6, 8, 9.) to signify that it was not sufficient for them to put away the pollutions of sin, but they must put on the graces of the Spirit, be clothed with righteousness, Ps. 132. 9. They must be girded as men prepared and strengthened for their work; and they must be robed, and crowned, as men that counted their work and office their true honour. (3.) The high priest was to be anointed with the holy anointing oil, (v. 7.) that the church might be filled, and delighted, with the sweet savour of his administrations, (for sintment and perfume rejoice the heart,) and in token of the pouring out of the Spirit upon him, to qualify him for his work. Brotherly love is compared to this oil with which Aaron was anointed, Ps. 133. 2. The inferior priests are said to be anointed, (ch. 30. 30.) not on their heads, as the high priest, (Lev. 21. 10.) the oil was only mingled with the blood that was sprinkled upon their garments. (4.) Sacrifices were to be offered for them. The covenant of priesthood, as all other covenants, must be made by sacrifice.

[1.] There must be a sin-offering to make atonement for them, v. 10. 14. The law made them priests, that had infirmity, and therefore they must first offer for their own sin, before they could make atonement for the people, Heb. 7. 27, 28. They were to put their hand on the head of their sacrifice, (v. 10.) confessing that they deserved to die for their own sin, and desiring that the killing of the beast might expiate their guilt, and be accepted as a vicarious satisfaction. It was used as other sin-offerings were; only, whereas the flesh of other sin-offerings was eaten by the priests, (Lev. 10. 18.) in token of the priests' taking away the sin of the people, this was appointed to be all burnt without the camp, (v. 14.) to signify the imperfection of the legal dispensation; (as the learned Bishop Patrick notes;) for the sins of the priests themselves could not be taken away by those sacrifices, but they must expect a better High Priest, and a better sacrifice.

[2.] There must be a burnt-offering, a ram wholly burnt, to the honour of God, in token of the dedication of themselves wholly to God and to his service, as living sacrifices, kindled with the fire, and ascending in the flame, of holy love, v. 15. 18. The sin-offering must first be offered, and then the burnt-offering; for, till guilt be removed, no acceptable service can be performed, Isa. 6. 7.

[3.] There must be a peace-offering; it is called the ram of consecration, because there was more in this, peculiar to the occasion, than in the other two. In the burnt-offering, God had the glory of their priesthood, in this, they had the comfort of it: and, in token of a mutual covenant between God and them, First, The blood of the sacrifice was divided between God and them; (v. 20, 21.) part of the blood was sprinkled upon the altar round about, and part put upon them, upon their bodies, (v. 20.) and upon their garments, v. 21. Thus the benefit of the expiation made by the sacrifice was applied and assured to them, and their whole selves from head to foot sanctified to the service of God. The blood was put upon the extreme parts of the body, to signify that it was all, as it were, enclosed and taken in for God, the tip of the ear, and the great toe, not excepted. We reckon that the blood and oil, sprinkled upon garments, spotted and stained them; yet the holy oil, and the blood of the sacrifice, sprinkled upon their garments, must be looked upon as the greatest adorning imaginable to them, for they signified the blood of Christ, and the graces of the Spirit, which constitute and complete the beauty of holiness, and recommend us to God: we read of robes made white with the blood of the Lamb. Secondly, The flesh of the sacrifice, with the meat-offering annexed to it, was likewise divided between God and them, that (to speak with reverence) God and they might feast together, in token of friendship and fellowship.

1. Part of it was to be first waved before the Lord, and then burnt upon the altar; part of the flesh, (v. 22.) part of the bread, for bread and flesh must go together; (v. 23.) these were first put into the hands of Aaron to be waved to and fro, in token of their being offered to God, (who, though unseen, yet compasses us round on every side,) and then they were to be burnt upon the altar, (v. 24, 25.) for the altar was to devour God's part of the sacrifice. Thus God admitted Aaron and his sons to be his servants, and wait at his table, taking the meat of his altar from their hands. Here, in a parenthesis, as it were, comes in the law concerning the priests' part of the peace-offerings afterward, the breast and shoulder, which were now divided; Moses had the breast, and the shoulder was burnt on the altar with God's part, v. 26. 28.

2. The other part, both of the flesh of the ram, and of the bread, Aaron and his sons were to eat at the door of the tabernacle

(v. 31. 33.) to signify that he called them not only servants, but friends, John, 15. 15. He supped with them, and they with him. Their eating of the things wherewith the atonement was made, signified their receiving the atonement, as the expression is, (Rom. 5. 11.) their thankful acceptance of the benefit of it, and their joyful communion with God thereupon, which was the true intent and meaning of a feast upon a sacrifice. If any of it were left, it must be burnt, that it might not be in any danger of putrefying, and to shew that it was an extraordinary peace-offering.

Lastly, The time that was to be spent in this consecration; Seven days shalt thou consecrate them, v. 35. Though all the ceremonies were performed on the first day, yet, (1.) They were not to look upon their consecration as completed till the seven days' end, which put a solemnity upon their admission, and a distance between this and their former state, and obliged them to enter upon their work with a pause, giving them time to consider the weight and seriousness of it. This was to be observed in after-ages, v. 30. He that was to succeed Aaron in the high-priesthood must put on the holy garments seven days together, in token of a deliberate and gradual advance into his office, and that one sabbath might pass over him in his consecration. (2.) Every day of the seven, in this first consecration, a bullock was to be offered for a sin-offering, (v. 36.) which was to intimate to them, [1.] That it was of very great concern to them to get their sins pardoned, and that, though atonement was made, and they had had the comfort of it, yet they must still keep up a penitent sense of sin, and often repeat the confession of it. [2.] That those sacrifices, which were thus offered day by day to make atonement, could not make the comers thereunto perfect, for then they would have ceased to be offered, as the apostle argues, Heb. 10. 1, 2. They must therefore expect the bringing in of a better hope.

Now this consecration of the priests was a shadow of good things to come. First, Our Lord Jesus is the great High Priest of our profession, called of God to be so, consecrated for evermore, anointed with the Spirit above his fellows, whence he is called Messiah, the Christ; clothed with the holy garments, even with glory and beauty: sanctified by his own blood, not that of bullocks and rams; (Heb. 9. 12.) made perfect, or consecrated, through sufferings, Heb. 2. 10. Thus in him this was a perpetual statute, v. 9. Secondly, All believers are spiritual priests, to offer spiritual sacrifices, (1 Pet. 2. 5.) washed in the blood of Christ, and so made to our God priests, Rev. 1. 5, 6. They also are clothed with the beauty of holiness, and have received the anointing, 1 John, 2. 27. Their hands are filled with work which they must continually attend to; and it is through Christ, the Great Sacrifice, that they are dedicated to this service. His blood sprinkled upon the conscience, purged it from dead works, that they may, as priests, serve the living God. The Spirit of God (as Ainsworth notes) is called the finger of God, (Luke, 11. 20. compared with Matth. 12. 28.) and by him the merit of Christ is effectually applied to our souls, as here Moses with his finger was to put the blood upon Aaron. It is likewise intimated that gospel-ministers are to be solemnly set apart to the work of the ministry, with great deliberation and seriousness, both in the ordainers and in the ordained, as those that are to be employed in a great work, and intrusted with a great charge.

II. The consecration of the altar, which seems to have been coincident with that of the priests, and the sin-offerings which were offered every day for seven days together, had reference to the altar as well as the priests, v. 36, 37. An atonement was made for the altar. Though that was not a subject capable of sin, nor, having never yet being used, could it be said to be polluted with the sins of the people, yet, since the fall, there can be no sanctification to God, but there must first be an atonement for sin, which renders us both unworthy and unfit to be employed for God. The altar was also sanctified, not only set apart itself to a sacred use but made so holy as to sanctify the gifts that were offered upon it, Matth. 23. 19. Christ is our Altar; for our sakes he sanctified himself, that we and our performances might be sanctified and recommended to God, John, 17. 19.

38. Now this is that which thou shalt offer upon the altar; two lambs of the first year, day by day continually. 39. The one lamb thou shalt offer in the morning; and the other lamb thou shalt offer at even: 40. And with the one lamb a tenth deal of flour mingled with the fourth part of an hin of beaten oil; and the fourth part of an hin of wine for a drink-offering. 41. And the other lamb thou shalt offer at even, and shalt do thereto according to the meat-offering of the morning, and according to the drink-offering thereof, for a sweet savour, an offering made by fire unto the LORD. 42. This shall be a continual burnt-offering throughout your generations, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the LORD: where I will meet you, to speak there unto thee. 43. And there I will meet with the children of Israel, and the tabernacle shall be sanctified by my glory. 44. And I will sanctify the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar: I will sanctify also both Aaron and his sons, to minister to me in the priests' office. 45. And I will dwell amongst the children of Israel, and will be their God. 46. And they shall know that I am the LORD their God, that brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, that I may dwell amongst them: I am the LORD their God.

1. The daily service appointed; a lamb was to be offered upon the altar every morning, and a lamb every evening, each with a meat-offering, both made by fire, as a continual burnt-offering throughout their generations, v. 38. .41. Whether there were any other sacrifices to be offered or not, these were sure to be offered, at the public charge, and for the benefit and comfort of all Israel, to make atonement for their daily sins, and to be an acknowledgment to God of their daily mercies. This was that which the duty of every day required. The taking away of this daily sacrifice by Antiochus, for so many evenings and mornings, was that great calamity of the church which was foretold, Dan. 8. 11. Now, (1.) This typified the continual intercession which Christ ever lives to make, in the virtue of his satisfaction, for the continual sanctification of his church: though he offered himself once for all, yet that one offering thus becomes a continual offering. (2.) This teaches us to offer up to God the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise every day, morning and evening, in humble acknowledgment of our dependence upon him, and our obligations to him. Our daily devotions must be looked upon as the most needful of our daily works, and the most pleasant of our daily comforts: whatever business we have, this must never be omitted either morning or evening; prayer-time must be kept up as duly as meal-time: the daily sacrifices were as the daily meals in God's house, and therefore they were always attended with bread and wine; those starve their own souls, that keep not up a constant attendance on the throne of grace.

2. Great and precious promises made of God's favour to Israel, and the tokens of his special presence with them, while they thus kept up his institutions among them. He speaks as one well-pleased with the appointment of the daily sacrifice; for, before he proceeds to the other appointments that follow, he interposes these promises. It is constancy in religion that brings in the comfort of it. He promises, (1.) That he would keep up communion with them; that he would not only meet Moses, and speak to him, but that he would meet the children of Israel, (v. 43.) to accept the daily sacrifices offered up on their behalf. Note, God will not fail to give those the meeting, who diligently and conscientiously attend upon him in the ordinances of his own appointment. (2.) That he would own his own institutions, the tabernacle, the altar, the priesthood; (v. 43, 44.) he would take possession of that which was consecrated to him. Note, What is sanctified to the glory of God, shall be sanctified by his glory. If we do our part, God will do his, and will mark and fit that for himself which is in sincerity given up to him. (3.) That he would reside among them as a God in covenant with them, and would give them sure and comfortable tokens of his peculiar favour to them, and his special presence with them; (v. 45, 46.) I will dwell among the children of Israel. Note, Where God sets up the tabernacle of his ordinances, he will himself dwell: Lo, I am with you always, Matth. 28. 20. Those that abide in God's house shall have God to abide with them. I will be their God, and they shall know that I am so. Note, Those are truly happy, that have a covenant interest in God as their's, and the comfortable evidence of that interest. If we have this, we have enough, and need no more to make us happy.

CHAP. XXX.

Moses is, in this chapter, further instructed, I. Concerning the altar of incense, v. 1. .10. II. Concerning the ransom-money which the Israelites were to pay, when they were numbered, v. 11. .16. III. Concerning the laver of brass, which was set for the priests to wash in, v. 17. .21. IV. Concerning the making up of the anointing oil, and the use of it, v. 22. .33. V. Concerning the incense and perfume which were to be burned on the golden altar, v. 34. .35.

1. AND thou shalt make an altar to burn incense upon: of shittim-wood shalt thou make it. 2. A cubit shall be the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof: four square shall it be: and two cubits shall be the height thereof: the horns thereof shall be of the same. 3. And thou shalt overlay it with pure gold, the top thereof, and the sides thereof round about, and the horns thereof; and thou shalt make unto it a crown of gold round about. 4. And two golden rings shalt thou make to it under the crown of it, by the two corners thereof, upon the two sides of it shalt thou make it; and they shall be for places for the staves to bear it withal. 5. And thou shalt make the staves of shittim-wood, and overlay them with gold. 6. And thou shalt put it before the vail that is by the ark of the testimony; before the mercy-seat that is over the testimony, where I will meet with thee. 7. And Aaron shall burn thereon sweet incense every morning: when he dresseth the lamps, he shall burn incense upon it. 8. And when Aaron lighteth the lamps at even, he shall burn incense upon it, a perpetual incense before the LORD throughout your generations. 9. Ye shall offer no strange incense thereon, nor burnt-sacrifice, nor meat-offering; neither shall ye pour drink-offering thereon. 10. And Aaron shall make an atonement upon the horns of it once in a year with the blood of the sin-offering of atonements: once in the year shall he make atonement upon it throughout your generations: it is most holy unto the LORD.

The orders given concerning the altar of incense, are,

1. That it was to be made of wood, and covered with gold, pure gold, about a yard high, and half a yard square, with horns at the corners, a golden cornice round it, with rings and staves of gold, for the convenience of carrying it, v. 1..5. It does not appear that there was any grate to this altar, for the ashes to fall into, that they might be taken away; but, when they burnt incense, a golden censer was brought with coals in it, and placed upon the altar, and in that censer the incense was burnt, and with it all the coals were taken away, so that no coals or ashes fell upon the altar. The measure of the altar of incense, in Ezekiel's temple, is double to what it is here; (Ezek. 41. 22.) and it is there called an altar of wood, and there is no mention of gold, to signify that the incense, in gospel-times, should be spiritual, the worship plain, and the service of God enlarged, for in every place incense should be offered, Mal. 1. 11.

2. That it was to be placed before the veil, on the outside of that partition, but before the mercy-seat which was within the veil, v. 6. For though he that ministered at the altar could not see the mercy-seat, the veil interposing, yet he must look towards it, and direct his incense that way, to teach us, that though we cannot with our bodily eyes see the throne of grace, that blessed mercy-seat, (for it is such a throne of glory, that God, in compassion to us, holds back the face of it, and spreads a cloud upon it,) yet we must in prayer by faith set ourselves before it, direct our prayer, and look up.

3. That Aaron was to burn sweet incense upon this altar, every morning and every evening, about half a pound at a time, which was intended, not only to take away the ill smell of the flesh that was burnt daily on the brazen altar, but for the honour of God, and to shew the acceptableness of his people's services to him, and the pleasure which they should take in ministering to him, v. 7. 8. As, by the offerings on the brazen altar, satisfaction was made for what had been done displeasing to God, so, by the offering on this, what they did well, was, as it were, recommended to the divine acceptance; for our two great concerns with God are, to be acquitted from guilt, and accepted as righteous in his sight.

4. That nothing was to be offered upon it but incense, nor any incense but that which was appointed, v. 9. God will have his own service done according to his own appointment, and not otherwise.

5. That this altar should be purified with the blood of the sin-offering put upon the horns of it, every year, upon the day of atonement, v. 10. See Lev. 16. 18, 19. The high priest was to take this in his way, as he came out from the holy of holies. This was to intimate to them, that the sins of the priests who ministered at this altar, and of the people for whom they ministered, put a ceremonial impurity upon it, from which it must be cleansed by the blood of atonement.

This incense-altar typified, (1.) The mediation of Christ. The brazen altar in the court was a type of Christ dying on earth; the golden altar in the sanctuary was a type of Christ interceding in heaven, in the virtue of his satisfaction. This altar was before the mercy-seat; for Christ always appears in the presence of God for us; he is our Advocate with the Father, (1 John, 2. 1.) and his intercession is unto God of a sweet-smelling savour. This altar had a crown fixed to it; for Christ intercedes as a King, Father, I will, John, 17. 24. (2.) The devotions of the saints, whose prayers are said to be set forth before God as incense, Ps. 141. 2. As the smoke of the incense ascended, so must our desires toward God rise in prayer, being kindled with the fire of holy love and other pious affections. When the priest was burning incense, the people were praying, (Luke, 1. 10.) to signify that prayer is the true incense. This incense was offered daily, it was a perpetual incense; (v. 8.) for we must pray always, that is, we must keep up stated times for prayer every day, morning and evening, at least, and never omit it, but thus pray without ceasing. The lamps were dressed or lighted, at the same time that the incense was burnt, to teach us that the reading of the scriptures (which are our light and lamp) is a part of our daily work, and should ordinarily accompany our prayers and praises. When we speak to God, we must hear what God says to us, and thus the communion is complete. The devotions of sanctified souls are well-pleasing to God, of a sweet-smelling savour; the prayers of saints are compared to sweet odours, (Rev. 5. 8.) but it is the incense which Christ adds to them that makes them acceptable, (Rev. 8. 3.) and his blood that atones for the guilt which cleaves to our best services. And if the heart and life be not holy, even incense is an abomination, (Isa. 1. 13.) and he that offers it is as if he blessed an idol, Isa. 66. 3.

11. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying,
12. When thou takest the sum of the children of Israel after their number, then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul unto the LORD, when thou numberest them; that there be no plague amongst them, when thou numberest them.
13. This they shall give, every one that passeth among them that are numbered, half a shekel after the shekel of the sanctuary: (a shekel is twenty gerahs:) an half shekel shall be the offering of the LORD.
14. Every one that passeth among them that are numbered, from twenty years old and above, shall give an offering unto the LORD.
15. The rich shall not give more, and the poor shall not give less, than half a shekel, when they give an offering unto the LORD, to make an atonement for your souls.
16. And thou shalt take the atonement-money of the children of Israel, and shalt appoint it for the service of the tabernacle of the congregation; that it may be a memorial unto the children of Israel before the LORD, to make an atonement for your souls.

Some observe, that the repetition of those words, The Lord spake unto Moses, here and afterward, (v. 17, 22, 34.) intimates that God did not deliver these precepts to Moses in the mount, in a continued discourse, but with many intermissions, giving him time either to write what was said to him, or, at least, to charge his memory with it. Christ gave instructions to his disciples, as they were able to hear them. He is here ordered to levy money upon the people by way of poll, so much a head, for the service of the tabernacle. This he must do when he numbered the people: some think that it refers only to the first numbering of them, now when the tabernacle was set up; and that this tax was to make up what was wanting in the voluntary contributions for the finishing of the work, or rather for the beginning of the service in the tabernacle. Others think that it was afterward repeated upon any emergency, and always when the people were numbered; and that David offended in not demanding it when he numbered the people. But many of the Jewish writers, and others from them, are of opinion, that it was to be an annual tribute, only it was begun when Moses first numbered the people. This was that tribute-money which Christ paid for fear of offending his adversaries, Matth. 17. 24. when yet he shewed good reason why he should have been excused. Men were appointed in every city to receive this payment yearly. Now, 1. The tribute to be paid was half a shekel, about fifteen-pence of our money. The rich were not to give more, nor the poor less; (v. 15.) to intimate that the souls of the rich and poor are alike precious, and that God is no Respector of persons, Acts, 10. 34. Job, 34. 19. In other offerings, men were to give according to their ability, but this, which was the ransom of the soul, must be alike for all; for the rich have as much need of Christ as the poor, and the poor are as welcome to him as the rich. They both alike contributed to the maintenance of the temple-service, because both were to have a like interest in it, and benefit by it. In Christ and his ordinances, rich and poor meet together; the Lord is the Maker, the Lord Christ is the Redeemer of them both, Prov. 22. 2. The Jews say, "If a man refused to pay this tribute, he was not comprehended in the expiation." 2. This tribute was to be paid as a ransom of the soul, that there might be no plague among them. Hereby they acknowledged that they received their lives from God, that they had forfeited their lives to him, and that they depended upon his power and patience for the continuance of them; and thus they did homage to the God of their lives, and deprecated those plagues which their sins had deserved. 3. This money that was raised was to be employed in the service of the tabernacle; (v. 16.) with it they bought sacrifices, flour, incense, wine, oil, fuel, salt, priests' garments, and all other things which the whole congregation was interested in. Note, Those that have the benefit of God's tabernacle among them, must be willing to defray the expenses of it, and not grudge the necessary charges of God's public worship. Thus we must honour the Lord with our substance, and reckon that best laid out, which is laid out in the service of God. Money, indeed, cannot make an atonement for the soul, but it may be used for the honour of him who has made the atonement, and for the maintenance of the gospel by which the atonement is applied.

17. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 18. Thou shalt also make a laver of brass, and his foot also of brass, to wash withal: and thou shalt put it between the tabernacle of the congregation and the altar, and thou shalt put water therein. 19. For Aaron and his sons shall wash their hands and their feet thereat: 20. When they go into the tabernacle of the congregation, they shall wash with water, that they die not; or when they come near to the altar to minister, to burn offering made by fire unto the LORD: 21. So they shall wash their hands and their feet, that they die not: and it shall be a statute for ever to them, even to him and to his seed throughout their generations.

Orders are here given, 1. For the making of a laver, or font, of brass, a large vessel, that would contain a good quantity of water, which was to be set near the door of the tabernacle, v. 18. The foot of brass, it is supposed, was so contrived as to receive the water, which was let into it out of the laver by spouts, or cocks. They then had a laver for the priests only to wash in, but to us now there is a fountain open for Judah and Jerusalem to wash in, (Zech. 13. 1.) an inexhaustible fountain of living water, so that it is our own fault if we remain in our pollution. 2. For the using of this laver; Aaron and his sons must wash their hands and feet at this laver, every time they went in to minister, every morning, at least, v. 19. . 21. For this purpose, clean water was put into the laver fresh every day. Though they washed themselves ever so clean at their own houses, that would not serve, they must wash at the laver, because that was appointed for washing, 2 Kings, 5. 12. . 14. This was designed, (1.) To teach them purity in all their ministrations, and to possess them with a reverence of God's holiness, and a dread of the pollutions of sin. They must not only wash and be made clean, when they were first consecrated, but they must wash and be kept clean, whenever they went in to minister. He only shall stand in God's holy place, that has clean hands and a pure heart, Ps. 24. 3, 4. And, (2.) It was to teach us, who are daily to attend upon God, daily to renew our repentance for sin, and our believing application of the blood of Christ to our souls for remission; for in many things we daily offend and contract pollution, John, 13. 8, 10. Jam. 3. 2. This is the preparation we are to make for solemn ordinances; Cleanse your hands, and purify your hearts, and then draw nigh to God, Jam. 4. 8. To this law David alludes, (Ps. 26. 6.) I will wash mine hands in innocency, so will I compass thine altar, O Lord.

22. Moreover the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 23. Take thou also unto thee principal spices, of pure myrrh five hundred shekels, and of sweet cinnamon half so much, even two hundred and fifty shekels, and of sweet calamus two hundred and fifty shekels, 24. And of cassia five hundred shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary, and of oil-olive an hin: 25. And thou shalt make it an oil of holy ointment, an ointment compound after the art of the apothecary: it shall be an holy anointing oil. 26. And thou shalt anoint the tabernacle of the congregation therewith, and the ark of the testimony, 27. And the table and all his vessels, and the candlestick and his vessels, and the altar of incense, 28. And the altar of burnt-offering with all his vessels, and the laver and his foot. 29. And thou shalt sanctify them, that they may be most holy: whatsoever toucheth them shall be holy. 30. And thou shalt anoint Aaron and his sons, and consecrate them, that they may minister unto me in the priests' office. 31. And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying, This shall be an holy anointing oil unto me throughout your generations. 32. Upon man's flesh shall it not be poured, neither shall ye make any other like it, after the composition of it: it is holy, and it shall be holy unto you. 33. Whosoever compoundeth any like it, or whosoever putteth any of it upon a stranger, shall even be cut off from his people. 34. And the LORD said unto Moses, Take unto thee sweet spices, stacte, and onycha, and galbanum: these sweet spices, with pure frankincense: of each shall there be a like weight: 35. And thou shalt make it a perfume, a confection after the art of the apothecary, tempered together, pure and holy: 36. And thou shalt beat some of it very small, and put of it before the testimony in the tabernacle of the congregation, where I will meet with thee: it shall be unto you most holy. 37. And as for the perfume which thou shalt make, you shall not make to yourselves according to the composition thereof: it shall be unto thee holy for the LORD. 38. Whosoever shall make like unto that, to smell thereto, shall even be cut off from his people.

Directions are here given for the composition of the holy anointing oil and the incense that were to be used in the service of the tabernacle; with these God was to be honoured, and therefore he would appoint the making of them: for nothing comes to God but what comes from him.

1. The holy anointing oil is here ordered to be made up: the ingredients, and their quantities, are here prescribed, v. 23. .25. Interpreters are not agreed concerning them; we are sure, in general, they were the best and fittest for the purpose; they must needs be so, when the divine wisdom appointed them for the divine honour. It was to be compounded secundum artem—after the art of the apothecary; (v. 25.) the spices, which were in all near half a hundred weight, were to be infused in the oil, which was to be about five or six quarts, and then strained out, leaving an admirable sweet smell in the oil. With this oil God's tent and all the furniture of it were to be anointed; it was to be used also in the consecration of the priests, v. 26. .30. It was to be continued throughout their generations, v. 31. The tradition of the Jews is, that this very oil, which was prepared by Moses himself, lasted till near the captivity. But Bishop Patrick shews the great improbability of the tradition, and supposes that it was repeated according to the prescription here, for Solomon was anointed with it, (1 Kings, 1. 39.) and some other of the kings; and all the high priests, with such a quantity of it, that it ran down to the skirts of the garments; and we read of the making up of this ointment; (1 Chron. 9. 30.) yet all agree that in the second temple there was none of this holy oil; which he supposes was owing to a notion they had, that it was not lawful to make it up; Providence over-ruling that want, as a presage of the better union of the Holy Ghost in gospel-times, the variety of whose gifts was typified by these several sweet ingredients; to shew the excellency of holiness, there was that in the tabernacle, which was in the highest degree grateful both to the sight and to the smell. Christ's name is said to be as ointment poured forth, (Cant. 1. 3.) and the good name of Christians better than precious ointment, Eccl. 7. 1.

2. The incense which was burned upon the golden altar; this was prepared of sweet spices likewise, though not so rare and rich as those which the anointing oil was compounded of, v. 34, 35. This was prepared once a year, (the Jews say,) a pound for each day of the year, and three pounds over for the day of atonement; when it was used, it was to be beaten very small; thus it pleased the Lord to bruise the Redeemer, when he offered himself for a sacrifice of a sweet-smelling savour.

Concerning both these preparations the same law is here given, (v. 32, 33, 37, 38.) that the like should not be made for any common use. Thus God would preserve in the people's minds a reverence for his own institutions, and teach us not to profane or abuse any thing whereby God makes himself known, as they did, who invented to themselves (for their common entertainments) instruments of music like David, Amos, 6. 5. It is a great affront to God to jest with sacred things, and to make sport with the word and ordinances of God. That which is God's peculiar must not be used as a common thing.

CHAP. XXXI.

God is here drawing towards a conclusion of what he had to say to Moses upon the mount, where he had now been with him forty days and forty nights; and yet no more is recorded of what was said to him in all that time, than what we have read in the six chapters foregoing. In this, I. He appoints what workmen should be employed in the building and furnishing of the tabernacle, v. 1. .11. II. He repeats the law of the sabbath, and the religious observation of it, v. 12. .17. III. He delivers him the two tables of the testimony at parting, v. 18.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. See, I have called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah: 3. And I have filled him with the Spirit of God, in wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship, 4. To devise cunning works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, 5. And in cutting of stones, to set them, and in carving of timber, to work in all manner of workmanship. 6. And I, behold, I have given with him Aholiab, the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan: and in the hearts of all that are wise-hearted I have put wisdom, that they may make all that I have commanded thee; 7. The tabernacle of the congregation, and the ark of the testimony, and the mercy-seat that is thereupon, and all the furniture of the tabernacle, 8. And the table and his furniture, and the pure candlestick with all his furniture, and the altar of incense, 9. And the altar of burnt-offering with all his furniture, and the laver and his foot, 10. And the cloths of service, and the holy garments for Aaron the priest, and the garments of his sons, to minister in the priest's office, 11. And the anointing oil, and sweet incense for the holy place: according to all that I have commanded thee shall they do.

A great deal of fine work God had ordered to be done about the tabernacle; the materials the people were to provide, but who must put them into form? Moses himself was learned in all the learning of the Egyptians, nay, he was well-acquainted with the words of God, and the visions of the Almighty; but he knew not how to engrave or embroider; we may suppose that there were some very ingenious men among the Israelites; but they having lived all their days in bondage in Egypt, we cannot think they were any of them instructed in these curious arts. They knew how to make brick, and work in clay, but to work in gold, and cut diamonds, was what they had never been brought up to. How should the work be done with the neatness and exactness that were required, when they had no goldsmiths or jewellers but what must be made out of masons and bricklayers? We may suppose that there was a sufficient number, who would gladly be employed, and would do their best; but it would be hard to find out a proper person to preside in this work; Who was sufficient for these things? But God takes care of this matter also.

1. He nominates the persons that were to be employed, that there might be no contest about the preferment, nor envy at those that were preferred, God himself having made the choice. (1.) Bezaleel was to be the architect, or master-workman, v. 2. He was of the tribe of Judah, a tribe that God delighted to honour; the grandson of Hur, probably that Hur who had helped to hold up Moses's hand, (ch. 17.) and was at this time in commission with Aaron for the government of the people in the absence of Moses; (ch. 24. 14.) out of that family, which was of note in Israel, was this workman chosen; and it added no little honour to the family, that a branch of it was employed, though but as a mechanic, or handicraft-tradesman, for the service of the tabernacle. The Jews' tradition is, that Hur was the husband of Miriam; and then it was requisite that God should appoint him to this service, lest, if Moses himself had done it, he should have been thought partial to his own kindred, his brother Aaron also being advanced to the priesthood. God will put honour upon Moses's relations, and yet will make it to appear that he takes not the honour to himself or his own family, but that it is purely the Lord's doing. (2.) Aholiab, of the tribe of Dan, is appointed next to Bezaleel, and partner with him, v. 6. Two are better than one. Christ sent forth his disciples who were to rear the gospel-tabernacle, two and two, and we read of his two witnesses. Aholiab was of the tribe of Dan, which was one of the less honourable tribes, that the tribes of Judah and Levi might not be lifted up, as if they were to engross all the preferments; to prevent a schism in the body, God gives honour to that part which lacked, 1 Cor. 12. 24. The head cannot say to the foot, I have no need of thee. Hiram, who was the head-workman in the building of Solomon's temple, was also of the tribe of Dan, 2 Chron. 2. 14. (3.) There were others that were employed by and under these, in the several operations about the tabernacle, v. 6. Note, When God has work to do, he will never want instruments to do it with, for all hearts and heads too are under his eye, and in his hand; and those may cheerfully go about any service for God, and go on in it, who have reason to think that, one way or other, he has called them to it; for whom he calls, he will own and bear out.

2. He qualifies these persons for the service; (v. 3.) I have filled him with the Spirit of God; and, (v. 6.) in the hearts of all that are wise-hearted I have put wisdom. Note, (1.) Skill in common arts and employments is the gift of God; from him are both the faculty and the improvement of the faculty. It is he that puts even this wisdom into the inward parts, Job, 38. 36. He teaches the husbandman discretion, (Isa. 28. 26.) and the tradesman too; and he must have the praise of it. (2.) God dispenses his gifts variously, one gift to one, another to another, and all for the good of the whole body, both of mankind and of the church. Moses was fittest of all to govern Israel, but Bezaleel was fitter than he to build the tabernacle. The common benefit is very much supported by the variety of men's faculties and inclinations; the genius of some leads them to be serviceable one way, of others another way, and all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, 1 Cor. 12. 11. This forbids pride, envy, contempt, and carnal emulation, and strengthens the bond of mutual love. (3.) Those whom God calls to any service, he will either find or make fit for it. If God give the commission, he will in some measure give the qualifications, according as the service is. The work that was to be done here, was, to make the tabernacle, and the utensils of it, which are here particularly reckoned up, v. 7, &c. And for this the persons employed were enabled to work in gold, and silver, and brass. When Christ sent his apostles to rear the gospel-tabernacle, he poured out his Spirit upon them, to enable them to speak with tongues the wonderful works of God; not to work upon metal, but to work upon men; so much more excellent were the gifts, as the tabernacle to be pitched was a greater and more perfect tabernacle, as the apostle calls it, Heb. 9. 11.

12. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 13. Speak thou also unto the children of Israel, saying, Verily my sabbaths ye shall keep: for it is a sign between me and you throughout your generations; that ye may know that I am the LORD that doth sanctify you. 14. Ye shall keep the sabbath therefore; for it is holy unto you: every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death: for whosoever doeth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from among his people. 15. Six days may work be done; but in the seventh is the sabbath of rest, holy to the LORD: whosoever doeth any work in the sabbath-day, he shall surely be put to death. 16. Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the sabbath, to observe the sabbath throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant. 17. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever: for in six days the LORD made heaven and earth, and on the seventh day he rested, and was refreshed. 18. And he gave unto Moses, when he had made an end of communing with him upon mount Sinai, two tables of testimony, tables of stone, written with the finger of God.

Here is,

I. A strict command for the sanctification of the sabbath-day, v. 13. . 17. The law of the sabbath had been given them, before any other law, by way of preparation; (ch. 16. 23.) it had been inserted in the body of the moral law, in the fourth commandment; it had been annexed to the judicial law, ch. 23. 12. And here it is added to the first part of the ceremonial law, because the observation of the sabbath is indeed the hem and hedge of the whole law; where no conscience is made of that, farewell both godliness and honesty; for, in the moral law, it stands in the midst between the two tables. Some suggest that it comes in here, upon another account. Orders were now given that a tabernacle should be set up and furnished for the service of God, and with all possible expedition; but lest they should think that the nature of the work, and the haste that was required, would justify them in working at it on sabbath-days, that they might get it done the sooner, this caution is seasonably inserted, Verily, or Nevertheless, my sabbaths ye shall keep. Though they must hasten the work, yet they must not make more haste than good speed; they must not break the law of the sabbath in their haste: even tabernacle-work must give way to the sabbath-rest; so jealous is God for the honour of his sabbaths. Observe what is here said concerning the sabbath-day.

1. The nature, meaning, and intention, of the sabbath, by the declaration of which God puts an honour upon it, and teaches us to value it. Divers things are here said of the sabbath. (1.) It is a sign between me and you, (v. 13.) and again, v. 17. The institution of the sabbath was a great instance of God's favour to them, and a sign that he had distinguished them from all other people; and their religious observance of the sabbath was a great instance of their duty and obedience to him. God, by sanctifying this day among them, let them know that he sanctified them, and set them apart for himself and his service; otherwise he would not have revealed to them his holy sabbaths, to be the support of religion among them. Or, it may refer to the law concerning the sabbath, Keep my sabbaths, that ye may know that I the Lord do sanctify you. Note, If God by his grace incline our hearts to keep the law of the fourth commandment, it will be an evidence of a good work wrought in us by his Spirit. If we sanctify God's day, it is a sign between him and us, that he has sanctified our hearts: hence it is the character of the blessed man, that he keepeth the sabbath from polluting it, Isa. 56. 2. The Jews, by observing one day in seven, after six days' labour, testified and declared that they worshipped the God who made the world in six days, and rested the seventh; and so distinguished themselves from other nations, who, having first lost the sabbath, which was instituted to be a memorial of the creation, by degrees lost the knowledge of the Creator, and gave that honour to the creature which was due to him alone. (2.) It is holy unto you, (v. 14.) that is, "It is designed for your benefit as well as for God's honour;" the Sabbath was made for man. Or, "It shall be accounted holy by you, and shall so be observed, and you shall look upon it as sacrilege to profane it." (3.) It is the sabbath of rest, holy to the Lord, v. 15. It is separated from common use, and designed for the honour and service of God, and by the observance of it we are taught to rest from worldly pursuits and the service of the flesh, and to devote ourselves, and all we are, have, and can do, to God's glory. (4.) It was to be observed throughout their generations, in every age, for a perpetual covenant, v. 16. This was to be one of the most lasting tokens of that covenant which was between God and Israel.

2. The law of the sabbath; they must keep it, (v. 13, 14, 16.) keep it as a treasure, as a trust; regard it, preserve it; keep it from polluting it; keep it up as a sign between God and them; keep it, and never part with it. The Gentiles had anniversary feasts, to the honour of their gods; but it was peculiar to the Jews to have a weekly festival; this therefore they must carefully observe.

3. The reason of the sabbath; for God's laws are not only backed with the highest authority, but supported with the best reason. God's own example is the great reason, v. 17. As the work of creation is worthy to be thus commemorated, so the great Creator is worthy to be thus imitated, by a holy rest, the seventh day, after six days' labour, especially since we hope, in further conformity to the same example, shortly to rest with him from all our labours.

4. The penalty to be inflicted for the breach of this law; Every one that defileth the sabbath, by doing any work therein, but works of piety and mercy, shall be cut off from among his people; (v. 14.) he shall surely be put to death, v. 15. The magistrate must cut him off with the sword of justice, if the crime can be proved; if it cannot, or if the magistrate be remiss, and do not do his duty, God will take the work into his own hands, and cut him off by a stroke from heaven, and his family shall be rooted out of Israel. Note, The contempt and profanation of the sabbath-day is an iniquity to be punished by the judges; and if men do not punish it, God will, here or hereafter, unless it be repented of.

II. The delivering of the two tables of testimony to Moses; God had promised him these tables when he called him up into the mount, (ch. 24. 12.) and now, when he was sending him down, he delivered them to him, to be carefully and honourably deposited in the ark, v. 18. 1. The ten commandments, which God had spoken upon mount Sinai in the hearing of all the people, were now written, in perpetuum rei memoriam—for a perpetual memorial: because that which is written remains. 2. They were written in tables of stone, prepared, not by Moses, as it should seem, (for it is intimated, (ch. 24. 12.) that he found them ready written when he went up to the mount,) but, as some think, by the ministry of angels. The law was written in tables of stone, to denote the perpetual duration of it; (what can be supposed to last longer than that which is written in stone, and laid up?) to denote likewise the hardness of our hearts; one might more easily write in stone, than write anything that is good in our corrupt and sinful hearts. 3. They were written with the finger of God, that is, by his will and power immediately, without the use of any instrument. It is God only that can write his law in the heart; he gives a heart of flesh, and then, by his Spirit, which is the finger of God, he writes his will in the fleshy tables of the heart, 2 Cor. 3. 3. 4. They were written in two tables, being designed to direct us in our duty both toward God and toward man. 5. They are called tables of testimony, because this written law testified both the will of God concerning them, and his good-will toward them, and would be a testimony against them, if they were disobedient. 6. They were delivered to Moses, probably, with a charge, before he laid them up in the ark, to shew them publicly, that they might be seen and read of all men, and so what they had heard with the hearing of the ear might now be brought to their remembrance. Thus the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ.

CHAP. XXXII.

It is a very lamentable interruption which the story of this chapter gives to the record of the establishment of the church and of religion among the Jews. Things went on admirably well toward that happy settlement: God had shewed himself very favourable, and the people also had seemed to be pretty tractable; Moses had now almost completed his forty days upon the mount, and we may suppose, was pleasing himself with the thoughts of the very joyful welcome he should have to the camp of Israel at his return, and the speedy setting up of the tabernacle among them. But, behold, the measures are broken, the sin of Israel turns away those good things from them, and puts a stop to the current of God's favours; the sin that did the mischief, (would you think it?) was, worshipping a golden calf. The marriage was ready to be solemnized between God and Israel, but Israel plays the harlot, and so the match is broken, and it will be no easy matter to piece it again. Here is, I. The sin of Israel, and of Aaron particularly, in making the golden calf for a god, (v. 1. .4.) and worshipping it, v. 5, 6. II. The notice which God gave of this to Moses, who was now in the mount with him, (v. 7, 8.) and the sentence of his wrath against them, v. 9, 10. III. The intercession which Moses immediately made for them in the mount, (v. 11. .13.) and the prevalence of that intercession, v. 14. IV. His coming down from the mount, when he became an eye-witness of their idolatry, (v. 15. .19.) in abhorrence of which, and as an expression of just indignation, he brake the tables, (v. 19.) and burnt the golden calf, v. 22. V. The examination of Aaron about it, v. 21. .24. VI. Execution done upon the ring-leaders in the idolatry, v. 25. .29. VII. The further intercession Moses made for them, to turn away the wrath of God from them, (v. 30. .32.) and a reprieve granted thereupon, reserving them for a further reckoning, v. 33. .35.

1. AND when the people saw that Moses delayed to come down out of the mount, the people gathered themselves together unto Aaron, and said unto him, Up, make us gods, which shall go before us; for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him. 2. And Aaron said unto them, Break off the golden ear-rings, which are in the ears of your wives, of your sons, and of your daughters, and bring them unto me. 3. And all the people brake off the golden ear-rings which were in their ears, and brought them unto Aaron. 4. And he received them at their hand, and fashioned it with a graving tool, after he had made it a molten calf: and they said, These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt. 5. And when Aaron saw it, he built an altar before it; and Aaron made proclamation, and said, To-morrow is a feast to the LORD. 6. And they rose up early on the morrow, and offered burnt-offerings, and brought peace-offerings; and the people sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to play.

While Moses was in the mount, receiving the law from God, the people had time to meditate upon what had been delivered, and prepare themselves for what was further to be revealed, and forty days was little enough for that work; but, instead of that, there were those among them that were contriving how to break the laws they had already received, and to anticipate those which they were in expectation of. On the thirty-ninth day of the forty, the plot broke out of rebellion against the Lord.

Here is,

I. A tumultuous address which the people made to Aaron, who was intrusted with the government, in the absence of Moses; (v. 1.) Up, make us gods, which shall go before us. 1. See the ill effect of Moses's absence from them; if he had not had God's call both to go and stay, he had not been altogether free from blame. Those that have the charge of others, as magistrates, ministers, and masters of families, ought not, without just cause, to absent themselves from their charge, lest Satan get advantage thereby. 2. See the fury and violence of a multitude, when they are influenced and corrupted by such as lie in wait to deceive. Some few, it is likely, were at first possessed with this humour, while many, who would never have thought of it, if they had not put it into their hearts, were brought to follow their pernicious ways; and, presently, such a multitude were carried down this stream, that the few who abhorred the proposal durst not so much as enter their protestation against it. Behold how great a matter a little fire kindles!

Now what was the matter with this giddy multitude?

(1.) They were weary of waiting for the promised land. They thought themselves detained too long at mount Sinai; though there they lay very safe and very easy, well-fed and well-taught, yet they were impatient to be going forward; they had a God that stayed with them, and manifested his presence with them by the cloud, but that would not serve, they must have a God to go before them; they are for hastening to the land flowing with milk and honey, and cannot stay to take their religion along with them. Note, Those that would anticipate God's counsels are commonly precipitate in their own. We must first wait for God's law before we catch at his promises. He that believeth doth not make haste; not more haste than good speed.

(2.) They were weary of waiting for the return of Moses. When he went up into the mount, he had not told them, (for God had not told him,) how long he must stay; and therefore, when he had outstaid their time, though they were every way well-provided for, in his absence, some had people advanced I know not what surmises concerning his delay; As for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him. Observe, [1.] How slightly they speak of his person, this Moses. Thus ungrateful are they to Moses, who had shewed such a tender concern for them, and thus do they walk contrary to God. While God delights to put honour upon him, they delight to put contempt upon him, and this to the face of Aaron his brother, and now his viceroy. Note, The greatest merits cannot secure men from the greatest indignities and affronts in this ungrateful world. [2.] How suspiciously they speak of this delay; We wot not what is become of him. They thought he was either consumed by the devouring fire, or starved for want of food, as if that God, who kept and fed them that were so unworthy, would not take care for the protection and supply of Moses his favourite. Some of them, that were willing to think well of Moses, perhaps suggested that he was translated to heaven like Enoch, while others, that cared not how ill they thought of him, insinuated that he had outrun his undertaking, as unable to go on with it, and was returned to his father-in-law to keep his flock. All these suggestions were perfectly groundless and absurd, nothing could be more so; it was easy to tell what was become of him: he was seen to go into the cloud, and the cloud he went into was still seen by all Israel upon the top of the mount; they had all the reason in the world to conclude that he was safe there; if the Lord had been pleased to kill him, he would not have shewed him such favours as these. If he tarried long, it was because God had a great deal to say to him, for their good; he resided upon the mount as their ambassador, and he would certainly return, as soon as he had finished the business he went upon; and yet they make this the colour for their wicked proposal—We wot not what is become of him. Note, First, Those that are resolved to think ill, when they have ever so much reason to think well, commonly pretend that they know not what to think. Secondly, Misinterpretations of our Redeemer's delays are the occasion of a great deal of wickedness. Our Lord Jesus is gone up into the mount of glory, where he is appearing in the presence of God for us, but out of our sight; the heavens must contain him, must conceal him, that we may live by faith. There he has been long, there he is yet; hence unbelievers suggest that they wot not what is become of him; and ask, Where is the promise of his coming? (2 Pet. 3. 4.) as if, because he is not come yet, he would never come. The wicked servant imboldens himself in his impieties, with this consideration, My Lord delays his coming. Thirdly, Weariness in waiting betrays us to a great many temptations. This began Saul's ruin; he staid for Samuel to the last hour of the time appointed, but had not patience to stay that hour; (1 Sam. 13. 8, &c.) so Israel here, if they could but have staid one day longer, would have seen what was become of Moses. The Lord is a God of judgment, and must be waited for till he comes, waited for though he tarry; and then we shall not lose our labour, for he that shall come will come, and will not tarry.

(3.) They were weary of waiting for a divine institution of religious worship among them, for that was the thing they were now in expectation of. They were told that they must serve God in this mountain, and fond enough they would be of the pomp and ceremony of it; but, because that was not appointed them so soon as they wished, they would set their own wits on work to devise signs of God's presence with them, and would glory in them, and have a worship of their own invention, probably, such as they had seen among the Egyptians; for Stephen says, that when they said unto Aaron, Make us gods, they did, in heart, turn back into Egypt, Acts. 7. 39, 40. This was a very strange motion, Up, make us gods. If they wot not what was become of Moses, and thought him lost, it had been decent for them to have appointed a solemn mourning for him for certain days; but see how soon so great a benefactor is forgotten. If they had said, "Moses is lost, make us a governor," there had been some sense in it, though a great deal of ingratitude to the memory of Moses, and contempt of Aaron and Hur, who were left lords-justices in his absence; but to say, Moses is lost, make us a god, was the greatest absurdity imaginable. Was Moses their god? Had he ever pretended to be so? Whatever was become of Moses, was it not evident, beyond contradiction, that God was still with them? And had they any room to question his leading of their camp, who victualled it so well every day? Could they have any other god that would provide so well for them as he had done, nay as he now did? And yet, Make us gods, which shall go before us! Gods? How many would they have? Is not one sufficient? Make us gods; and what good would gods of their own making do them? They must have such gods to go before them as could not go themselves further than they were carried! So wretchedly besotted and intoxicated are idolaters: they are mad upon their idols, Jer. 50. 38.

II. Here is the demand which Aaron makes of their jewels thereupon: (v. 2.) Bring me your golden ear-rings. We do not find that he said one word to discountenance their proposal; he did not reprove their insolence, did not reason with them to convince them of the sin and folly of it, but seemed to approve the motion, and shewed himself not unwilling to humour them in it. One would hope he designed, at first, only to make a jest of it, and, by setting up a ridiculous image among them, to expose the motion, and shew them the folly of it. But if so, it proved ill-jesting with sin, just as it is of dangerous consequence for the unwary fly to play about the candle. Some charitably suppose, that when Aaron bid them break off their ear-rings, and bring him those, he did it with design to crush the proposal; believing, that, though their covetousness would have let them lavish gold out of the bag to make an idol of, (Isa. 46. 6.) yet their pride would not have suffered them to part with their golden ear-rings. But it is not safe to try how far men's sinful lusts will carry them in a sinful way, and what expence they will be at; it proved here a dangerous experiment.

III. Here is the making of the golden calf, v. 3, 4. 1. The people brought in their ear-rings to Aaron, whose demand of them, instead of discouraging the motion, perhaps did rather gratify their superstition, and beget in them a fancy that the gold taken from their ears would be the most acceptable, and would make the most valuable god. Let their readiness to part with their rings to make an idol of, shame us out of our niggardliness in the services of the true God. Did they not draw back from the charge of their idolatry? And shall we grudge the expences of our religion, or starve so good a cause? 2. Aaron melted down their rings, and, having a mould prepared for the purpose, poured the melted gold into it, and then produced it in the shape of an ox or calf, giving it some finishing strokes with a graving tool. Some think that Aaron chose this figure for a sign or token of the divine presence, because he thought the head and horns of an ox a proper emblem of the divine power, and yet, being so plain and common a thing, he hoped the people would not be so sottish as to worship it. But it is probable that they had learnt of the Egyptians thus to represent the Deity, for it is said, (Ezek. 20. 8.) They did not forsake the idols of Egypt, and, (ch. 23. 8.) Neither left she her whoredoms brought from Egypt. Thus they changed their glory into the similitude of an ox, (Ps. 106. 20.) and proclaimed their own folly, beyond that of other idolaters, who worshipped the host of heaven.

IV. Having made the calf in Horeb, they worshipped the graven image, Ps. 106. 19. 1. Aaron, seeing the people fond of their calf, was willing yet further to humour them, and he built an altar before it, and proclaimed a feast to the honour of it, (v. 5.) a feast of dedication. Yet he calls it a feast to Jehovah: for, brutish as they were, they did not imagine that this image was itself a god, nor did they design to terminate their adoration in the image, but they made it for a representation of the true God, whom they intended to worship in and through this image; and yet this did not excuse them from gross idolatry, any more than it will excuse the Papists, whose plea it is, that they do not worship the image, but God by the image; so making themselves just such idolaters as the worshippers of the golden calf, whose feast was a feast to Jehovah, and proclaimed to be so, that the most ignorant and unthinking might not mistake it. 2. The people are forward enough to celebrate this feast; (v. 6.) They rose up early on the morrow, to shew how well pleased they were with the solemnity, and, according to the ancient rites of worship, they offered sacrifice to this new-made deity, and then feasted upon the sacrifice; thus having, at the expence of their ear-rings, made their god, they endeavour, at the expence of their beasts, to make this god propitious. Had they offered these sacrifices immediately to Jehovah, without the intervention of an image, they might (for aught I know) have been accepted, (ch. 20. 24.) but, having set up an image before them, as a symbol of God's presence, and so changed the truth of God into a lie, these sacrifices were an abomination, nothing could be more so. When this idolatry of their's is spoken of in the New Testament, the account of their feast upon the sacrifice is quoted and referred to; (1 Cor. 10. 7.) They sat down to eat and drink of the remainder of what was sacrificed, and then rose up to play; to play the fool, to play the wanton. Like god, like worship. They would not have made a calf their god, if they had not first made their belly their god; but when the god was a jest, no marvel that the service was sport; being vain in their imaginations, they became vain in their worship, so great was this vanity.

Now, (1.) It was strange that any of the people, especially so great a number of them, should do such a thing. Had they not, but the other day, in this very place, heard the voice of the Lord God speaking to them out of the midst of the fire, Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image? Had they not heard the thunder, seen the lightnings, and felt the earthquake, with the dreadful pomp of which this law was given? Had they not been particularly cautioned not to make gods of gold? ch. 20. 23. Nay, had they not themselves solemnly entered into covenant with God, and promised that all that which he had said unto them they would do, and would be obedient? ch. 24. 7. And yet, before they stirred from the place where this covenant had been solemnly ratified, and before the cloud was removed from the top of mount Sinai, thus to break an express command, in defiance of an express threatening, that this iniquity should be visited upon them and their children—what shall we think of it? It is a plain indication that the law was no more able to sanctify, than it was to justify; by it is the knowledge of sin, but not the cure of it. This is intimated in the emphasis laid upon the place where this sin was committed; (Ps. 106. 19.) They made a calf in Horeb, the very place where the law was given. It was otherwise with those that received the gospel; they immediately turned from idols, 1 Thess. 1. 9.

(2.) It was especially strange that Aaron should be so deeply concerned in this sin, that he should make the calf, and proclaim the feast! Is this Aaron, the saint of the Lord; the brother of Moses his prophet, that could speak so well, (ch. 4. 14.) and yet speaks not one word against this idolatry? Is this he that had not only seen, but had been employed in summoning, the plagues of Egypt, and the judgments executed upon the gods of the Egyptians? What! and yet himself copying out the abandoned idolatries of Egypt? With what face could they say, These are thy gods that brought thee out of Egypt, when they thus bring the idolatry of Egypt (the worst thing there) along with them? Is this Aaron, who had been with Moses in the mount, (ch. 19. 24.—24. 9.) and knew that there was no manner of similitude seen there, by which they might make an image? Is this Aaron, who was intrusted with the care of the people, in the absence of Moses? Is he aiding and abetting in this rebellion against the Lord? How was it possible that he should ever do so sinful a thing? Either he was strangely surprised into it, and did it when he was half asleep; or he was frightened into it by the outrages of the rabble. The Jews have a tradition, that his colleague Hur opposing it, the people fell upon him and stoned him, (and therefore we never read of him after,) and that this frightened Aaron into a compliance. And God left him to himself, [1.] To teach us what the best of men are when they are so left, that we may cease from man, and that he who thinks he stands may take heed lest he fall. [2.] Aaron was, at this time, destined by the divine appointment to the great office of the priesthood; though he knew it not, Moses in the mount did; now, lest he should be lifted up above measure with the honours that were to be put upon him, a messenger of Satan was suffered to prevail over him, that the remembrance thereof might keep him humble all his days. He who had once shamed himself so far as to build an altar to a golden calf, must own himself altogether unworthy of the honour of attending at the altar of God, and purely indebted to free grace for it. Thus pride and boasting were for ever silenced, and a good effect brought out of a bad cause. By this likewise it was shewed that the law made them priests which had infirmity, and needed first to offer for their own sins.

7. And the LORD said unto Moses, Go, get thee down; for thy people, which thou broughtest out of the land of Egypt, have corrupted themselves: 8. They have turned aside quickly out of the way which I commanded them: they have made them a molten calf, and have worshipped it, and have sacrificed thereunto, and said, These be thy gods, O Israel, which have brought thee up out of the land of Egypt. 9. And the LORD said unto Moses, I have seen this people, and, behold, it is a stiff-necked people: 10. Now therefore let me alone, that my wrath may wax hot against them, and that I may consume them: and I will make of thee a great nation. 11. And Moses besought the LORD his God, and said, LORD, why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people, which thou hast brought forth out of the land of Egypt with great power, and with a mighty hand? 12. Wherefore should the Egyptians speak, and say, For mischief did he bring them out, to slay them in the mountains, and to consume them from the face of the earth? Turn from thy fierce wrath, and repent of this evil against thy people. 13. Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, thy servants, to whom thou swarest by thine own self, and saidst unto them, I will multiply your seed as the stars of heaven, and all this land that I have spoken of will I give unto your seed, and they shall inherit it for ever. 14. And the LORD repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people.

Here,

1. God acquaints Moses with what was doing in the camp, while he was absent, v. 7, 8. He could have told him sooner, as soon as the first step was taken towards it, and have hastened him down to prevent it; but he suffered it to come to this height, for wise and holy ends, and then sent him down to punish it. Note, It is no reproach to the holiness of God, that he suffers sin to be committed, since he knows, not only how to restrain it when he pleases, but how to make it serviceable to the designs of his own glory. Observe what God here says to Moses concerning this sin. 1. That they had corrupted themselves. Sin is the corruption or depravation of the sinner, and it is a self-corruption; every man is tempted when he is drawn aside of his own lust. 2. That they had turned aside out of the way. Sin is a deviation from the way of our duty into a by-path; when they promised to do all that God should command them, they set out as fair as could be; but now they missed their way, and turned aside. 3. That they had turned aside quickly; quickly after the law was given them, and they had promised to obey it; quickly after God had done such great things for them, and declared his kind intentions to do greater. They soon forgot his works. To fall into sin quickly after we have renewed our covenants with God, or received special mercy from him, is very provoking. 4. He tells him particularly what they had done; They have made a calf, and worshipped it. Note, Those sins which are concealed from our governors are naked and open before God. He sees that which they cannot discover, nor is any of the wickedness of the world hid from him. We could not bear to see the thousandth part of that provocation which God sees every day, and yet keeps silence. 5. He seems to disown them, in saying to Moses, They are thy people which thou broughtest up out of the land of Egypt; as if he had said, "I will not own any relation to them, or concern for them; let it never be said that they are my people, or that I brought them out of Egypt." Note, Those that corrupt themselves, not only shame themselves, but even make God himself ashamed of them, and of his kindness to them. 6. He sends him down to them with all speed; Go, get thee down. He must break off even his communion with God, to go and do his duty as a magistrate among the people; so must Joshua, ch. 7. 10. Every thing is beautiful in its season.

II. He expresses his displeasure against Israel for this sin, and the determination of his justice to cut them off, v. 9, 10. 1. He gives this people their true character; "It is a stiff-necked people, unapt to come under the yoke of the divine law, and governed, as it were, by a spirit of contradiction, averse to all good, and prone to evil; obstinate against the methods employed for their cure." Note, The righteous God sees, not only what we do, but what we are; not only the actions of our lives, but the dispositions of our spirits, and has an eye to them in all his proceedings. 2. He declares what was their just desert—that his wrath should wax hot against them, so as to consume them at once, and blot out their name from under heaven; (Deut. 9. 14.) not only cast them out of covenant, but chase them out of the world. Note, Sin exposes us to the wrath of God; and that wrath, if it be not allayed by divine mercy, will burn us up as stubble. It was just with God to let the law have its course against sinners, and to cut them off immediately in the very act of sin; and if he should do so, it would be neither loss nor dishonour to him. 3. He desires Moses (though in a gentle manner) not to intercede for them; Therefore let me alone. What did Moses, or what could he do, to hinder God from consuming them? When God resolves to abandon a people, and the decree of ruin is gone forth, no intercession can prevent it, Ezek. 14. 14. Jer. 15. 1. But God would thus express the greatness of his just displeasure against them, after the manner of men who would have none to intercede for those they resolve to be severe with. Thus also he would put an honour upon prayer, intimating that nothing but the intercession of Moses could save them from ruin, that he might be a type of Christ, by whose mediation alone God would reconcile the world unto himself. That the intercession of Moses might appear the more illustrious, God fairly offers him, that, if he would not interpose in this matter, he would make of him a great nation; that either, in process of time, he would raise up a people out of his loins, or that he would immediately, by some means or other, bring another great nation under his government and conduct, so that he should be no loser by their ruin. Had Moses been of a narrow selfish spirit, he would have closed with this offer; but he prefers the salvation of Israel before the advancement of his own family: hand was a man fit to be a governor.

III. Moses earnestly intercedes with God on their behalf; (v. 11. . 13.) he besought the Lord his God. If God would not be called the God of Israel, yet he hoped he might address him as his own God. What interest we have at the throne of grace we should improve for the church of God, not for our friends.

Now Moses is standing in the gap to turn away the wrath of God, Ps. 106. 23. He wisely took the hint which God gave him, when he said, Let me alone; which, though it seemed to forbid his interceding, did really encourage it, by shewing what power the prayer of faith has with God. In such a case, God wonders if there be no intercessor, Isa. 59. 16.

Observe, 1. His prayer; (v. 12.) Turn from thy fierce wrath; not as if he thought God was not justly angry; but he begs that he would not be so greatly angry as to consume them. "Let mercy rejoice against judgment; repent of this evil; change the sentence of destruction into that of correction."

2. His pleas. He fills his mouth with arguments, not to move God, but to express his own faith, and to excite his own fervency in prayer. He urges,

(1.) God's interest in them, the great things he had already done for them, and the vast expence of favours and miracles he had been at upon them, v. 11. God had said to Moses, (v. 7.) They are thy people which thou broughtest up out of Egypt; but Moses humbly turns them back upon God again, "They are thy people, thou art their Lord and Owner, I am but their servant; thou broughtest them forth out of Egypt, I was but the instrument in thy hand; that was done in order to their deliverance, which thou only couldst do." Though their being his people was a reason why he should be angry with them for setting up another god, yet it was a reason why he should not be angry with them, so as to consume them. Nothing is more natural than for a father to correct his son, but nothing more unnatural than for a father to slay his son. And as the relation is a good plea, ("They are thy people,") so is the experience they had had of his kindness to them; "Thou broughtest them out of Egypt, though they were unworthy, and had there served the gods of the Egyptians, Josh. 24. 15. If thou didst that for them, notwithstanding their sins in Egypt, wilt thou undo it for their sins of the same nature in the wilderness?"

(2.) He pleads the concern of God's glory; (v. 12.) Wherefore should the Egyptians say, For mischief did he bring them out? Israel is dear to Moses, as his kindred, as his charge; but it is the glory of God that he is most concerned for, that lies nearer his heart than any thing else. If Israel could perish without any reproach to God's name, Moses could persuade himself to sit down contented; but he cannot bear to hear God reflected on, and therefore this he insists upon, Lord, what will the Egyptians say? Their eyes, and the eyes of all the neighbouring nations, were now upon Israel; from the wondrous beginnings of that people, they raised their expectations of something great in their latter end; but if a people, so strangely saved, should be suddenly ruined, what would the world say of it, especially the Egyptians, who have such an implacable hatred both to Israel and to the God of Israel? They will say, "God was either weak, and could not, or fickle, and would not, complete the salvation he began; he brought them forth to that mountain, not to sacrifice, (as was pretended,) but to be sacrificed." They will not consider the provocation given by Israel to justify the proceeding, but will think it cause enough for triumph that God and his people could not agree, but that their God had done that which they (the Egyptians) wished to see done. Note, The glorifying of God's name, as it ought to be our first petition, (it is so in the Lord's prayer,) so it ought to be our great plea; (Ps. 79. 9.) Do not disgrace the throne of thy glory; (Jer. 14. 21.) and see Jer. 33. 8, 9. And if we would with comfort plead this with God, as a reason why he should not destroy us, we ought to plead it with ourselves as a reason why we should not offend him; What will the Egyptians say? We ought always to be very careful that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed through us.

(3.) He pleads God's promise to the patriarchs that he would multiply their seed, and give them the land of Canaan for an inheritance, and this promise confirmed by an oath, an oath by himself, since he could swear by no greater, v. 13. God's promises are to be our pleas in prayer; for what he has promised he is able to perform, and the honour of his truth is engaged for the performance of it. "Lord, if Israel be cut off, what will become of the promise? Shall their unbelief make that of no effect? God forbid." Thus we must take our encouragement in prayer from God only.

IV. God graciously abates the rigour of the sentence, and repented of the evil he thought to do; (v. 14.) though he designed to punish them, yet he would not ruin them. See here, 1. The power of prayer; God suffers himself to be prevailed with by the humble believing importunity of intercessors. 2. The compassion of God toward poor sinners, and how ready he is to forgive. Thus he has given other proofs beside his own oath, that he has no pleasure in the death of them that die; for he not only pardons, upon the repentance of sinners, but spares and repleves, upon the intercession of others for them.

15. And Moses turned, and went down from the mount, and the two tables of the testimony were in his hand: the tables were written on both their sides; on the one side and on the other were they written. 16. And the tables were the work of God, and the writing was the writing of God, graven upon the tables. 17. And when Joshua heard the noise of the people as they shouted, he said unto Moses, There is a noise of war in the camp. 18. And he said, It is not the voice of them that shout for mastery, neither is it the voice of them that cry for being overcome: but the noise of them that sing do I hear. 19. And it came to pass, as soon as he came nigh unto the camp, that he saw the calf, and the dancing: and Moses' anger waxed hot, and he cast the tables out of his hands, and brake them beneath the mount. 20. And he took the calf which they had made, and burnt it in the fire, and ground it to powder, and strawed it upon the water, and made the children of Israel drink of it.

Here is,

I. The favour of God to Moses, in trusting him with the two tables of the testimony, though of common stone, yet far more valuable than all the precious stones that adorned the breast-plate of Aaron. The topaz of Ethiopia could not equal them, v. 15, 16. God himself, without the ministry either of man or angel, (for aught that appears,) wrote the ten commandments on these tables, on both their sides, some on one table and some on the other, so that they were folded together like a book, to be deposited in the ark.

II. The familiarity between Moses and Joshua. While Moses was in the cloud, as in the presence-chamber, Joshua continued as near as he might in the anti-chamber, (as it were,) waiting till Moses came out, that he might be ready to attend him; and though he was all alone for forty days, (ied, it is likely, with manna,) yet he was not weary of waiting, as the people were, but when Moses came down he came with him, and not till then. And here we are told what constructions they put upon the noise that they heard in the camp, v. 17, 18. Though Moses had been so long in immediate converse with God, yet he did not disdain to talk freely with his servant Joshua. Those whom God advances he preserves from being puffed up. Nor did he disdain to talk of the affairs of the camp. Blessed Paul was not the less mindful of the church on earth, for his having been in the third heavens, where he heard unspeakable words. Joshua, who was a military man, and had the command of the train-bands, feared there was a noise of war in the camp, and then he would be missed; but Moses, having received notice of it from God, better distinguished the sound, and was aware that it was the voice of them that sing; but it does not appear that he told Joshua what he knew of the occasion of their singing; for we should not be forward to proclaim men's faults, they will be known too soon.

III. The great and just displeasure of Moses against Israel for their idolatry. Knowing what to expect, he was presently aware of the golden calf, and the sport the people made with it: he saw how merry they could be in his absence, how soon he was forgotten among them, and what little thought they had of him and his return. He might justly take this ill, as an affront to himself, but that was the least part of the grievance; he resented it as an offence to God, and the scandal of his people. See what a change it is, to come down from the mount of communion with God to converse with a world that lies in wickedness; in God we see nothing but what is pure and pleasant, in the world nothing but pollution and provocation. Moses was the meekest man on the earth, and yet, when he saw the calf, and the dancing, his anger waxed hot. Note, It is no breach of the law of meekness to shew our displeasure at the wickedness of the wicked. Those are angry, and sin not, that are angry at sin only, not as against themselves, but as against God. Ephesus is famous for patience, and yet cannot bear them which are evil, Rev. 2. 2. It becomes us to be cool in our own cause, but warm in God's. Moses shewed himself very angry, both by breaking the tables, and burning the calf, that he might, by these expressions of strong indignation, awaken the people to a sense of the greatness of the sin they had been guilty of, which they would have been ready to make light of, if he had not thus shewed his resentments, as one in earnest for their convictions.

1. To convince them that they had forfeited and lost the favour of God, he brake the tables, v. 19. Though God knew of their sin before Moses came down, yet he did not order him to leave the tables behind him, but gave them him, to take down in his hand, that the people might see how forward God was to take them into covenant with himself, and that nothing but their own sin prevented it; yet he put it into his heart, when the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered, (as the expression is, Hosea, 7. 1.) to break their tables before their eyes, (as it is Deut. 9. 17.) that the sight of it might the more affect them, and fill them with confusion, when they saw what blessings they had lost. Thus, they being guilty of so notorious an infraction of the treaty now on foot, the writings were torn, then when they lay ready to be sealed. Note, The greatest sign of God's displeasure, against any person or people, is his taking of his law from them. The breaking of the tables is the breaking of the staff of beauty and band; (Zech. 11. 10, 14.) it leaves a people unchurched and undone. Some think that Moses sinned in breaking the tables, and observe, that, when men are angry, they are in danger of breaking all God's commandments; but it rather seems to be an act of justice than of passion, and we do not find that he himself speaks of it afterward (Deut. 9. 17.) with any regret.

2. To convince them that they had betaken themselves to a god that could not help them, he burnt the calf, (v. 20.) melted it down, and then filed it to dust; and that the powder to which it was reduced might be taken notice of throughout the camp, he strawed it upon that water which they all drank of. That it might appear that an idol is nothing in the world, (1 Cor. 8. 4.) he reduced this to atoms, that it might be as near nothing as could be. To shew that false gods cannot help their worshippers, he here shewed that this could not save itself, Isa. 46. 1, 2. And to teach us that all the relics of idolatry ought to be abolished, and that the names of Baalim should be taken away, the very dust to which it was ground was scattered. Filings of gold are precious, (we say,) and therefore are carefully gathered up; but the filings of the golden calf were odious, and must be scattered with detestation. Thus the idols of silver and gold must be cast to the moles and the bats, (Isa. 2. 20.—30. 22.) and Ephraim shall say, What have I to do any more with idols? His mixing this powder with their drink, signified to them that the curse they had thereby brought upon themselves would mingle itself with all their enjoyments, and embitter them; it would enter into their bowels like water, and like oil into their bones. The backslider in heart shall be filled with his own ways; he shall drink as he brews. These were indeed waters of Marah.

21. And Moses said unto Aaron, What did this people unto thee, that thou hast brought so great a sin upon them? 22. And Aaron said, Let not the anger of my lord wax hot: thou knowest the people, that they are set on mischief. 23. For they said unto me, Make us gods, which shall go before us: for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him. 24. And I said unto them, Whosoever hath any gold, let them break it off. So they gave it me: then I cast it into the fire, and there came out this calf. 25. And when Moses saw that the people were naked; (for Aaron had made them naked unto their shame amongst their enemies:) 26. Then Moses stood in the gate of the camp, and said, Who is on the LORD's side? let him come unto me. And all the sons of Levi gathered themselves together unto him. 27. And he said unto them, Thus saith the LORD God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbour. 28. And the children of Levi did according to the word of Moses: and there fell of the people that day about three thousand men. 29. For Moses had said, Consecrate yourselves to-day to the LORD, even every man upon his son and upon his brother; that he may bestow upon you a blessing this day.

Moses having shewed his just indignation against the sin of Israel, by breaking the tables and burning the calf, now proceeds to reckon with the sinners, and to call them to an account; herein acting as God's representative, who is not only a holy God, and hates sin, but a just God, and is engaged in honour to punish it, Isa. 59. 18. Now,

1. He begins with Aaron, as God began with Adam, because he was the principal person, though not first in the transgression, but drawn into it. Observe here,

1. The just reproof Moses gives him, v. 21. He does not order him to be cut off as those (v. 27.) that had been the ring-leaders in the sin. Note, A great deal of difference will be made between those that presumptuously rush into sin, and those that through infirmity are surprised into it; between those that overtake the fault that flees from them, and those that are overtaken in the fault they flee from: see Gal. 6. 1. Not but that Aaron deserved to have been cut off for this sin, and had been so, if Moses had not interceded particularly for him, as appears Dent. 9. 20. And having prevailed with God for him, to save him from ruin, he here expostulates with him, to bring him to repentance. He puts Aaron upon considering, (1.) What he had done to his people; Thou hast brought so great a sin upon them. The sin of idolatry is a great sin, so great a sin, that the evil of it cannot be expressed; the people, as the first movers, might be said to bring the sin upon

Aaron; but he, being a magistrate, who should have suppressed it, and yet aiding and abetting it, might truly be said to bring it upon them, because he hardened their hearts and strengthened their hands in it. It is a bad thing for governors to humour people in their sins, and give countenance to that to which they should be a terror. Observe, in general, Those who bring sin upon others, either by drawing them into it, or encouraging them in it, do more mischief than they are aware of; we really hate those whom we either bring or suffer sin upon, Lev. 19. 17. Those that share in sin help to break their partners, and really ruin one another. (2.) What moved him to it; What did this people unto thee? He takes it for granted that it must needs be something more than ordinary that prevailed with Aaron to do such a thing, thus insinuating an excuse for him, because he knew that his heart was upright; What did they? Did they accost thee fairly, and wheedle thee into it; and dost thou displease thy God to please the people? Did they overcome thee by importunity; and hadst thou so little resolution left as to yield to the stream of a popular clamour? Did they threaten to stone thee; and couldst not thou have opposed God's threatenings to their's, and frightened them worse than they could frighten thee? Note, We must never be drawn into sin by any thing that man can say or do to us, for it will not justify us, to say that we were so drawn in. Men can but tempt us to sin, they cannot force us. Men can but frighten us; if we do not comply, they cannot hurt us.

2. The frivolous excuse Aaron makes for himself. We will hope that he testified his repentance for the sin afterward, better than he did now; for what he says here has little in it of the language of a penitent. If a just man fall, he shall rise again, but perhaps not quickly. (1.) He deprecates the anger of Moses only, whereas he should have deprecated God's anger in the first place; Let not the anger of my lord wax hot, v. 22. (2.) He lays all the fault upon the people; They are set on mischief, and they said, Make us gods. It is natural to us to endeavour thus to transfer our guilt; we have it in our kind, Adam and Eve did so: sin is a brat that nobody is willing to own. Aaron was now the chief magistrate, and had power over the people, and yet pleads that the people overpowered him: he that had authority to restrain them, yet had so little resolution as to yield to them. (3.) It is well if he did not intend a reflection upon Moses, as necessary to the sin, by staying so long on the mount, in repeating, without need, that invidious surmise of the people, As for this Moses, we wot not what is become of him, v. 23. (4.) He extenuates and conceals his own share in the sin, as if he had only bid them break off their gold that they had about them, intending to make a hasty assay for the present, and to try what he could make of the gold that was next at hand; and childishly insinuates, that, when he cast the gold into the fire, it came out, either by accident or by the magic art of some of the mixed multitude, (as the Jewish writers dream,) in this shape; but not a word of his graving and fashioning it, v. 24. But Moses relates to all ages what he did, (v. 4.) though he himself here would not own it. Note, He that covers his sin shall not prosper, for sooner or later it will be discovered. Well, this was all Aaron had to say for himself; and he had better have said nothing, for his defence did but aggravate his offence; and yet he is not only spared, but preferred; as sin did abound, grace did much more abound.

II. The people are next to be judged for this sin. The approach of Moses soon spoiled their sport, and turned their dancing into trembling. They that hector Aaron into a compliance with them in their sin durst not look Moses in the face, nor make the least opposition to the severity which he thought fit to use both against the idol and against the idolaters. Note, It is not impossible to make those sins which were committed with daring presumption appear contemptible, when the insolent perpetrators of them sink away overwhelmed in their own confusion. The king that sits upon the throne of judgment scatters away all evil with his eyes. Observe two things:

1. How they were exposed to shame by their sin; the people were naked, (v. 25.) not so much because they had some of their lost their ear-rings, (that was inconsiderable,) but because they had lost their integrity, and lay under the reproach of ingratitude to their best Benefactor, and a treacherous revolt from their rightful Lord. It was a shame to them, and a perpetual blot, that they changed their glory into the similitude of an ox. Other nations boasted that they were true to their false gods; well may Israel blush for being false to the true God. Thus were they made naked, stripped of their ornaments, and exposed to contempt; stripped of their armour, and liable to insults. Thus our first parents, when they had sinned, became naked, to their shame. Note, Those that do dishonour to God really bring the greatest dishonour upon themselves: so Israel here did, and Moses was concerned to see it, though they themselves were not; he saw that they were naked.

2. The course that Moses took to roll away this reproach; not by concealing the sin, or putting any false colour upon it, but by punishing it, and so bearing a public testimony against it; whenever it should be cast in their teeth that they had made a calf in Horeb, they might have this to say, in answer to them that reproached them, that, though it was true there were those that did so, yet justice was executed upon them. The government disallowed the sin, and suffered not the sinners to go unpunished. They did so, but they paid dear for it. Thus (said God) thou shalt put the evil away, Deut. 13. 5. Observe here,

(1.) By whom vengeance was taken; by the children of Levi; (v. 26, 28.) not by the immediate hand of God himself, as on Nadab and Abihu, but by the sword of man, to teach them that idolatry was an iniquity to be punished by the judge, being a denial of the God that is above, Job, 31. 28. Deut. 13. 9. It was to be done by the sword of their own brethren, that the execution of justice might redound more to the honour of the nation. And if they must fall now into the hands of man, better so than flee before their enemies. The innocent must be called out to be the executioners of the guilty, that it might be the more effectual warning to themselves that they did not the like another time; and the putting of them upon such an unpleasant service, and so much against the grain as this must needs be, to kill their next neighbours, was a punishment to them too, for not appearing sooner to prevent the sin, and make head against it. The Levites particularly were employed in doing this execution, for, it should seem, there were more of them than of any other tribe that had kept themselves free from the contagion, which was the more laudable, because Aaron, the head of their tribe, was so deeply concerned in it. Now here we are told,

[1.] How the Levites were called out to this service; Moses stood in the gate of the camp, the place of judgment; there he displayed a banner, as it were, because of the truth, to enlist soldiers for God. He proclaimed, Who is on the Lord's side? The idolaters had set up the golden calf for their standard, and now Moses set up his in opposition to them. Now Moses clad himself with zeal as with a robe, and summoned all those to appear forthwith, that were on God's side, against the golden calf. He does not proclaim, as Jehu, "Who is on my side, (2 Kings, 9. 32.) to avenge the indignity done to me?" but, Who is on the Lord's side? It was God's cause that he espoused against the evil-doers, Ps. 94. 16. Note, First, There are two great interests on foot in the world, with the one or the other of which all the children of men are siding. The interest of sin and wickedness is the Devil's interest, and all wicked people side with that interest; the interest of truth and holiness is God's interest, with which all godly people side; and it is a case that will not admit a neutrality. Secondly, It concerns us all to inquire whether we are on the Lord's side or not. Thirdly, Those who are on his side are, comparatively, but few, and sometimes seem fewer than really they are. Fourthly, God does sometimes call out those that are on his side, to appear for him as witnesses, as soldiers, as intercessors.

[2.] How they were commissioned for this service; (v. 27.) Slay every man his brother, that is, "Slay all those that you know to have been active for the making and worshipping of the golden calf, though they were your own nearest relations or dearest friends." The crime was committed publicly, the Levites saw who of their acquaintance were concerned in it, and therefore needed no other direction than their own knowledge whom to slay. And probably the greatest part of those who were guilty were known, and known to be so by some or other of the Levites who were employed in the execution. Yet, it should seem, they were to slay those only whom they found abroad in the streets of the camp; for it might be hoped that those who were retired into their tents were ashamed of what they had done, and were upon their knees, repenting. Those are marked for ruin who persist in sin, and are not ashamed of the abominations they have committed, Jer. 8. 12. But how durst the Levites encounter so great a body, who probably were much enraged by the burning of their calf? It is easy to account for this; sense of guilt disheartened the delinquents, and a divine commission animated the executioners. And one thing that put life into them was, that Moses had said, Consecrate yourselves to-day to the Lord, that he may bestow a blessing upon you; thereby intimating to them that they now stood fair for preferment, and that, if they would but signalize themselves upon this occasion, it would be construed into such a consecration of themselves to God, and to his service, as would put upon their tribe a perpetual honour. Those that consecrate themselves to the Lord he will set apart for himself. Those that do the duty shall have the dignity; and if we do signal services for God, he will bestow especial blessings upon us. There was a blessing designed for the tribe of Levi; now, says Moses, "Consecrate yourselves to the Lord, that you may qualify yourselves to receive that blessing." The Levites were to assist in the offering of sacrifice to God; and now they must begin with the offering of these sacrifices to the honour of divine justice. Those that are to minister about holy things must be not only sincere and serious, but warm and zealous, bold and courageous, for God and godliness. Thus all Christians, but especially ministers, must forsake father and mother, and prefer the service of Christ and his interest far before their nearest and dearest relations; for if we love them better than Christ, we are not worthy of him. See how the zeal of the Levites is applauded, Deut. 33. 9.

(2.) On whom vengeance is taken; There fell of the people that day about three thousand men, v. 28. Probably these were but few, in comparison with the many that were guilty; but these were the men that headed the rebellion, and were therefore picked out, to be made examples of, for terror to all others. They that in the morning were shouting and dancing, before night were dying in their own blood: such a sudden change do the judgments of God sometimes make with sinners that are secure and jovial in their sin, as with Belshazzar by the handwriting upon the wall. This is written for warning to us; (1 Cor. 10. 7.) Neither be ye idolaters, as were some of them.

30. And it came to pass on the morrow, that Moses said unto the people, Ye have sinned a great sin: and now I will go up unto the Lord; peradventure I shall make an atonement for your sin. 31. And Moses returned unto the Lord, and said, Oh, this people have sinned a great sin, and have made them gods of gold. 32. Yet now, if thou wilt, forgive their sin; and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written. 33. And the Lord said unto Moses, Whosoever hath sinned against me, him will I blot out of my book. 34. Therefore now go, lead the people unto the place of which I have spoken unto thee: behold, mine angel shall go before thee: nevertheless, in the day when I visit, I will visit their sin upon them. 35. And the LORD plagued the people, because they made the calf, which Aaron made.

Moses, having executed justice upon the principal offenders, is here dealing both with the people and with God.

I. With the people, to bring them to repentance, v. 30. When some were slain, lest the rest should imagine, that, because they were exempt from the capital punishment, they were therefore looked upon as free from guilt, Moses here tells the survivors, Ye have sinned a great sin, and therefore, though ye have escaped this time, Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish. That they might not think lightly of the sin itself, he calls it a great sin; and that they might not think themselves innocent, because perhaps they were not all so deeply guilty as some of them that were put to death, he tells them all, Ye have sinned a great sin. The work of ministers is to shew people their sins, and the greatness of their sins; "You have sinned, and therefore you are undone if your sins be not pardoned, for ever undone without a Saviour. It is a great sin, and therefore calls for great sorrow, for it puts you in great danger." To affect them with the greatness of their sin, he intimates to them what a difficult thing it would be to make up the quarrel which God had with them for it. 1. It would not be done, unless he himself go up unto the Lord, on purpose, and give as long and as solemn attendance as he had done for the receiving of the law. And yet, 2. Even so, it was but a peradventure that he should make atonement for them: the case was extremely hazardous. This should convince us of the great evil there is in sin, that he who undertook to make atonement found it no easy thing to do it; he must go up to the Lord, with his own blood, to make atonement. The malignity of sin appears in the price of pardons.

Yet it was some encouragement to the people, (when they were told that they had sinned a great sin,) to hear that Moses, who had so great an interest in heaven, and so true an affection for them, would go up unto the Lord to make atonement for them. Consolation should go along with conviction: first wound, and then heal; shew people first the greatness of their sin, and then make known to them the atonement, and give them hopes of mercy. Moses will go up unto the Lord, though it be but a peradventure that he should make atonement. Christ, the great Mediator, went upon greater certainty than this, for he had lain in the bosom of the Father, and perfectly knew all his counsels. But to us poor supplicants it is encouragement enough, in prayer for particular mercies, that, peradventure, we may obtain them, though we have not an absolute promise, Zeph. 2. 3. It may be, ye shall be hid. In our prayers for others, we should be humbly earnest with God, though it is but a peradventure that God will give them repentance, 2 Tim. 2. 25.

II. He intercedes with God for mercy; wherein observe,

1. How pathetic his address was. Moses returned unto the Lord, not to receive further instructions about the tabernacle, there were no more conferences now about the matter. Thus men's sins and follies make work for their friends and ministers, unpleasant work, many times, and give great interruptions to that work which they delight in. Moses in this address expresses,

(1.) His great detestation of the people's sins, v. 31. He speaks as one overwhelmed with the horror of it; Oh! this people have sinned a great sin. God had first told him of it, (v. 7.) and now he tells God of it, by way of lamentation. He does not call them God's people, he knew they were unworthy to be called so; but this people, this treacherous ungrateful people, they have made them gods of gold. It is a great sin indeed to make gold our god, as they do that make it their hope, and set their heart on it. He does not go about to excuse or extenuate the sin; but what he had said to them, by way of conviction, he says to God, by way of confession; They have sinned a great sin; he came not to make apologies, but to make atonement; "Lord, pardon the sin, for it is great," Ps. 25. 11.

is not too great a sin for infinite mercy to pardon, and therefore if thou wilt forgive their sin; What then, Moses? It is an abrupt expression, "If thou wilt, I desire no more; if thou wilt, thou wilt be praised, I shall be praised, and abundantly recompensed for my intercession." It is an expression like that of the dresser of the vineyard; (Luke, 13. 9.) If it bear fruit; or, If thou wilt forgive, is as much as, "O that thou wouldest forgive!" as, (Luke, 19. 42.) If thou hadst known, is, O that thou hadst known. "But if not, if the decree is gone forth, and there is no remedy, but they must be ruined; if this punishment, which has already been inflicted on many, is not sufficient, (2 Cor. 2. 6.) but they must all be cut off, blot me, I pray thee, out of the book which thou hast written; that is, "If they must be cut off, let me be cut off with them, and cut short of Canaan; if all Israel must perish, I am content to perish with them; let not the land of promise be mine by survivorship." This expression may be illustrated from Ezek. 13. 9. where this is threatened against the false prophets, They shall not be written in the writing of the house of Israel, neither shall they enter into the land of Israel. God had told Moses, if he would not interpose, he would make of him a great nation, v. 10. "No," says Moses, "I am so far from desiring to see my name and family built upon the ruins of Israel, that I will choose rather to sink with them. If I cannot prevent their destruction, let me not see it: (Numb. 11. 15.) let me not be written among the living, (Isa. 4. 3.) nor among those that are marked for preservation; even let me die in the last ditch." Thus he expresses his tender affection for the people, and is a type of the good Shepherd that lays down his life for the sheep, (John, 10. 11.) who was to be cut off from the land of the living, for the transgression of my people, Isa. 53. 8. Dan. 9. 26. He is also an example of public spiritedness to all, especially to those in public stations. All private interests must be made subordinate to the good and welfare of communities. It is no great matter what becomes of us and our families in this world, so that it go well with the church of God, and there be peace upon Israel. Moses thus importunes for a pardon, and wrestles with God; not prescribing to him, "If thou wilt not forgive, thou art either unjust or unkind;" no, he is far from that; but, "If not, let me die with the Israelites, and the will of the Lord be done."

2. Observe how prevalent his address was; God would not take him at his word; no, he will not blot any out of his book, but those that by their wilful disobedience have forfeited the honour of being enrolled in it; (v. 33.) the soul that sins shall die, and not the innocent for the guilty. This was also an intimation of mercy to the people, that they should not all be destroyed in a body, but those only that had a hand in the sin. Thus Moses gets round by degrees. God would not, at first, give him full assurance of his being reconciled to them, lest, if the comfort of a pardon were too easily obtained, they would be emboldened to do the like again, and should not be made sensible enough of the evil of the sin. Comforts are suspended, that convictions may be the deeper impressed: also God would hereby exercise the faith and zeal of Moses, their great intercessor. Further, in answer to the address of Moses, (1.) God promises to go on with his kind intention of giving them the land of Canaan, (notwithstanding this,) the land he had spoken to them of, v. 34. Therefore he sends Moses back to them to lead them, though they were unworthy of him, and promises that his angel should go before them, some created angel that was employed in the common services of the kingdom of providence, which intimated that they were not to expect any thing for the future to be done for them, out of the common road of providence, nor any thing extraordinary. Moses afterward obtained a promise of God's special presence with them; (ch. 33. 14, 17.) but, at present, this was all he could prevail for. (2.) Yet he threatens to remember this sin against them, when hereafter he should see cause to punish them for other sins; "When I visit, I will visit for this among the rest. Next time I take the rod in hand, they shall have one stripe the more for this." The Jews have a saying, grounded on this, that, henceforward, no judgment fell upon Israel, but there was in it an ounce of the powder of the golden calf. I see no ground in scripture for the opinion some are of, that God would not have burthened them with such a multitude of sacrifices and other ceremonial institutions, if they had not provoked him by worshipping the golden calf. On the contrary, St. Stephen says, that when they made a calf, and offered sacrifice to the idol, God turned and gave them up to worship the host of heaven, (Acts, 7. 41, 42.) so that the strange addictedness of that people to the sin of idolatry was a just judgment upon them for making and worshipping the golden calf, and a judgment they were never quite freed from, till the captivity in Babylon. See Rom. 1. 23. . 25. Note, Many, that are not immediately cut off in their sins, are reserved for a further day of reckoning; vengeance is slow, but sure. For the present, the Lord plagued the people, (v. 35.) probably by the pestilence, or some other infectious disease, which was a messenger of God's wrath, and an earnest of worse. Aaron made the calf, and yet it is said the people made it, because they worshipped it. Deos qui rogat, ille facit—He who asks for gods, makes them. Aaron was not plagued, but the people; for this was a sin of infirmity, their's a presumptuous sin, between which there is a great difference, not always discernible to us, but evident to God, whose judgment therefore, we are sure, is according to truth. Thus Moses prevailed for a reprieve, and a mitigation of the punishment, but could not wholly turn away the wrath of God; which (some think) bespeaks the inability of the law of Moses to reconcile men to God, and to perfect our peace with him. That was reserved for Christ to do, in whom alone it is that God so pardons sin as to remember it no more.

CHAP. XXXIII.

In this chapter, we have a further account of the mediation of Moses between God and Israel, for the making up of the breach that sin had made between them. I. He brings a very humbling message from God to them, (v. 1. . 3, 5.) which has a good effect upon them, and helps to prepare them for mercy, v. 4, 6. II. He settles a correspondence between God and them, and both God and the people signify their approbation of that correspondence; God, by descending in a cloudy pillar, and the people, by worshipping at the tent-doors, v. 7. . 11. III. He is earnest with God in prayer, and prevails, 1. For a promise of his presence with the people, v. 12. . 17. 2. For a sight of his glory for himself, v. 18. . 23.

1. AND the LORD said unto Moses, Depart, and go up hence, thou and the people which thou hast brought up out of the land of Egypt, unto the land which I swear unto Abraham, and to Isaac, and to Jacob, saying, Unto thy seed will I give it: 2. And I will send an angel before thee; and I will drive out the Canaanite, the Amorite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite, the Hivite, and the Jebusite: 3. Unto a land flowing with milk and honey: for I will not go up in the midst of thee; for thou art a stiff-necked people: lest I consume thee in the way. 4. And when the people heard these evil tidings, they mourned: and no man did put on him his ornaments. 5. For the LORD had said unto Moses, Say unto the children of Israel, Ye are a stiff-necked people: I will come up into the midst of thee in a moment, and consume thee: therefore now put off thy ornaments from thee, that I may know what to do unto thee. 6. And the children of Israel stripped themselves of their ornaments by the mount Horeb.

Here is,

1. The message which God sent by Moses to the children of Israel, signifying the continuance of the displeasure against them, and the bad terms they yet stood upon with God. This he must let them know for their further mortification. 1. He applies to them a mortifying name, by giving them their just character, a stiff-necked people; (v. 3, 5.) "Go," says God to Moses, "go, tell them that they are so." He that knows them better than they know themselves, says so of them. God would have brought them under the yoke of his law, and into the bond of his covenant, but their necks were too stiff to bow to them. God would have cured them of their corrupt and crooked dispositions, and have set them straight; but they were wilful and obstinate, and hated to be reformed, and would not have God to reign over them. Note, God judges of men by the temper of their minds. We know what man does, God knows what he is; we know what proceeds from man, God knows what is in man: and nothing is more displeasing to him than stiff-neckedness; as nothing in children is more offensive to their parents and teachers than stubbornness. 2. He tells them what they deserved, that he should come in the midst of them in a moment, and consume them, v. 5. Had he dealt with them according to their sins, he had taken them away with a swift destruction. Note, Those whom God pardons, must be made to know what their sin deserved, and how miserable they had been, if they had been unpardoned, that God's mercy may be the more magnified. 3. He bids them depart and go up hence to the land of Canaan, v. 1. This mount Sinai, where they now were, was the place appointed for the setting up of God's tabernacle and solemn worship among them: this was not yet done, so that, in bidding them depart hence, God intimates that it should not be done; ("Let them go forward as they are;") and so, it was very expressive of God's displeasure. 4. He turns them over to Moses, as the people which he had brought up out of the land of Egypt, and leaves it to him to lead them to Canaan. 5. Though he promises to make good his covenant with Abraham, in giving them Canaan, yet he denies them the extraordinary tokens of his presence, such as they had hitherto been blessed with, and leaves them under the common conduct of Moses their prince, and the common convoy of a guardian angel. I will send an angel before thee, for thy protector, otherwise the evil angels would soon destroy thee; but I will not go up in the midst of thee, lest I consume thee; (v. 2, 3.) not as if an angel would be more patient and compassionate than God, but their affronts given to an angel would not be so provoking as those given to the Shechinah, or Divine Majesty itself. Note, The greater privileges we enjoy, the greater is our danger, if we do not improve them, and live up to them. 6. He speaks as one that was at a loss what course to take with them. Justice said, "Cut them off, and consume them; Mercy said, How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? Hos. 11. 8. Well, says God, put off thine ornaments, that I may know what to do with thee; that is, "Put thyself into the posture of a penitent, that the dispute may be determined in thy favour, and mercy may rejoice against judgment," v. 5. Note, Calls to repentance are plain indications of mercy designed. If the Lord were pleased to kill us, justice knows what to do with a stiff-necked people; but God has no pleasure in the death of them that die; let them return and repent, and then mercy, which otherwise is at a loss, knows what to do.

II. The people's melancholy reception of this message; it was evil-tidings to them, to hear that they should not have God's special presence with them, and therefore, 1. They mourned, (v. 4.) mourned for their sin, which had provoked God to withdraw from them, and mourned for this as the sorest punishment of their sin. When three thousand of them were at one time laid dead upon the spot by the Levites' sword, we do not find that they mourned for that; (hoping that would help to expiate the guilt;) but when God denied them his favourable presence, then they mourned and were in bitterness. Note, Of all the bitter fruits and consequences of sin, that which true penitents most lament, and dread most, is God's departure from them. God had promised that, notwithstanding their sin, he would give them the land flowing with milk and honey. But they could have small joy of that, if they had not God's presence with them. Canaan itself would be no pleasant land without that; therefore, if they want that, they mourn. 2. In token of great shame and humiliation, they that were undressed did not put on their ornaments; (v. 4.) and they that were dressed stript themselves of their ornaments, by the mount; or, as some read it, at a distance from the mount, (v. 6.) standing afar off like the publican, Luke, 18. 13. God bid them lay aside their ornaments, (v. 5.) and they did so; both to shew, in general, their deep mourning, and, in particular, to take a holy revenge upon themselves for giving their ear-rings to make the golden calf of. They that would part with their ornaments, for the maintenance of their sin, could do no less than lay aside their ornaments, in token of their sorrow and shame for it. When the Lord God calls to weeping and mourning, we must comply with the call, and not only fast from pleasant bread, (Dan. 10. 3.) but lay aside our ornaments; even those that are decent enough at other times, are unseasonably worn on days of humiliation, or in times of public calamity, Isa. 3. 18.

7. And Moses took the tabernacle, and pitched it without the camp, afar off from the camp, and called it the tabernacle of the congregation. And it came to pass, that every one which sought the LORD went out unto the tabernacle of the congregation, which was without the camp. 8. And it came to pass, when Moses went out unto the tabernacle, that all the people rose up, and stood every man at his tent-door, and looked after Moses, until he was gone into the tabernacle. 9. And it came to pass, as Moses entered into the tabernacle, the cloudy pillar descended, and stood at the door of the tabernacle, and the LORD talked with Moses. 10. And all the people saw the cloudy pillar stand at the tabernacle door: and all the people rose up and worshipped, every man in his tent-door. 11. And the LORD spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend. And he turned again into the camp: but his servant Joshua, the son of Nun, a young man, departed not out of the tabernacle.

Here is,

I. One mark of displeasure put upon them, for their further humiliation. Moses took the tabernacle, not his own tent for his family, but the tent wherein he gave audience, heard causes, and inquired of God, the Guild-Hall (as it were) of their camp, and pitched it without, afar off from the camp, (v. 7.) to signify to them that they had rendered themselves unworthy of it, and that, unless peace was made, it would return to them no more. God would thus let them know that he was at variance with them; the Lord is far from the wicked. Thus the glory of the Lord departed from the temple, when it was polluted with sin, Ezek. 10. 4.—11. 23. Note, It is a sign that God is angry, when he removes his tabernacle, for his ordinances are fruits of his favour, and tokens of his presence; while we have them with us, we have him with us. Perhaps this tabernacle was a plan, or model rather, of the tabernacle that was afterwards to be erected, a hasty draught from the pattern shewed him in the mount, designed for direction to the workmen, and used, in the meantime, as a tabernacle of meeting between God and Moses about public affairs. This was set up at a distance, to affect the people with the loss of that glorious structure, which, if they had not forsaken their own mercies for lying vanities, was to have been set up in the midst of them. Let them see what they have forfeited.

II. Many encouragements given them, notwithstanding, to hope that God would yet be reconciled to them.

1. Though the tabernacle was removed, yet every one that was disposed to seek the Lord was welcome to follow it, v. 7. Private persons, as well as Moses, were invited and encouraged to apply themselves to God, as intercessors upon this occasion. A place was appointed for them to go without the camp, to solicit God's return to them. Thus, when Ezra (a second Moses) interceded for Israel, there were assembled to him many that trembled at God's word, Ezra, 9. 4. When God designs mercy, he stirs up prayer. He will be sought unto; (Ezek. 36. 37.) and, thanks be to his name, he may be sought unto, and will not reject the poorest intercession. Every Israelite that sought the Lord was welcome to this tabernacle, as well as Moses the man of God.

2. Moses undertook to mediate between God and Israel. He went out to the tabernacle, the place of treaty, probably, pitched between them and the mount, (v. 8.) and he entered into the tabernacle, v. 9. That cause could not but speed well, which had so good a manager; when their judge (under God) becomes their advocate, and he who was appointed to be their law-giver is an intercessor for them, there is hope in Israel concerning this thing.

3. The people seemed to be in a very good mind, and well disposed towards a reconciliation. (1.) When Moses went out to go to the tabernacle, the people looked after him, (v. 8.) in token of their respect to him whom before they had slighted, and their entire dependence upon his mediation. By this it appeared that they were very solicitous about this matter, desirous to be at peace with God, and concerned to know what would be the issue. Thus the disciples looked after our Lord Jesus, when he ascended on high to enter into the holy place not made with hands, till a cloud received him out of their sight, as Moses here. And we must with an eye of faith follow him likewise thither, where he is appearing in the presence of God for us; then shall we have the benefit of his mediation. (2.) When they saw the cloudy pillar, that symbol of God's presence, give Moses the meeting, they all worshipped, every man at his tent-door, v. 10. Thereby they signified, [1.] Their humble adoration of the Divine Majesty which they will ever worship, and not gods of gold any more. [2.] Their joyful thankfulness to God, that he was pleased to shew them this token for good, and give them hopes of a reconciliation; for, if he had been pleased to kill them, he would not have shewed them such things as these, would not have raised them up such a mediator, nor given him such countenance. [3.] Their hearty concurrence with Moses as their advocate, in every thing he should promise for them, and their expectation of a comfortable and happy issue of this treaty. Thus must we worship God, in our tents, with an eye to Christ, as the Mediator. Their worshipping in their tent-doors, declared plainly that they were not ashamed publicly to own their respect to God and Moses, as they had publicly worshipped the calf.

4. God was, in Moses, reconciling Israel to himself, and manifested himself very willing to be at peace. (1.) God met Moses at the place of treaty, v. 9. The cloudy pillar which had withdrawn itself from the camp when it was polluted with idolatry, now returned to this tabernacle at some distance, coming back gradually. If our hearts go forth toward God, to meet him, he will graciously come down to meet us. (2.) God talked with Moses, (v. 9.) spake to him face to face, as a man speaks to his friend, (v. 11.) which intimates that God revealed himself to Moses, not only with greater clearness and evidence of divine light, than to any other of the prophets, but also with greater expressions of particular kindness and grace. He spake, not as a prince to a subject, but as a man to his friend, whom he loves, and with whom he takes sweet counsel. This was great encouragement to Israel, to see their advocate so great a favourite; and, that they might be encouraged by it, Moses turned again into the camp, to tell the people what hopes he had of bringing this business to a good issue, and that they might not despair if he should be long absent. But because he intended speedily to return to the tabernacle of the congregation, he left Joshua there, for it was not fit that the place should be empty, so long as the cloud of glory stood at the door, (v. 9.) but if God had any thing to say out of that cloud while Moses was absent, Joshua was there ready to hear it.

12. And Moses said unto the LORD, See, thou sayest unto me, Bring up this people: and thou hast not let me know whom thou wilt send with me. Yet thou hast said, I know thee by name, and thou hast also found grace in my sight.

13. Now therefore, I pray thee, if I have found grace in thy sight, shew me now thy way, that I may know thee, that I may find grace in thy sight: and consider that this nation is thy people.

14. And he said, My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest. 15. And he said unto him, If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence. 16. For wherein shall it be known here, that I and thy people have found grace in thy sight? is it not in that thou goest with us? So shall we be separated, I and thy people, from all the people that are upon the face of the earth.

17. And the LORD said unto Moses, I will do this thing also that thou hast spoken: for thou hast found grace in my sight, and I know thee by name. 18. And he said, I beseech thee, shew me thy glory. 19. And he said, I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the name of the LORD before thee; and will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will shew mercy on whom I will shew mercy. 20. And he said, Thou canst not see my face: for there shall no man see me, and live. 21. And the LORD said, Behold, there is a place by me, and thou shalt stand upon a rock: 22. And it shall come to pass, while my glory passeth by, that I will put thee in a cleft of the rock, and will cover thee with my hand while I pass by: 23. And I will take away mine hand, and thou shalt see my back parts: but my face shall not be seen.

Moses is now returned to the door of the tabernacle, an humble and importunate supplicant there for two very great favours; and, as a prince, he has power with God, and prevails for both: herein he was a type of Christ, the great Intercessor, whom the Father heareth always.

I. He is here very earnest with God for a grant of his presence with Israel in the rest of their march to Canaan, notwithstanding their provocations. The people had by their sin deserved the wrath of God, and, for the turning away of that, Moses had already prevailed, ch. 32. 14. But they had likewise forfeited God's favourable presence, and all the benefit and comfort of that, and this, Moses is here begging for the return of. Thus, by the intercession of Christ, we obtain not only the removal of the curse, but an assurance of the blessing; we are not only saved from ruin, but become entitled to everlasting happiness.

Observe how admirably Moses orders this cause before God, and fills his mouth with arguments. What a value he expresses for God's favour, what a concern for God's glory, and the welfare of Israel. How he pleads, and how he speeds.

1. How he pleads.

(1.) He insists upon the commission God had given him to bring up his people, v. 12. This he begins with; "Lord, it is thou thyself that employest me; and wilt thou not own me? I am in the way of my duty; and shall I not have thy presence with me in that way?" Whom God calls out to any service he will be sure to furnish with necessary assistances. "Now, Lord, thou hast ordered me a great work, and yet left me at a loss how to go about it, and go through with it." Note, Those that sincerely design and endeavour to do their duty, may in faith beg of God direction and strength for the doing of it.

(2.) He improves the interest he himself had with God, and God's gracious expressions of kindness to him: Thou hast said, I know thee by name, as a particular friend and confidant, and thou hast also found grace in my sight, above any other. Now therefore, says Moses, if it be indeed so, that I have found grace in thy sight, shew me thy way, v. 13. What favour God had expressed to the people they had forfeited the benefit of, there was no insisting upon that; and therefore Moses lays the stress of his plea upon what God had said to him, which though he owns himself unworthy of, yet he hopes he has not thrown himself out of the benefit of. By this therefore he takes hold on God, "Lord, if ever thou wilt do any thing for me, do this for the people." Thus our Lord Jesus, in his intercession, presents himself to the Father, as one in whom he is always well-pleased, and so obtains mercy for us with whom he is justly displeased; and we are accepted in the Beloved. Thus also men of public spirit love to improve their interest both with God and man for the public good. Observe what it is he is thus earnest for; Shew me thy way, that I may know that I find grace in thy sight. Note, Divine direction is one of the best evidences of divine favour. By this we may know that we find grace in God's sight, if we find grace in our hearts to guide and quicken us in the way of our duty. God's good work in us is the surest discovery of his good-will towards us.

(3.) He intimates that the people also, though most unworthy, yet were in some relation to God; "Consider that this nation is thy people, a people that thou hast done great things for, redeemed to thyself, and taken into covenant with thyself; Lord, they are thy own, do not leave them." The offended father considers this; "My child is foolish and froward, but he is my child, and I cannot abandon him."

(4.) He expresses the great value he had for the presence of God. When God said, My presence shall go with thee, he caught at that word, as that which he could not live and move without; (v. 15.) If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence. He speaks as one that dreaded the thought of going forward without God's presence, knowing that their marches could not be safe, nor their encampments easy, if they had not God with them. Better lie down and die here in the wilderness, than go forward to Canaan, without God's presence. Note, Those who know how to value God's favours are best prepared to receive them. Observe how earnest Moses is in this matter; he begs as one that would take no denial. "Here we will stay, till we obtain thy favour; like Jacob, I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." And observe how he grows upon God's concessions; kind intimations given him, make him yet more importunate. Thus God's gracious promises, and the advances of mercy towards us, should not only encourage our faith, but excite our fervency in prayer.

(5.) He concludes with an argument taken from God's glory; (v. 16.) "Wherein shall it be known to the nations that have their eyes upon us, that I and thy people (with whom my interests are all blended) have found grace in thy sight, distinguishing favour, so as to be separated from all people upon earth? How will it appear that we are indeed thus honoured, Is it not in that thou goest with us? Nothing short of that can answer these characters: let it never be said that we are a peculiar people, and highly favoured, for we stand but upon a level with the rest of our neighbours, unless thou go with us; sending an angel with us will not serve." Doubtless, the mind of Moses adverted to the place, that wilderness, whither God had led them, and where they would certainly be lost, if God left them. Note, God's special presence with us here in this wilderness, by his Spirit and grace, to direct, defend, and comfort us, is the surest pledge of his special love to us, and will redound to his glory as well as our benefit.

2. Observe how he speeds. He obtained an assurance of God's favour. (1.) To himself; (v. 14.) "I will give thee rest, I will take care to make thee easy in this matter; however it be, thou shalt have satisfaction." Moses never entered Canaan, and yet God did for him according to the promise which, long afterward, he gave Daniel; Go thou thy way till the end be, for thou shalt rest, Dan. 12. 13. (2.) To the people, for his sake. Moses was not content with that answer which bespoke favour to himself only, he must gain a promise, an express promise, for the people too, or he is not at rest; gracious generous souls think it not enough to get to heaven themselves, but would have all their friends go thither too. And in this also Moses prevailed; (v. 17.) I will do this thing also that thou hast spoken. Moses is not checked as an unreasonable beggar, whom no saying would serve, but he is encouraged: God grants as long as he asks; gives liberally, and does not upbraid him. See the power of prayer, and be quickened hereby to ask, and seek, and knock, and to continue instant in prayer; to pray always, and not to faint. See the riches of God's goodness: when he has done much, yet he is willing to do more; I will do this also—above what we are able to ask or think. See, in type, the prevalency of Christ's intercession, which he ever lives to make for all those that come to God by him, and the ground of that prevalency; it is purely his own merit, not any thing in those for whom he intercedes; it is because thou hast found grace in my sight. And now the matter is settled, God is perfectly reconciled to them, his presence in the pillar of cloud returns to them, and shall continue with them; all is well again, and henceforth we hear no more of the golden calf. Lord, who is a God like unto thee, pardoning iniquity?

II. Having gained this point, he next begs a sight of God's glory, and is heard in that matter also. Observe,

1. The humble request Moses makes; (v. 18.) I beseech thee, shew me thy glory. Moses had lately been in the mount with God, had continued there a great while, and had enjoyed as intimate communion with God as ever any man had on this side heaven; and yet he is still desiring a further acquaintance. All that are effectually called to the knowledge of God and fellowship with him, though they desire nothing more than God, yet they are still coveting more and more of him, till they come to see as they are seen. Moses had wonderfully prevailed with God for one favour after another, and the success of his prayers imboldened him to go on still to seek God; the more he had, the more he asked; when we are in a good frame at the throne of grace, we should endeavour to preserve and improve it, and strike while the iron is hot. Shew me thy glory. Make me to see it; so the word is: "Make it some way or other visible, and enable me to bear the sight of it." Not that he was so ignorant as to think God's essence could be seen with bodily eyes; but, having hitherto only heard a voice out of a pillar or cloud of fire, he desired to see some representation of the divine glory, such as God saw fit to gratify him with. It was not fit that the people should see any similitude when the Lord spake unto them, lest they should corrupt themselves; but he hoped that there was not that danger in his seeing some similitude. Something it was more than he had yet seen, that Moses desired: if it was purely for the assisting of his faith and devotion, the desire was commendable; but perhaps there was in it a mixture of human infirmity. God will have us walk by faith, not by sight, in this world: and faith comes by hearing. Some think that Moses desired a sight of God's glory as a token of his reconciliation, and an earnest of that presence he had promised them; but he knew not what he asked.

2. The gracious reply God made to this request.

(1.) He denied that which was not fit to be granted, and which Moses could not bear; (v. 20.) Thou canst not see my face. A full discovery of the glory of God would quite overpower the faculties of any mortal man in this present state, and overwhelm him, even Moses himself. Man is mean and unworthy of it, weak and could not bear it, guilty and could not but dread it. It is in compassion to our infirmity, that God holdeth back the face of his throne, and spreadeth a cloud upon it, Job, 26. 9. God has said, here, that is, in this world, his face shall not be seen; (v. 23.) that is an honour reserved for the future state, to be the eternal bliss of holy souls: should men in this state know what it is, they would not be content to live short of it. There is a knowledge and enjoyment of God, which must be waited for in another world, when we shall see him as he is, 1 John, 3. 2. In the meantime, let us adore the height of what we do know of God, and the depth of what we do not. Long before this, Jacob had spoken of it with wonder, that he had seen God face to face, and yet his life was preserved, Gen. 32. 30. Sinful man dreads the sight of God his Judge; but holy souls, being by the Spirit of the Lord changed into the same image, behold with open face the glory of the Lord, 2 Cor. 3. 18.

(2.) He granteth that which would be abundantly satisfying.

[1.] He should hear what would please him; (v. 10.) I will make all my goodness pass before thee; he had given him wonderful instances of his goodness in being reconciled to Israel; but that was only goodness in the stream, he would shew him goodness in the spring; all his goodness. This was a sufficient answer to his request; "Shew me thy glory," says Moses; "I will shew thee my goodness," says God. Note, God's goodness is his glory: and he will have us to know him by the glory of his mercy, more than by the glory of his majesty; for we must fear even the Lord and his goodness, Hos. 3. 5. That especially which is the glory of God's goodness, is, the sovereignty of it, that he will be gracious to whom he will be gracious; that, as an absolute Proprietor, he makes what difference he pleases, in bestowing his gifts, and is not Debtor to any, nor accountable to any; (May he not do what he will with his own?) also, that all his reasons of mercy are fetched from within himself, not from any merit in his creatures: as he has mercy on whom he will, so because he will. Even so, Father, because it seemed good in thy sight. It is never said, I will be angry at whom I will be angry, for his wrath is always just and holy; but I will shew mercy on whom I will shew mercy, for his grace is always free. He never damns by prerogative, but by prerogative he saves. The apostle quotes this, (Rom. 9. 15.) in answer to those who charged God with unrighteousness in giving that grace freely to some, which he withholds justly from others.

[2.] He should see what he could bear, and what would suffice him. The matter is concerted so as that Moses might be safe, and yet satisfied. First, Safe in a clift of the rock; (v. 21. 22.) in that he was to be sheltered from the dazzling light and devouring fire of God's glory. This was the rock in Horeb, out of which water was brought, of which it is said, That rock was Christ, 1 Cor. 10. 4. It is in the clifts of this rock that we are secured from the wrath of God, which otherwise would consume us; God himself will protect those that are thus hid. And it is only through Christ that we have the knowledge of the glory of God. None can see that to their comfort, but those who stand upon this rock, and take shelter in it. Secondly, He was satisfied with a sight of his back-parts, v. 23. He should see more of God than any ever saw on earth, but not so much as they see who are in heaven. The face, in man, is the seat of majesty, and men are known by their faces, in them we take a full view of men; that sight of God Moses might not have, but such a sight as we have of a man who is gone past us, so that we only see his back, and have (as we say) a blush of him. We cannot be said to look at God, but rather to look after him, (Gen. 16. 13.) for we see through a glass darkly; when we see what God has done in his works, observe the goings of our God, our King, we see (as it were) his back-parts. The best thus know but in part, and we cannot order our speech concerning God, by reason of darkness, any more than we can describe a man whose face we never saw. Now Moses was allowed to see only the back-parts; but, long afterward, when he was a witness to Christ's transfiguration, he saw his face shine as the sun. If we faithfully improve the discoveries God gives us of himself while we are here, a brighter and more glorious scene will shortly be opened to us; for to him that hath shall be given.

CHAP. XXXIV.

God, having, in the foregoing chapter, intimated to Moses his reconciliation to Israel, here gives proofs of it, proceeding to settle his covenant and communion with them. Four instances of the return of his favour we have in this chapter

I. The orders he gives to Moses to come up to the mount, the next morning, and bring two tables of stone with him, v. 1..4. II. His meeting him there, and the proclamation of his name, v. 5..9. III. The instructions he gave him there, and his converse with him for forty days together, without intermission, v. 10..28. IV. The honour he put upon him when he sent him down with his face shining, v. 29..35. In all which, God dealt with Moses as a public person, and mediator between him and Israel, and a type of the great Mediator.

1. AND the LORD said unto Moses, Hew thee two tables of stouë like unto the first: and I will write upon these tables the words that were in the first tables, which thou brakest. 2. And be ready in the morning, and come up in the morning unto mount Sinai, and present thyself there to me in the top of the mount. 3. And no man shall come up with thee, neither let any man be seen throughout all the mount; neither let the flocks nor herds feed before that mount. 4. And he hewed two tables of stone like unto the first; and Moses rose up early in the morning, and went up unto mount Sinai, as the LORD had commanded him, and took in his hand the two tables of stone.

The treaty that was on foot between God and Israel, being broken off abruptly by their worshipping the golden calf, when peace was made, all must be begun anew, not where they left off, but from the beginning. Thus backsliders must repent, and do their first works, Rev. 2. 5.

1. Moses must prepare for the renewing of the tables, v. 1. Before, God himself provided the tables, and wrote on them; now, Moses must hew him out the tables, and God would only write upon them. Thus, in the first writing of the law upon the heart of man in innocency, both the tables and the writing were the work of God; but when those were broken and defaced by sin, and the divine law was to be preserved in the scriptures, God therein made use of the ministry of man, and Moses first. But the prophets and apostles did only hew the tables, as it were; the writing was God's still; for all scripture is given by inspiration of God. Observe, When God was reconciled to them, he ordered the tables to be renewed, and wrote his law in them; which plainly intimates to us, (1.) That even under the gospel of peace and reconciliation by Christ, (of which the intercession of Moses was typical,) the moral law should continue to bind believers. Though Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, yet not from the command of it, but still we are under the law to Christ; when our Saviour, in his sermon on the mount, expounded the moral law, and vindicated it from the corrupt glosses with which the Scribes and Pharisees had broken it, (Matth. 5. 19.) he did, in effect, renew the tables, and make them like the first, that is, reduce the law to its primitive sense and intention. (2.) That the best evidence of the pardon of sin and peace with God, is, the writing of the law in the heart. The first token God gave of his reconciliation to Israel, was, the renewing of the tables of the law; thus the first article of the new covenant is, I will write my law in their heart; (Heb. 8. 10.) and it follows, (v. 12.) for I will be merciful to their unrighteousness. (3.) That if we would have God to write the law in our hearts, we must prepare our hearts for the reception of it. The heart of stone must be hewn by conviction and humiliation for sin, (Hos. 6. 5.) the superfluity of naughtiness must be taken off, (James, 1. 21.) the heart made smooth, and laboured with, that the word may have a place in it. Moses did, accordingly, hew out the tables of stone, or slate, for they were so slight and thin, that Moses carried them both in his hand; and, for their dimensions, they must have been somewhat less, and perhaps not much, than the ark in which they were deposited, which was a yard and a quarter long, and three quarters broad. It should seem there was nothing particularly curious in the framing of them, for there was no great time taken, Moses had them ready presently, to take up with him, next morning. They were to receive their beauty, not from the art of man, but from the finger of God.

2. Moses must attend again on the top of mount Sinai, and present himself to God there, v. 2. Though the absence of Moses, and his continuing so long on the mount, had lately occasioned their making the golden calf; yet God did not therefore alter his measures, but he shall come up and tarry as long as he had done, to try whether they had learned to wait. To strike an awe upon the people, they are bid to keep their distance, none must come up with him, v. 3. They had said, (ch. 32. 1.) We know not what is become of him, and God will not let them know. Moses, accordingly, rose up early, (v. 4.) to go to the place appointed; to shew how forward he was to present himself before God, and loath to lose time. It is good to be early at our devotions. The morning is, perhaps, as good a friend to the Graces as it is to the Muses.

5. And the LORD descended in the cloud, and stood with him there, and proclaimed the name of the LORD. 6. And the LORD passed by before him, and proclaimed, The LORD, The LORD God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, 7. Keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, and transgression, and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty; visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and to the fourth generation. 8. And Moses made haste, and bowed his head toward the earth, and worshipped. 9. And he said, If now I have found grace in thy sight, O LORD, let my LORD, I pray thee, go among us; for it is a stiff-necked people; and pardon our iniquity and our sin, and take us for thine inheritance.

No sooner was Moses got to the top of the mount, than God gave him the meeting; (v. 5.) The Lord descended, by some sensible token of his presence, and manifestation of his glory. His descending bespeaks his condescension, he humbles himself to take cognizance of those that humble themselves to walk with him, Ps. 113. 6. Lord, what is man, that he should be thus visited? He descended in the cloud, probably, that pillar of cloud which had hitherto gone before Israel, and had, the day before, met Moses at the door of the tabernacle. This cloud was to strike an awe upon Moses, that the familiarity he was admitted to might not breed contempt. The disciples feared, when they entered into the cloud. His making a cloud his pavilion, intimated, that though he made known much of himself, yet there was much more concealed.

Now observe,

1. How God proclaimed his name; (v. 6, 7.) he did it in transitu—as he passed by him. Fixed views of God are reserved for the future state; the best we have in this world are transient. God now was performing what he had promised Moses the day before, that his glory should pass by, ch. 33. 22. He proclaimed the name of the Lord, by which he would make himself known. He had made himself known to Moses in the glory of his self-existence and self-sufficiency, when he proclaimed that name, I am that I am; now he makes himself known in the glory of his grace and goodness and all-sufficiency. Now that God is about to publish a second edition of the law, he prefaces it with this proclamation; for it is God's grace and goodness that gives the law, especially the remedial law. The pardon of Israel's sin, in war shipping the calf, was now to pass the seals; and God, by his declaration, would let them know that he pardoned, ex mero motu —merely out of his own good pleasure, not for their merit's sake, but from his own inclination to forgive. The proclaiming of it denotes the universal extent of God's mercy; he is not only good to Israel, but good to all; let all take notice of it. He that hath an ear, let him hear, and know, and believe.

1. That the God with whom we have to do is a great God. He is Jehovah, the Lord, who has his being of himself, and is the Fountain of all being, Jehovah-El, the Lord, the strong God, a God of almighty power himself, and the Original of all power. This is prefixed before the display of his mercy, to teach us to think and to speak, even of God's grace and goodness, with great seriousness and a holy awe, and to encourage us to depend upon these mercies; they are not the mercies of a man, that is frail and feeble, false and fickle, but the mercies of the Lord, the Lord God; therefore sure mercies, and sovereign mercies, mercies that may be trusted, but not tempted.

2. That he is a good God. His greatness and goodness illustrate and set off each other. That the terror of his greatness may not make us afraid, we are told how good he is; and that we may not presume upon his goodness, we are told how great he is. Many words are here heaped up, to acquaint us with, and convince us of, God's goodness, and to shew how much his goodness is both his glory and his delight, yet without any tautology. (1.) He is merciful. This bespeaks his pity and tender compassion, like that of a father to his children. This is put first, because it is the first wheel in all the instances of God's good-will to fallen man, whose misery makes him an object of pity, Judg. 10. 16. Isa. 63. 9. Let us not then have either hard thoughts of God, or hard hearts towards our brethren. (2.) He is gracious. This bespeaks both freeness and kindness; it intimates not only that he has a compassion to his creatures, but a complacency in them, and in doing good to them; and this, of his own good-will, and not for the sake of any thing in them. His mercy is grace, free grace; this teaches us to be not only pitiful, but courteous, 1 Pet. 3. 8. (3.) He is long-suffering. This is a branch of God's goodness which sinners' badness gives occasion for; Israel had done so; they had tried his patience, and experienced it. He is long-suffering, that is, he is slow to anger, and delays the execution of his justice; he waits to be gracious, and lengthens out the offers of his mercy. (4.) He is abundant in goodness and truth. This bespeaks plentiful goodness; it abounds above our deserts, above our conception and expression. The springs of mercy are always full, the streams of mercy always flowing; there is mercy enough in God, enough for all, enough for each, enough for ever. It bespeaks promised goodness, goodness and truth put together, goodness engaged by promise, and his faithfulness pawned for the security of it. He not only does good, but by his promise he raises our expectation of it, and even obliges himself to shew mercy. (5.) He keepeth mercy for thousands. This denotes, [1.] Mercy extended to thousands of persons; when he gives to some, still he keeps for others, and is never exhausted; he has mercy enough for all the thousands of Israel, when they shall multiply as the sand. [2.] Mercy entailed upon thousands of generations, even those upon whom the ends of the world are come; nay, the line of it is drawn parallel with that of eternity itself. (6.) He forgiveth iniquity, transgression, and sin. Pardoning mercy is specified, because, in that, divine grace is most magnified, and because that is it which opens the door to all other gifts of his divine grace, and because of this he had lately given a very pregnant proof. He forgives offences of all sorts, iniquity, transgression, and sin; multiplies his pardons, and with him is plenteous redemption.

3. That he is a just and holy God. For, (1.) He will by no means clear the guilty. Some read it so as to express a mitigation of wrath even when he does punish; When he empties, he will not make quite desolate, that is, "He does not proceed to the greatest extremity, till there be no remedy." As we read it, we must expound it, that he will by no means connive at the guilty, as if he took no notice of their sin. Or, he will not clear the impunitently guilty, that go on still in their trespasses: he will not clear the guilty, without some satisfaction to his justice, and necessary vindications of the honour of his government. (2.) He visiteth the iniquity of the fathers upon the children. He may justly do it, for all souls are his, and there is a malignity in sin, that taints the blood. He sometimes will do it, especially for the punishment of idolaters. Thus he shews his hatred of sin, and displeasure against it; yet he keepeth not his anger for ever, but visits to the third and fourth generation only, while he keepeth mercy for thousands. Well, this is God's name for ever, and this is his memorial unto all generations.

II. How Moses received this declaration which God made of himself, and of his grace and mercy. It should seem as if Moses accepted this as a sufficient answer to his request, that God would shew him his glory; for we read not that he went into the cleft of the rock, whence to gain a sight of God's back-parts; perhaps this satisfied him, and he desired no more; as we read not that Thomas did thrust his hand into Christ's side, though Christ invited him to do it. God having thus proclaimed his name, Moses says, "It is enough, I expect no more till I come to heaven;" at least, he did not think fit to relate what he saw. Now we are here told,

1. What impression it made upon him; (v. 8.) Moses made haste, and bowed his head. Thus he expressed, (1.) His humble reverence and adoration of God's glory, giving him the honour due to that name he had thus proclaimed. Even the goodness of God must be looked upon by us with a profound veneration and holy awe. (2.) His joy in this discovery which God had made of himself, and his thankfulness for it. We have reason gratefully to acknowledge God's goodness to us, not only in the real instances of it, but in the declarations he has made of it by his word; not only that he is, and will be, gracious to us, but that he is pleased to let us know it. (3.) His holy submission to the will of God, made known in this declaration, subscribing to his justice as well as mercy, and putting himself and his people Israel under the government and conduct of such a God as Jehovah had now proclaimed himself to be. Let this God be our God for ever and ever.

2. What improvement he made of it. He immediately grounded a prayer upon it; (v. 9.) and a most earnest affectionate prayer it is, (1.) For the presence of God with his people Israel in the wilderness, "I pray thee, go among us, for thy presence is all in all to our safety and success." (2.) For pardon of sin; "O pardon our iniquity and our sin, else we cannot expect thee to go among us." And, (3.) For the privileges of a peculiar people: "Take us for thine inheritance, which thou wilt have a particular eye to, and concern for, and delight in." These things God had already promised, and given Moses assurances of, and yet he prays for them, not as doubting the sincerity of God's grants, but as one solicitous for the ratification of them. God's promises are intended, not to supersede, but to direct and encourage, prayer. Those who have some good hopes, through grace, that their sins are pardoned, must yet continue to pray for pardon, for the renewing of their pardon, and the clearing of it more and more to their souls. The more we see of God's goodness, the more ashamed we should be of our own sins, and the more earnest for an interest in it. God had said, in the close of the proclamation, that he would visit the iniquity upon the children; and Moses here deprecates that; Lord, do not only pardon it to them, but to their children, and let our covenant-relation to thee be entailed upon our posterity, as an inheritance. Thus Moses, like a man of a truly public spirit, intercedes even for the children that should be born. But it is a strange plea he urges; for it is a stiff-necked people. God had given this as a reason why he would not go along with them; (ch. 33. 3.) "Yea," says Moses, "they rather go along with us; for the worse they are, the more need they have of thy presence and grace to make them better." Moses sees them so stiff-necked, that, for his part, he has neither patience nor power enough to deal with them; "Therefore, Lord, do thou go among us, else they will never be kept in awe. Thou will spare, and bear with them, for thou art God, and not man," Hos. 11. 9.

10. And he said, Behold, I make a covenant: before all thy people I will do marvels, such as have not been done in all the earth, nor in any nation: and all the people amongst which thou art shall see the work of the LORD: for it is a terrible thing that I will do with thee. 11. Observe thou that which I command thee this day: behold, I drive out before thee the Amorite, and the Canaanite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite, and the Hivite, and the Jebusite. 12. Take heed to thyself, lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land whither thou goest, lest it be for a snare in the midst of thee: 13. But ye shall destroy their altars, break their images, and cut down their groves: 14. For thou shalt worship no other god: for the LORD, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God: 15. Lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land, and they go a whoring after their gods, and do sacrifice unto their gods, and one call thee, and thou eat of his sacrifice; 16. And thou take of their daughters unto thy sons, and their daughters go a whoring after their gods, and make thy sons go a whoring after their gods. 17. Thou shalt make thee no molten gods.

Reconciliation being made, a covenant of friendship is here settled between God and Israel. The traitors are not only pardoned, but preferred, and made favourites again. Well may the assurances of this be ushered in with a Behold, a word commanding attention and admiration; Behold, I make a covenant. When the covenant was broken, it was Israel that brake it; now that it comes to be renewed, it is God that makes it. If there be quarrels, we must bear all the blame: if there be peace, God must have all the glory.

Here is,

1. God's part of this covenant, what he would do for them, v. 10, 11. (1.) In general, Before all thy people, I will do miracles. Note, Covenant-blessings are marvellous things, (Ps. 98. 1.) marvels in the kingdom of nature, the drying up of Jordan, the standing still of the sun, &c. Marvels indeed, for they were without precedent, such as have not been done in all the earth; they were the joy of Israel, and the confirmation of their faith; Thy people shall see, and own the work of the Lord: and they were the terror of their enemies; It is a terrible thing that I will do. Nay, even God's own people should see them with astonishment. (2.) In particular, I drive out before thee the Amorite. God, as King of nations, plucks up some, to plant others, as it pleases him; as King of saints, he made room for the vine he brought out of Egypt, Ps. 80. 8, 9. Kingdoms are sacrificed to Israel's interests, Isa. 43. 3, 4.

2. Their part of the covenant; Observe that which I command thee: we cannot expect the benefit of the promises, unless we make conscience of the precepts. The two great precepts are, (1.) Thou shalt worship no other gods, (v. 14.) not give divine honour to any creature, or any name whatsoever, the creature of fancy. A good reason is annexed; it is at thy peril, if thou do; for the Lord, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God, as tender in the matters of his worship, as the husband is of the honour of the marriage-bed. Jealousy is called the rage of a man, (Prov. 6. 34.) but it is God's holy and just displeasure. Those cannot worship God aright, who do not worship him alone. (2.) "Thou shalt make thee no molten gods"; (v. 17.) thou shalt not worship the true God by images." This was the sin they had lately fallen into; which, therefore, they are particularly cautioned against.

Fences are here erected about these two precepts by two others; [1.] That they might not be tempted to worship other gods, they must not join in affinity or friendship with those that did; (v. 12.) "Take heed to thyself", for thou art upon thy good behaviour; it is a sin that thou art prone to, and that will easily beset thee; and therefore be very cautious, and carefully abstain from all appearances of it, and advances towards it; make no covenant with the inhabitants of the land." If God, in kindness to them, drove out the Canaanites, they ought, in duty to God, not to harbour them. What could be insisted on more reasonable than this? If God make war with the Canaanites, let not Israel make peace with them. If God take care that the Canaanites be not their lords, let them take care that they be not their snares. It was for their civil interest to complete the conquest of the land; so much does God consult our benefit in the laws he gives us. They must particularly take heed of intermarrying with them, v. 15, 16. If they espoused their children, they would be in danger of espousing their gods; such is the corruption of nature, that the bad are much more likely to debauch the good, than the good to reform the bad. The way of sin is down hill: those that are in league with idolaters will come by degrees to be in love with idolatry; and those that are prevailed with to eat of the idolatrous sacrifice will come at length to offer it. Obsta principiis—Nip the mischief in the bud. [2.] That they might not be tempted to make molten gods, they must utterly destroy those they found, and all that belonged to them, the altars and groves, (v. 13.) lest, if they were left standing, they should be brought, in process of time, either to use them, or to take pattern by them, or to abate in their detestation and dread of idolatry. The relics of idolatry ought to be abolished, as affronts to the holy God, and a great reproach to the human nature. Let it never be said, that men, who pretend to reason, were ever guilty of such absurdities, as to make gods of their own, and worship them.

18. The feast of unleavened bread shalt thou keep. Seven days shalt thou eat unleavened bread, as I commanded thee, in the time of the month Abib: for in the month Abib thou camest out from Egypt. 19. All that openeth the matrix is mine; and every firstling among thy cattle, whether ox or sheep, that is male. 20. But the firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a lamb: and if thou redeem him not, then shalt thou break his neck. All the first-born of thy sons thou shalt redeem. And none shall appear before me empty. 21. Six days thou shalt work, but on the seventh day thou shalt rest: in earing time and in harvest thou shalt rest. 22. And thou shalt observe the feast of weeks, of the first-fruits of wheat-harvest, and the feast of in-gathering at the year's end. 23. Thrice in the year shall all your men children appear before the LORD God, the God of Israel. 24. For I will cast out the nations before thee, and enlarge thy borders: neither shall any man desire thy land, when thou shalt go up to appear before the LORD thy God thrice in the year. 25. Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice with leaven; neither shall the sacrifice of the feast of passover be left unto the morning. 26. The first of the first-fruits of thy land thou shalt bring unto the house of the LORD thy God. Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk. 27. And the LORD said unto Moses, Write thou these words: for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel.

Here is a repetition of several appointments made before, especially relating to their solemn feasts: when they had made the calf, they proclaimed a feast in honour of it; now, that they might never do so again, they are here charged with the observance of the feasts which God had instituted. Note, Men need not be drawn from their religion by the temptation of mirth, for we serve a Master that has abundantly provided for the joy of his servants: serious godliness is a continual feast, and joy in God always.

1. Once a week they must rest, (v. 21.) even in earing time, and in harvest, the most busy times of the year. All worldly business must give way to that holy rest; harvest-work will prosper the better for the religious observation of the sabbath-day in harvest-time. Hereby we must shew that we prefer our communion with God, and our duty to him, before either the business or the joy of harvest.

2. Thrice a year they must feast; (v. 23.) they must then appear before the Lord God, the God of Israel. In all our religious approaches to God, we must eye him, (1.) As the Lord God, infinitely blessed, great and glorious, that we may worship him with reverence and godly fear. (2.) As the God of Israel, a God in covenant with us, that we may be encouraged to trust him, and to serve him cheerfully. We always are before God; but, in holy duties, we present ourselves before him, as servants to receive commands, as petitioners to sue for favours, and we have reason to do both with joy.

But it might be suggested, that when all the males from every part of the country were gone up to worship in the place that God should choose, the country would be left exposed to the insults of their neighbours; and what would become of the poor women and children, and sick and aged, that were left at home? "Trust God with them; (v. 24.) neither shall any man desire thy land, not only they shall not invade it, but they shall not so much as think of invading it." Note, [1.] All hearts are in God's hands, and under his check; he can lay a restraint, not only upon men's actions, but upon their desires. Canaan was a desirable land, and the neighbouring nations were greedy enough; and yet God says, "They shall not desire it." Let us check all sinful desires in our own hearts against God and his glory, and then trust him to check all sinful desires in the hearts of others against us and our interest. [2.] The way of duty is the way of safety. If we serve God, he will preserve us; and those that venture for him shall never lose by him. While we are employed in God's work, and are attending upon him, we are taken under special protection; as noblemen and members of parliament are privileged from arrests.

The three feasts are here mentioned with their appendages. First, The passover, and the feast of unleavened bread, in remembrance of their deliverance out of Egypt; and to this is annexed the law of the redemption of the first-born, v. 18..20. This feast was instituted, ch. 12, 13, and urged again, ch. 23. 15. Secondly, The feast of weeks, that is, that of pentecost, seven weeks after the passover; and to this is annexed the law of the first-fruits. Thirdly, The feast of in-gathering at the year's end, which was the feast of tabernacles; (v. 22.) of these also he had spoken before, ch. 23. 16. As to those laws repeated here, (v. 25, 26.) that against leaven relates to the passover, that of the first-fruits to the feast of pentecost, and therefore that against seething the kid in his mother's milk, in all probability, relates to the feast of in-gathering, at which God would not have them use that superstitious ceremony, which, probably, they had seen the Egyptians, or some other of the neighbouring nations, bless their harvests with.

With these laws here repeated, it is probable, all that was said to him, when he was before upon the mount, was repeated likewise, and the model of the tabernacle shewed him again, lest the ruffle and discomposure which the golden calf had put him into should have bereaved him of the ideas he had in his mind of what he had seen and heard; also in token of a complete reconciliation, and to shew that not one jot or tittle of the law should pass away, but that all should be carefully preserved by the great Mediator, who came, not to destroy, but to fulfil, Matth. 5. 17, 18. And in the close, 1. Moses is ordered to write these words, (v. 27.) that the people might be the better acquainted with them by a frequent perusal, and that they might be transmitted to the generations to come; we can never be enough thankful to God for the written word. 1. He is told that, according to the tenor of these words, God would make a covenant with Moses and Israel, not with Israel immediately, but with them in Moses as mediator; thus the covenant of grace is made with believers through Christ, who is given for a Covenant to the people, Isa. 49. 8. And as here the covenant was made according to the tenor of the command, so it is still; for we are by baptism brought into covenant, that we may be taught to observe all things whatsoever Christ has commanded us, Matth. 23. 19, 20.

28. And he was there with the LORD forty days and forty nights; he did neither eat bread, nor drink water. And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments.

29. And it came to pass, when Moses came down from mount Sinai with the two tables of testimony in Moses' hand, when he came down from the mount, that Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone while he talked with him. 30. And when Aaron and all the children of Israel saw Moses, behold, the skin of his face shone; and they were afraid to come nigh him. 31. And Moses called unto them; and Aaron and all the rulers of the congregation returned unto him: and Moses talked with them. 32. And afterward all the children of Israel came nigh: and he gave them in commandment all that the LORD had spoken with him in mount Sinai. 33. And till Moses had done speaking with them, he put a vail on his face. 34. But when Moses went in before the LORD to speak with him, he took the vail off, until he came out. And he came out, and spake unto the children of Israel that which he was commanded. 35. And the children of Israel saw the face of Moses, that the skin of Moses' face shone: and Moses put the vail upon his face again, until he went in to speak with him.

Here is,

1. The continuance of Moses in the mount, where he was miraculously sustained, v. 28. He was there in very intimate communion with God, without interruption, forty days and forty nights; and did not think it long; when we are weary of an hour or two spent in attendance upon God, and adoration of him, we should think how many days and nights Moses spent with him, and of the eternal day we hope to spend in praising him. During all this time, Moses did neither eat nor drink. Though he had, before, been kept so long fasting, yet he did not, this second time, take up so many days' provision along with him, but believed that man lives not by bread alone, and encouraged himself with the experience he had of the truth of it. So long he continued without meat and drink, (and, probably, without sleep too,) for

1. The power of God supported him, that he did not need it; he who made the body can nourish it without ordinary means, which he uses, but is not tied to; The life is more than meat. 2. His communion with God entertained him, so that he did not desire it. He had meat to eat, which the world knew not of, for it was his meat and drink to hear the word of God and pray. The abundant satisfaction his soul had in the word of God, and the visions of the Almighty, made him forget the body and the pleasures of it. When God would treat his favourite Moses, it was not with meat and drink, but with his light, law, and love; with the knowledge of himself and his will; then man did indeed eat angels' food. See what we should value as the truest pleasure; the kingdom of God is not meat and drink, neither the plenty nor delicacy of that, but righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. As Moses, so Elijah and Christ, fasted forty days and forty nights: the more dead we are to the delights of sense, the better prepared we are for the pleasures of heaven.

II. The coming down of Moses from the mount, greatly enriched, and miraculously adorned.

1. He came down enriched with the best treasure, for he brought in his hands the two tables of the law, written with the finger of God, v. 28, 29. It is a great favour to have the law given us: this favour was shewed to Israel, Ps. 147. 19, 20. It is a great honour to be employed in delivering God's law to others; this honour was done to Moses.

2. He came down adorned with the best beauty; for the skin of his face shone, v. 29. This time of his being in the mount, he heard only what he had heard before, but he saw more of the glory of God, which having with open face beheld, he was in some measure changed into the same image, from glory to glory, 2 Cor. 3. 18. The last time, he came down from the mount with the glory of a magistrate, to frown upon and chastise Israel's idolatry; now, with the glory of an angel, with tidings of peace and reconciliation. Then he came with a rod, now with the spirit of meekness. Now this may be looked upon, (1.) As a great honour done to Moses, that the people might never again question his mission, or think or speak slightly of him. He carried his credentials in his very countenance, which, some think, retained, as long as he lived, some remainders of this glory, which perhaps contributed to the vigour of his old age; that eye could not wax dim which had seen God, nor that face become wrinkled which had shone with his glory; the Israelites could not look him in the face, but they must there read his commission; Thus it was done to the man whom the King of kings did delight to honour; yet, after this, they murmured against him; for the most sensible proofs will not of themselves conquer an obstinate infidelity. The shining of Moses's face was a great honour to him, yet that was no glory, in comparison with the glory which excelled; we read of our Lord Jesus, not only that his face shone as the sun, but his whole body also, for his raiment was white and glistening, Luke, 9. 29. But, when he came down from the mount, he quite laid aside that glory, it being his will that we should walk by faith, not by sight. (2.) It was also a great favour to the people, and an encouragement to them, that God put this glory upon him who was their intercessor, thereby giving them assurance that he was accepted, and they through him. Thus the advancement of Christ, our Advocate with the Father, is the great support of our faith. (3.) It was the effect of his sight of God. Communion with God, [1.] Makes the face to shine in true honour. Serious godliness puts a lustre upon a man's countenance, such as commands esteem and affection. [2.] It should make the face to shine in universal holiness; when we have been in the mount with God, we should let our light shine before men, in humility, meekness, and all the instances of a heavenly conversation; thus must the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us, even the beauty of holiness, that all we converse with may take knowledge of us, that we have been with Jesus, Acts, 4. 13.

Now concerning the shining of Moses's face, observe here,

First, That Moses was not aware of it himself; (v. 29.) He wist not that the skin of his face shone. Thus, 1. It is the infelicity of some, that their faces shine in true grace, and yet they do not know it, to take the comfort of it. Their friends see much of God in them, but they themselves are ready to think they have no grace. 2. It is the humility of others, that their faces shine in eminent gifts and usefulness, and yet they do not know it, to be puffed up with it; whatever beauty God puts upon us, we should still be filled with such an humble sense of our own unworthiness and manifold infirmities, as will make us even overlook and forget that which makes our faces shine.

Secondly, That Aaron and the children of Israel saw it, and were afraid, v. 30. The truth of it was attested by a multitude of witnesses, who were also conscious of the terror of it. It not only dazzled their eyes, but struck such an awe upon them, as obliged them to retire: probably, they doubted whether it were a token of God's favour, or of his displeasure; and though it seemed most likely to be a good omen, yet, being conscious of guilt, they feared the worst, especially remembering the posture Moses found them in when he came last down from the mount. Holiness will command reverence: but the sense of sin makes men afraid of their friends, and even of that which really is a favour to them.

Thirdly, That Moses put a vail upon his face, when he perceived that it shone, v. 33, 35. 1. This teaches us all a lesson of modesty and humility. We must be content to have our excellencies obscured, and a vail drawn over them, not coveting to make a fair shew in the flesh. They that are truly desirous to be owned and accepted of God, will likewise desire not to be taken notice of or applauded by men, Qui bene latuit, bene vixit—There is a laudable concealment. 2. It teaches ministers to accommodate themselves to the capacities of the people, and to preach to them as they are able to bear it. Let all that art, and all that learning, be veiled, which tend to amusement rather than edification; and let the strong condescend to the infirmities of the weak. 3. This vail signified the darkness of that dispensation; the ceremonial institutions had in them much of Christ and the grace of the gospel, but a vail was drawn over it, so that the children of Israel could not distinctly and steadfastly see those good things to come, which the law had the shadow of. It was beauty veiled; gold in the mine; a pearl in the shell: but, thanks be to God, by the gospel, life and immortality are brought to light, the vail is taken away from off the Old Testament; yet still it remains upon the hearts of those who shut their eyes against the light. Thus the apostle expounds this passage, 2 Cor. 3. 13. . 15.

Fourthly, That when he went in before the Lord, to speak with him in the tabernacle of meeting, he put off the vail, v. 34. Then there was no occasion for it, and, before God, every man does and must appear un veiled; for all things are naked and open before the eyes of him with whom we have to do, and it is folly for us to think of concealing or disguising any thing. Every vail must be thrown aside, when we come to present ourselves unto the Lord. This signified also, as it is explained, (2 Cor. 3. 16.) that when a soul turns to the Lord, the vail shall be taken away, that with open face it may behold his glory. And when we shall come before the Lord in heaven, to be the reformer ever speaking with him, the vail shall not only be taken off from the divine glory, but from our hearts and eyes, that we may see as we are seen, and know as we are known.

CHAP. XXXV.

What shewls have been said and done upon Moses' coming down the first time from the mount, if the golden calf had not broken the measures, and put all into disorder, now at last, when with great difficulty reconciliation was made, begins to be said and done; and that great affair of the setting up of God's worship, is put into its former channel again, and goes on now without interruption. I. Moses gives Israel those instructions, received from God, which required immediate observance. 1. Concerning the sabbath, v. 1. . 3. 2. Concerning the contribution that was to be made for the erecting of the tabernacle, v. 4. . 9. 3. Concerning the framing of the tabernacle and the utensils of it, v. 10. . 19. II. The people bring in their contributions, v. 20. . 29. III. The head-workmen are nominated, v. 30. . 35.

1. AND Moses gathered all the congregation of the children of Israel together, and said into them. These are the words which the LORD hath commanded, that ye should do them. 2. Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you an holy day, a sabbath of rest to the LORD: whosoever doeth work therein shall be put to death. 3. Ye shall kindle no fire throughout your habitations upon the sabbath-day. 4. And Moses spake unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, saying, This is the thing which the LORD commanded, saying, 5. Take ye from amongst you an offering unto the LORD: Whosoever is of a willing heart, let him bring it, an offering of the LORD; gold, and silver, and brass, 6. And blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats' hair, 7. And rams' skins dyed red, and badgers' skins, and shittim-wood, 8. And oil for the light, and spices for anointing oil, and for the sweet incense, 9. And onyx-stones, and stones to be set for the ephod, and for the breast-plate. 10. And every wise-hearted among you shall come, and make all that the LORD hath commanded; 11. The tabernacle, his tent, and his covering, his taches, and his boards, his bars, his pillars, and his sockets, 12. The ark, and the staves thereof, with the mercy-seat, and the veil of the covering, 13. The table, and his staves, and all his vessels, and the shew-bread. 14. The candlestick also for the light, and his furniture, and his lamps, with the oil for the light, 15. And the incense altar, and his staves, and the anointing oil, and the sweet incense, and the hanging for the door at the entering in of the tabernacle, 16. The altar of burnt-offering, with his brazen grate, his staves, and all his vessels, the laver and his foot, 17. The hangings of the court, his pillars, and their sockets, and the hanging for the door of the court, 18. The pins of the tabernacle, and the pins of the court, and their cords, 19. The cloths of service, to do service in the holy place the holy garments for Aaron the priest, and the garments of his sons, to minister in the priest-office.

It was said in general, (ch. 34. 32.) Moses gave them in commandment all that the Lord had spoken with him. But the erecting and furnishing of the tabernacle being the work to which they were now immediately to apply themselves, here is a particular mention of the orders given concerning that.

1. All the congregation is summoned to attend, (v. 1.) that is, the heads and rulers of the congregation, the representatives of the several tribes, who must receive instructions from Moses, as he had received them from the Lord, and must communicate them to the people. Thus St. John, being commanded to write to the seven churches what had been revealed to him, writes it to the angels, or ministers, of the churches.

2. Moses gave them in charge all that (and that only) which God had commanded him; thus he approved himself faithful both to God and Israel, between whom he was a messenger or mediator. If he had added, altered, or diminished, he had been false to both.

But both sides having reposed a trust in him, he was true to the trust; yet he was faithful as a servant only, but Christ as a Son, Heb. 3. 5, 6.

3. He begins with the law of the sabbath, because that was much insisted on in the instructions he had received; (v. 2, 3.) Six days shall work be done, work for the tabernacle, the work of the day that was now to be done in its day; and they had little else to do here in the wilderness, where they had neither husbandry nor merchandise, neither food to get, nor clothes to make: but on the seventh day you must not strike a stroke, no, not at the tabernacle-work; the honour of the sabbath was above that of the sanctuary more ancient, and more lasting; that must be to you a holy day, devoted to God, and not to be spent in common business, it is a sabbath of rest. It is a sabbath of sabbaths, so some read it; more honourable and excellent than any of the other feasts, and should survive them all. A sabbath of sabbatism, so others read it, being typical of that sabbatism or rest, both spiritual and eternal, which remains for the people of God, Heb. 4. 9. It is a sabbath of rest, that is, in which a rest from all worldly labour must be very carefully and strictly observed. It is a sabbath, and a little sabbath, so some of the Jews would have it read; not only observing the whole day as a sabbath, but an hour before the beginning of it, and an hour after the ending of it, which they throw in over and above out of their own time, and call a little sabbath, to shew how glad they are of the approach of the sabbath, and how loath to part with it. It is a sabbath of rest, but it is rest to the Lord, to whose honour it must be devoted. A penalty is here annexed to the breach of it, Whosoever doeth work therein shall be put to death; and a particular prohibition of kindling fires on the sabbath-day for any servile work, as smiths' work, or plumbers', &c.

4. He orders preparation to be made for the setting up of the tabernacle. Two things were to be done:

[1.] All that were able must contribute; Take ye from among you an offering, v. 5. The tabernacle was to be dedicated to the honour of God, and used in his service; and therefore what was brought for the setting up and furnishing of that, was an offering to the Lord. Our goodness extends not to God, but what is laid out for the support of his kingdom and interest among men, he is pleased to accept as an offering to himself; and he requires such acknowledgments of our receiving our all from him, and such instances of our dedicating our all to him. The rule is, Whosoever is of a willing heart, let him bring. It was not to be a tax imposed upon them, but a benevolence or voluntary contribution; to intimate to us, [1.] That God has not made our yoke heavy. He is a Prince that does not burthen his subjects with taxes, nor make them to serve with an offering, but draws with the cords of a man, and leaves it to ourselves to judge what is right; his is a government that there is no cause to complain of, for he does not rule with rigour. [2.] That God loves a cheerful giver, and is best pleased with the free-will offerings. Those services are acceptable to him, that come from the willing heart of a willing people, Ps. 110. 3.

[2.] All that were skillful must work; (v. 10.) Every wise-hearted among you shall come, and make. See how God dispenses his gifts variously; and, as every man hath received the gift, so he must minister, 1 Pet. 4. 10. Those that were rich must bring in materials to work on; those that were ingenious must serve the tabernacle with their ingenuity; as they needed one another, so the tabernacle needed them both, 1 Cor. 12. 7, 21. The work was likely to go on, when some helped with their purses, others with their hands, and both with a willing heart. Moses, as he had told them what must be given, (v. 5. .9.) so he gives them the general heads of what must be made, (v. 11. .19.) that, seeing how much work was before them, they might apply themselves to it the more vigorously, and every hand might be busy; and it gave them such an idea of the fabric designed, that they could not but long to see it finished.

20. And all the congregation of the children of Israel departed from the presence of Moses. 21. And they came, every one whose heart stirred him up, and every one whom his spirit made willing, and they brought the LORD's offering to the work of the tabernacle of the congregation, and for all his service, and for the holy garments. 22. And they came, both men and women, as many as were willing-hearted, and brought bracelets, and ear-rings, and rings, and tablets, all jewels of gold: and every man that offered offered an offering of gold unto the LORD. 23. And every man with whom was found blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats' hair, and red skins of rams, and badgers' skins, brought them. 24. Every one that did offer an offering of silver and brass brought the LORD's offering: and every man, with whom was found shittim-wood for any work of the service, brought it. 25. And all the women that were wise-hearted did spin with their hands, and brought that which they had spun, both of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, and of fine linen. 26. And all the women whose hearts stirred them up in wisdom spun goats' hair. 27. And the rulers brought onyx-stones, and stones to be set, for the ephod, and for the breast-plate; 28. And spice, and oil for the light, and for the anointing oil, and for the sweet incense. 29. The children of Israel brought a willing offering unto the LORD, every man and woman, whose heart made them willing to bring for all manner of work, which the LORD had commanded to be made by the hand of Moses.

Moses having made known to them the will of God, they went home, and immediately put in practice what they had heard, v. 20. Oh that every congregation would thus depart from the hearing of the word of God, with a full resolution to be doers of the same! Observe here,

I. The offerings that were brought for the service of the tabernacle, v. 21, &c. Concerning which many things may be noted.

1. It is intimated that they brought their offerings immediately: they departed to their tents immediately to fetch their offering, and did not desire time to consider of it, lest their zeal should be cooled by delays. What duty God convinces us of, and calls us to, we should set about speedily. No season will be more convenient than the present season.

2. It is said that their spirits made them willing, (v. 21.) and their hearts, v. 29. What they did, they did cheerfully, and from a good principle. They were willing, and it was not any external inducement that made them so, but their spirits. It was from a principle of love to God and his service; a desire of his presence with them in his ordinances; gratitude for the great things he had done for them; faith in his promise of what he would further do; or, at least, from the present consideration of these things, that they were willing to offer. What we give and do for God, is then acceptable when it comes from a good principle in the heart and spirit.

3. When it is said that as many as were willing-hearted brought their offerings, (v. 22.) it should seem as if there were some who were not, who loved their gold better than their God, and would not part with it, no not for the service of the tabernacle; such there are, who will be called Israelites, and yet will not be moved by the equity of the thing, God's expectations from them, and the good examples of those about them, to part with any thing for the interests of God's kingdom: they are for the true religion, provided it be cheap, and will cost them nothing.

4. The offerings were of divers kinds, according as they had, those that had gold and precious stones, brought them, not thinking any thing too good and too rich to part with for the honour of God. Those that had not precious stones to bring, brought goats' hair, and rams' skins: if we cannot do as much as others for God, we must not therefore sit still and do nothing; if the meaner offerings, which are according to our ability, gain us not such a reputation among men, yet they shall not fail of acceptance with God, who requires according to what a man hath, and not according to what he hath not, 2 Cor. 8. 12. Two mites from a pauper were more pleasing than so many talents from a Dives. God has an eye to the heart of the giver, more than to the value of the gift.

5. Many of the things they offered were their ornaments, bracelets and rings, and tablets or lockets; (v. 22.) and even the women parted with these. Can a maid forget her ornaments? Thus far they forgot them, that they preferred the beautifying of the sanctuary before their own adorning. Let this teach us in general, to part with that for God when he calls for it, which is very dear to us, which we value, and value ourselves by; and particularly to lay aside our ornaments, and deny ourselves in them, when either they occasion offence to others, or feed our own pride. If we think those gospel-rules concerning our clothing too strict, (1 Tim. 2. 9, 10. 1 Pet. 3. 3, 4.) I fear we should scarcely have done as these Israelites did. If they thought their ornaments well-bestowed upon the tabernacle, shall not we think the want of ornaments well made up by the graces of the Spirit? Prov. 1. 9.

6. These rich things that they offered, we may suppose, were mostly the spoils of the Egyptians; for the Israelites in Egypt were kept poor, till they borrowed at parting. And we may suppose the rulers had better things, (v. 27.) because, having more influence among the Egyptians, they borrowed larger sums. Who would have thought that ever the wealth of Egypt should have been so well employed; but thus God has often made the earth to help the woman, Rev. 12. 16. It was by a special providence and promise of God, that the Israelites got all that spoil, and therefore it was highly fit that they should devote a part of it to the service of that God to whom they owed it all. Let every man give according as God hath prospered him, 1 Cor. 16. 2. Extraordinary successes should be acknowledged by extraordinary offerings. Apply it to human learning, arts and sciences, which are borrowed, as it were from the Egyptians; those that are enriched with these must devote them to the service of God and his tabernacle: they may be used as helps to understand the scriptures, as ornaments or hand-maids to divinity. But then great care must be taken that Egypt's gods mingle not with Egypt's gold. Moses, though learned in all the learning of the Egyptians, did not therefore pretend, in the least instance, to correct the pattern shewed him in the mount. The furnishing of the tabernacle with the riches of Egypt, was perhaps a good omen to the Gentiles, who, in the fulness of time, should be brought into the gospel-tabernacle, and their silver and their gold with them, (Isa. 60. 9.) and it should be said, Blessed be Egypt my people, Isa. 19. 25.

7. We may suppose that the remembrance of the offerings made for the golden calf made them the more forward in these offerings. Those that had then parted with their ear-rings, would now testify their repentance by giving the rest of their jewels to the service of God: godly sorrow worketh such a revenge, 2 Cor. 7. 11. And those that had kept themselves pure from that idolatry, yet argued with themselves, "Were they so forward in contributing to an idol, and shall we be backward or sneaking in our offerings to the Lord?" Thus some good was brought even out of that evil.

II. The work that was done for the service of the tabernacle: (v. 25.) The women did spin with their hands; some spun fine work, of blue and purple, others coarse work, of goats' hair, and yet their's also is said to be done in wisdom, v. 26. As it is not only rich gifts, so it is not only fine work, that God accepts. Notice is here taken of the good women's work for God, as well as of Bezaleel's and Aholiab's. The meanest hand employed, the meanest service performed, for the honour of God, shall have an honourable recompence; Mary's anointing of Christ's head shall be told for a memorial, (Matth. 26. 13.) and a record is kept of the women that laboured in the gospel tabernacle, (Phil. 4. 3.) and were helpers to Paul in Christ Jesus, Rom. 16. 3. It is part of the character of the virtuous woman, that she layeth her hand to the spindle, Prov. 31. 19. This employment was here turned to a pious use, as it may be still (though we have no hangings to make for the tabernacle) by the imitation of the charity of Dorcas, who made coats and garments for poor widows, Acts, 9. 39. Even those that are not in a capacity to give in charity, may yet work in charity; and thus the poor may relieve the poor, and those that have nothing but their limbs and senses may be very charitable in the labour of love.

30. And Moses said unto the children of Israel, See, the LORD hath called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah; 31. And he hath filled him with the Spirit of God, in wisdom, in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship; 32. And to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, 33. And in the cutting of stones, to set them, and in carving of wood, to make any manner of cunning work. 34. And he hath put in his heart that he may teach, both he, and Aholiab, the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan. 35. Them hath he filled with wisdom of heart, to work all manner of work, of the engraver, and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer, in blue, and in purple, in scarlet, and in fine linen, and of the weaver, even of them that do any work, and of those that devise cunning work.

Here is the divine appointment of the master-workmen, that there might be no strife for the office, and that all who were employed in the work might take direction from, and give account to, these general inspectors; for God is the God of order, and not of confusion.

Observe, 1. Those whom God called by name to this service, he filled with the Spirit of God, to qualify them for it, v. 30, 31. Skill in secular employments is God's gift, and comes from above, Jam. 1. 17. From him the faculty is, and the improvement of it. To his honour therefore all knowledge must be devoted, and we must study how to serve him with it. The work was extraordinary which Bezaleel was designed for, and therefore he was qualified in an extraordinary manner for it; thus, when the apostles were appointed to be master-builders in setting up the gospel-tabernacle, they were filled with the Spirit of God in wisdom and understanding. 2. They were appointed, not only to devise, but to work, (v. 32.) to work all manner of work, v. 35. Those of eminent gifts, that are capable of directing others, must not think that that will excuse them in idleness: many are ingenious enough in cutting out work for other people, and can tell what this man and that man should do, but the burthens they bind on others they themselves will not touch with one of their fingers. These will fall under the character of slothful servants. 3. They were not only to devise and work themselves, but they were to teach others, v. 34. Not only had Bezaleel power to command, but he was to take pains to instruct. Those that rule should teach; and those to whom God has given knowledge should be willing to communicate it for the benefit of others, not coveting to monopolize it.

CHAP. XXXVI.

In this chapter, I. The work of the tabernacle is begun, v. 1..4. II. A stop put to the people's contributions, v. 5..7. III. A particular account is given of the making of the tabernacle itself: The fine curtains of it, v. 8..13. The coarse ones, v. 14..19. The boards, v. 20..30. The bars, v. 31..34. The partition-rail, v. 35, 36. And the hanging for the door, v. 37, 38.

1. THEN wrought Bezaleel and Aholiab, and every wise-hearted man, in whom the LORD put wisdom and understanding to know how to work all manner of work for the service of the sanctuary, according to all that the LORD had commanded. 2. And Moses called Bezaleel and Aholiab, and every wise-hearted man, in whose heart the LORD had put wisdom, even every one whose heart stirred him up to come unto the work to do it: 3. And they received of Moses all the offering which the children of Israel had brought for the work of the service of the sanctuary, to make it withal. And they brought yet unto him free offerings every morning. 4. And all the wise men, that wrought all the work of the sanctuary, came every man from his work which they made; 5. And they spake unto Moses, saying, The people bring much more than enough for the service of the work, which the LORD commanded to make. 6. And Moses gave commandment, and they caused it to be proclaimed throughout the camp, saying, Let neither man nor woman make any more work for the offering of the sanctuary. So the people were restrained from bringing. 7. For the stuff they had was sufficient for all the work to make it, and too much.

We have here,

I. The workmen set in without delay. Then they wrought, v. 1. When God had qualified them for the work, then they applied themselves to it. Note, The talents we are intrusted with must not be laid up, but laid out; not hid in a napkin, but traded with. What have we all our gifts for, but to do good with them? They began when Moses called them, v. 2. Even those whom God has qualified for, and inclined to, the service of the tabernacle, yet must wait for a regular call to it, either extraordinary, as that of preachers and apostles, or ordinary, as that of pastors and teachers. And observe who they were that Moses called; those in whose heart God had put wisdom for this purpose, beyond their natural capacity, and whose heart stirred them up to come to the work in good earnest. Note, Those are to be called to the building of the gospel-tabernacle whom God has by his grace made in some measure fit for the work, and free to engage in it. Ability and willingness (with resolution) are the two things to be regarded in the call of ministers. Has God given them not only knowledge, but wisdom? (For they that would win souls must be wise, and have their hearts stirred up to come to the work, and not to the honour only; to do it, and not to talk of it only.) Let them come to it with full purpose of heart to go through with it.

The materials, which the people had contributed, were delivered by Moses to the workmen, v. 3. They could not create a tabernacle, that is, make it out of nothing, nor work, unless they had something to work upon; we find that the people brought the materials, and that Moses put them into their hands. Precious souls are the materials of the gospel tabernacle, they are built up a spiritual house; (1 Pet. 2. 5.) to this end they are to offer themselves a free-will offering to the Lord, for his service, (Rom. 15. 16.) and they are then committed to the care of his ministers, as builders, to be framed and wrought upon for their edification and increase in holiness, till they all come, like the curtains of the tabernacle, in the unity of the faith to be a holy temple, Eph. 2. 21, 22.—4. 12, 13.

11. The contributions restrained. The people continued to bring free offerings every morning, v. 3. Note, We should always make it our morning's work to bring our offering unto the Lord; even the spiritual offerings of prayer and praise, and a broken heart surrendered entirely to God. This is that which the duty of every day requires. God's compassions are new every morning, and so should our offerings be, our free offerings: God's grace to us is free, and so must our duty to him be. Probably there were some that were backward at first to bring their offering, but their neighbours' forwardness stirred them up and shamed them. The zeal of some provoked many. There are those who will be content to follow, who yet do not care for leading, in a good work. It is best to be forward, but better late than never. Or, perhaps some who had offered at first, having pleasure in reflecting upon it, offered more; so far were they from grudging what they had contributed, that they doubled their contribution. Thus, in charity, give a portion to seven, and also to eight; having given much, give more. Now observe,

1. The honesty of the workmen. When they had cut out their work, and found how their stuff held out, and that the people were still forward to bring in more, they went in a body to Moses to tell him that there needed no more contributions, v. 4, 5. Had they sought their own things, they had now a fair opportunity of enriching themselves by the people's gifts: for they might have made up their work, and converted the overplus to their own use, as perquisites of their place. But they were men of integrity, that scorned to do so mean a thing as to sponge upon the people, and enrich themselves with that which was offered to the Lord. Those are the greatest cheats that cheat the public. If to murder many is worse than to murder one, by the same rule, to defraud communities, and to rob the church or state, is a much greater crime than to pick the pocket of a single person. But these workmen were not only ready to account for all they received, but were not willing to receive more than they had occasion for, lest they should come either into the temptation, or under the suspicion, of taking it to themselves. These were men that knew when they had enough.

2. The liberality of the people; though they saw what an abundance was contributed, yet they continued to offer, till they were forbidden by a proclamation, v. 6, 7. A rare instance! Most need a spur to quicken their charity, few need a bridle to check it; yet these did. Had Moses aimed to enrich himself, he might have suffered them still to bring in their offerings; and, when the work was finished, might have taken the remainder to himself; but he also preferred the public before his own private interest, and was therein a good example to all in public trusts. It is said (v. 6.) The people were restrained from bringing; they looked upon it as a restraint upon them, not to be allowed to do more for the tabernacle; such was the zeal of those people, who gave to their power, yea, and beyond their power, praying the collectors with much entreaty to receive the gift, 2 Cor. 8. 3, 4. These were the fruits of a first love; in these last days charity is grown too cold for us to expect such things from it.

8. And every wise-hearted man among them that wrought the work of the tabernacle made ten curtains of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet: with cherubims of cunning work made he them. 9. The length of one curtain was twenty and eight cubits, and the breadth of one curtain four cubits: the curtains were all of one size. 10. And he coupled the five curtains one unto another: and the other five curtains he coupled one unto another. 11. And he made loops of blue on the edge of one curtain from the selvedge in the coupling: likewise he made in the uttermost side of another curtain, in the coupling of the second. 12. Fifty loops made he in one curtain, and fifty loops made he in the edge of the curtain which was in the coupling of the second: the loops held one curtain to another. 13. And he made fifty taches of gold, and coupled the curtains one unto another with the taches: So it became one tabernacle.

The first work they set about was the framing of the house; that must be done before the furniture of it was prepared. This house was not made of timber or stone, but of curtains curiously embroidered and coupled together. This served to typify the state of the church in this world, the palace of God's kingdom among men. 1. Though it is upon the earth, yet its foundation is not in the earth, as that of a house is; no, Christ's kingdom is not of this world, nor founded in it. 2. It is mean and mutable, and in a militant state; shepherds dwelt in tents, and God is the Shepherd of Israel; soldiers dwelt in tents, and the Lord is a Man of war, and his church marches through an enemy's country, and must fight its way. The kings of the earth close themselves in cedar, (Jer. 22. 15.) but the ark of God was lodged in curtains only. 3. Yet there is a beauty in holiness; the curtains were embroidered, so is the church adorned with the gifts and graces of the Spirit, that raiment of needle-work, Ps. 45. 14. 4. The several societies of believers are united in one, and, as here, all become one tabernacle; for there is one Lord, one faith, and one baptism.

14. And he made curtains of goats' hair, for the tent over the tabernacle: eleven curtains he made them. 15. The length of one curtain was thirty cubits, and four cubits was the breadth of one curtain: the eleven curtains were of one size. 16. And he coupled five curtains by themselves, and six curtains by themselves. 17. And he made fifty loops upon the uttermost edge of the curtain in the coupling, and fifty loops made he upon the edge of the curtain which coupleth the second. 18. And he made fifty taches of brass to couple the tent together, that it might be one. 19. And he made a covering for the tent of rams skins dyed red, and a covering of badgers' skins above that. 20. And he made boards for the tabernacle of shittim-wood, standing up. 21. The length of a board was ten cubits, and the breadth of a board one cubit and a half. 22. One board had two tenons, equally distant one from another: thus did he make for all the boards of the tabernacle. 23. And he made boards for the tabernacle; twenty boards for the south side southward: 24. And forty sockets of silver he made under the twenty boards; two sockets under one board for his two tenons, and two sockets under another board for his two tenons. 25. And for the other side of the tabernacle, which is toward the north corner, he made twenty boards, 26. And their forty sockets of silver; two sockets under one board, and two sockets under another board. 27. And for the sides of the tabernacle westward he made six boards. 28. And two boards made he for the corners of the tabernacle in the two sides. 29. And they were coupled beneath, and coupled together at the head thereof, to one ring: thus he did to both of them in both the corners. 30. And there were eight boards; and their sockets were sixteen sockets of silver, under every board two sockets. 31. And he made bars of shittim-wood; five for the boards of the one side of the tabernacle, 32. And five bars for the boards of the other side of the tabernacle, and five bars for the boards of the tabernacle for the sides westward. 33. And he made the middle bar to shoot through the boards from the one end to the other. 34. And he overlaid the boards with gold, and made their rings of gold to be places for the bars, and overlaid the bars with gold.

Here, 1. The shelter and special protection that the church is under, are signified by the curtains of hair-cloth, which were spread over the tabernacle, and the covering of rams' skins and badgers' skins over them, v. 14. . 19. God has provided for his people a shadow from the heat, and a covert from storm and rain; (Isa. 4. 6.) they are armed against all weathers; the sun and moon shall not smile them; and they are protected from the storms of divine wrath, that hail which will sweep away the refuge of lies, Isa. 28. 17. Those that dwell in God's house shall find, be the tempest ever so violent, or the dropping ever so continual, it does not rain in. 2. The strength and stability of the church, though it is but a tabernacle, are signified by the boards and bars with which the curtains were borne up, v. 20. . 34. The boards were coupled together and joined by the bars that shot through them; for the union of the church, and the hearty agreement of those that are its stays and supporters, contribute abundantly to its strength and establishment.

35. And he made a vail of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen: with cherubims made he it of cunning work. 36. And he made thereunto four pillars of shittim-wood, and overlaid them with gold: there hooks were of gold; and he cast for them four sockets of silver. 37. And he made an hanging for the tabernacle door of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen, of needle-work; 38. And the five pillars of it with their hooks: and he overlaid their chapters and their fillets with gold: but their five sockets were of brass.

In the building of a house there is a great deal of work about the doors and partitions; in the tabernacle they were answerable to the rest of the fabric: there were curtains for doors, and vails for partitions. 1. There was a vail made for a partition between the holy place and the most holy, v. 35, 36. This signified the darkness and distance of that dispensation, compared with the New Testament, which shews us the glory of God more clearly, and invites us to draw near to it; and the darkness and distance of our present state, in comparison with heaven, where we shall be ever with the Lord, and see him as he is. 2. There was a vail made for the door of the tabernacle, v. 37, 38. At this door the people assembled, though forbidden to enter; for, while we are in this present state, we must get as near God as we can.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Bezaleel and his workmen are still busy, making, I. The ark with the mercy-seat and the cherubims, v. 1. . 9. II. The table with its vessels, v. 10. . 16. III. The candlestick with its appurtenances, v. 17. . 24. IV. The golden altar for incense, v. 25. . 28. V. The holy oil and incense, v. 29. The particular appointment concerning each of which we had before in the 25th and 30th chapters.

1. AND Bezaleel made the ark of shittim-wood: two cubits and a half was the length of it, and a cubit and a half the breadth of it, and a cubit and a half the height of it: 2. And he overlaid it with pure gold within and without, and made a crown of gold to it round about. 3. And he cast for it four rings of gold, to be set by the four corners of it; even two rings upon the one side of it, and two rings upon the other side of it. 4. And he made staves of shittim-wood, and overlaid them with gold. 5. And he put the staves into the rings by the sides of the ark, to bear the ark. 6. And he made the mercy-seat of pure gold: two cubits and a half was the length thereof, and one cubit and a half the breadth thereof. 7. And he made two cherubims of gold, beaten out of one piece made he them, on the two ends of the mercy-seat: 8. One cherub on the end on this side, and another cherub on the other end on that side: out of the mercy-seat made he the cherubims on the two ends thereof. 9. And the cherubims spread out their wings on high, and covered with their wings over the mercy-seat, with their faces one to another; even to the mercy-seat-ward were the faces of the cherubims.

It may be thought strange that Moses, when he had recorded so fully the instructions given him upon the mount for the making of all these things, should here record as particularly the making of them; when it might have sufficed only to have said, in a few words, that each of these things was made exactly according to the directions before recited. We are sure that Moses, when he wrote by divine inspiration, used no vain repetitions; there are no idle words in scripture. Why then are so many chapters taken up with this narrative, which we are tempted to think needless and tedious? But we must consider, 1. That Moses wrote primarily for the people of Israel, to whom it would be of great use to read and hear often of these divine and sacred treasures with which they were intrusted. These several ornaments wherewith the tabernacle was furnished, they were not admitted to see, but the priests only, and therefore it was requisite that they should be thus largely described particularly to them. That which they ought to read again and again, (lest they should fail of doing it,) is written again and again: thus many of the same passages of the history of Christ are in the New Testament related by two or three, and some by four, of the evangelists, for the same reason. The great things of God's law and gospel we need to have inculcated upon us again and again. To write the same, (says St. Paul,) to me is not grievous, but for you it is safe, Phil. 3. 1. 2. Moses would thus shew the great care which he and his workmen took, to make every thing exactly according to the pattern shewed him in the mount. Having before given us the original, he here gives us the copy, that we may compare them, and observe how exactly they agree. Thus he appeals to every reader concerning his fidelity to him that appointed him, in all his house, and in all the particulars of it, Heb. 3. 5. And thus he teaches us to have respect to all God's commandments, even to every iota and tittle of them. 3. It is intimated hereby, that God takes delight in the sincere obedience of his people, and keeps an exact account of it, which shall be produced to their honour in the resurrection of the just. None can be so punctual in their duty, but God will be as punctual in his notices of it. He is not unrighteous to forget the work and labour of love, in any instance of it, Heb. 6. 10. 4. The spiritual riches and beauties of the gospel-tabernacle are hereby recommended to our frequent and serious consideration. Go walk about this Zion, view it and review it: the more you contemplate the glories of the church, the more you will admire them and be in love with them. The charter of its privileges, and the account of its constitution, will very well bear a second reading.

In these verses we have an account of the making of the ark, with its glorious and most significant appurtenances, the mercy-seat and the cherubims. Consider these three together, and they represent the glory of a holy God, the sincerity of a holy heart, and the communion that is between them, in and by a Mediator. 1. It is the glory of a holy God, that he dwells between the cherubims, that is, is continually attended and adored by the blessed angels, whose swiftness was signified by the wings of the cherubims, while their unanimity and joint concurrence in their services were signified by their faces being one towards another. 2. It is the character of an upright heart, that, like the ark of the testimony, it has the law of God hid and kept in it. 3. By Jesus Christ, the great Propitiation, there is reconciliation made, and a communion settled, between us and God: he interposes between us and God's displeasure; and not only so, but through him we become entitled to God's favour. If he write his law in our heart, he will be to us a God, and we shall be to him a people; from the mercy-seat he will teach us, there he will accept us, and shew himself merciful to our unrighteousness; and under the shadow of his wings we shall be safe and easy.

10. And he made the table of shittim-wood: two cubits was the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof: 11. And he overlaid it with pure gold, and made thereunto a crown of gold round about. 12. Also he made thereunto a border of an hand-breadth round about; and made a crown of gold for the border thereof round about. 13. And he cast for it four rings of gold, and put the rings upon the four corners that were in the four feet thereof, 14. Over against the border were the rings, the places for the staves to bear the table. 15. And he made the staves of shittim-wood, and overlaid them with gold, to bear the table. 16. And he made the vessels which were upon the table, his dishes, and his spoons, and his bowls, and his covers to cover withal, of pure gold. 17. And he made the candlestick of pure gold: of beaten work made he the candlestick; his shaft, and his branch, his bowls, his knops, and his flowers, were of the same: 18. And six branches going out of the sides thereof; three branches of the candlestick out of the one side thereof, and three branches of the candlestick out of the other side thereof: 19. Three bowls made after the fashion of almonds in one branch, a knop and a flower; and three bowls made like almonds in another branch, a knop and a flower: so throughout the six branches going out of the candlestick. 20. And in the candlestick were four bowls made like almonds, his knops, and his flowers: 21. And a knop under two branches of the same, and a knop under two branches of the same, and a knop under two branches of the same, according to the six branches going out of it. 22. Their knops and their branches were of the same: all of it was one beaten work of pure gold. 23. And he made his seven lamps, and his snuffers, and his snuff-dishes, of pure gold. 24. Of a talent of pure gold made he it, and all the vessels thereof.

Here is, 1. The making of the table on which the shew-bread was to be continually placed. God is a good Householder, that always keeps a plentiful table. Is the world his tabernacle? His providence in it spreads a table for all the creatures: he provides food for all flesh. Is the church his tabernacle? His grace in it spreads a table for all believers, furnished with the bread of life. But observe how much the dispensation of the gospel exceeds that of the law. Though here was a table furnished, it was only with shew-bread, bread to be looked upon, not to be fed upon, while it was on this table, and afterward only by the priests; but to the table which Christ has spread in the new covenant all real Christians are invited guests; and to them it is said, Eat, O friends, come eat of my bread; what the law gave but a sight of at a distance, the gospel gives the enjoyment of, and a hearty welcome to. 2. The making of the candlestick, which was not of wood overlaid with gold, but all beaten work of pure gold only, v. 17, 22. This signified that light of divine revelation with which God's church upon earth (which is his tabernacle among men) has always been enlightened, being always supplied with fresh oil from Christ the good Olive, Zech. 4. 2, 3. God's manifestations of himself in this world are but candle-light, compared with the day-light of the future state. The Bible is a golden candlestick, it is of pure gold; (Ps. 19. 10.) from it light is diffused to every part of God's tabernacle, that by it his spiritual priests may see to minister unto the Lord, and to do the service of his sanctuary. This candlestick has not only its bowls for necessary use, but its knops and flowers for ornament; there are many things which God saw fit to beautify his word with, which we can no more give a reason for than for these knops and flowers, and yet we are sure that they were added for good purpose. Let us bless God for this candlestick, have an eye to it continually, and dread the removal of it out of its place.

25. And he made the incense-altar of shittim-wood: the length of it was a cubit, and the breadth of it a cubit; it was four-square; and two cubits was the height of it; the horns thereof were of the same. 26. And he overlaid it with pure gold, both the top of it, and the sides thereof round about, and the horns of it: also he made unto it a crown of gold round about. 27. And he made two rings of gold for it under the crown thereof, by the two corners of it, upon the two sides thereof, to be places for the staves to bear it withal. 28. And he made the staves of shittim-wood, and overlaid them with gold. 29. And he made the holy anointing oil, and the pure incense of sweet spices, according to the work of the apothecary.

Here is, 1. The making of the golden altar, on which incense was to be burnt daily; which signified both the prayers of saints, and the intercession of Christ, to which are owing the acceptableness and success of those prayers. The rings and staves, and all the appurtenances of this altar, were overlaid with gold, as all the vessels of the table and candlestick were of gold, for these were used in the holy place. God is the Best, and we must serve him with the best we have; but the best we can serve him with, in his courts on earth, is but as brass, compared with the gold, the sinless and spotless perfection, with which his saints shall serve him in his holy place above. 2. The preparing of the incense, which was to be burnt upon this altar, and with it the holy anointing oil, (v. 29.) according to that dispensatory, ch. 30. 22, &c. God taught Bezaleel this art also; so that though he was not before acquainted with it, yet he made up these things according to the work of the apothecary, as dexterously and exactly as if he had been bred up to the trade. Where God gives wisdom and grace, it will make the man of God perfect, thoroughly furnished to every good work.

CHAP. XXXVIII.

Here is an account, I. Of the making of the brazen altar, (v. 1..7.) and the laver, v. 8. II. The preparing of the hangings for the enclosing of the court in which the tabernacle was to stand, v. 9..20. III. A summary account of the gold, silver, and brass, that was contributed to, and used in the preparing of the tabernacle, v. 21 ..31.

1. AND he made the altar of burnt-offering of shittim-wood: five cubits was the length thereof, and five cubits the breadth thereof; it was four square; and three cubits the height thereof. 2. And he made the horns thereof on the four corners of it; the horns thereof were of the same: and he overlaid it with brass. 3. And he made all the vessels of the altar, the pots, and the shovels, and the basins, and the flesh-hooks, and the fire-pans: all the vessels thereof made he of brass. 4. And he made for the altar a brazen grate of net-work, under the compass thereof, beneath unto the midst of it. 5. And he cast four rings for the four ends of the grate of brass, to be places for the staves. 6. And he made the staves of shittim-wood, and overlaid them with brass. 7. And he put the staves into the rings on the sides of the altar, to bear it withal; he made the altar hollow with boards. 8. And he made the laver of brass, and the foot of it of brass, of the looking-glasses of the women assembling, which assembled at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.

Bezaleel, having finished the gold-work, which, though the richest, yet was ordered to lie most out of sight, in the tabernacle itself, here goes on to prepare the court, which lay open to the view of all. Two things the court was furnished with, and both made of brass.

1. An altar of burnt-offering, v. 1..7. On this all their sacrifices were offered, and this was it which, being sanctified itself for this purpose by the divine appointment, sanctified the gift that was in faith offered on it. Christ was himself the Altar to his own sacrifice of atonement, and so he is to all our sacrifices of acknowledgment. We must have an eye to him in offering them, as God has in accepting them.

2. A laver, to hold water for the priests to wash in, when they went into minister, v. 8. This signified the provision that is made in the gospel of Christ, for the cleansing of our souls from the mortal pollution of sin by the merit and grace of Christ, that we may be fit to serve the holy God in holy duties. This is here said to be made of the looking-glasses (or mirrors) of the women that assembled at the door of the tabernacle. (1.) It should seem these women were eminent and exemplary for devotion, attending more frequently and seriously at the place of public worship than others did; and notice is here taken of it to their honour. Anna was such a one, long afterward, who departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day, Luke, 2. 37. In every age of the church there appear to have been some who have thus distinguished themselves by their serious zealous piety, and they have hereby dignified themselves; for devout women are really honourable women, (Acts, 13. 50.) and not the less so, for their being called, by the scoffers of the latter days, silly women. Probably, these women were such as shewed their zeal upon this occasion, by assisting in the work that was now going on for the service of the tabernacle. They assembled by troops, so the word is; a blessed sight! to see so many, and those so zealous, and so unanimous, in this good work. (2.) These women parted with their looking-glasses (which were of the finest brass, burnished for that purpose) for the use of the tabernacle. Those women that admire their own beauty, are in love with their own shadow, and make the putting on of apparel their chief adorning, by which they value and recommend themselves, can but ill spare their looking-glasses; yet these women offered them to God: Either, [1.] In token of their repentance for the former abuse of them, to the support of their pride and vanity; now that they were convinced of their folly, and had devoted themselves to the service of God at the door of the tabernacle, they thus threw away that which, though lawful and useful in itself, yet had been an occasion of sin to them. Thus Mary Magdalen, who had been a sinner, when she became a penitent, wiped Christ's feet with her hair. Or, [2.] In token of their great zeal for the work of the tabernacle; rather than the workmen should want brass, or not have of the best, they would part with their looking-glasses, though they could not well be without them. God's service and glory must always be preferred by us before any satisfactions or accommodations of our own. Let us never complain of the want of that which we may honour God by parting with. (3.) These looking-glasses were used for the making of the laver. Either they were artfully joined together, or else molten down and cast anew; but it is probable that the laver was so brightly burnished, that the sides of it still served for looking-glasses, that the priests, when they came to wash, might there see their faces, and so discover the spots and wash them clean. Note, In the washing of repentance, there is need of the looking-glass of self-examination. The word of God is a glass, in which we may see our faces; (see Jam. 1. 23.) and with it we must compare our own hearts and lives, that, finding out our blemishes, we may wash with particular sorrow, and application of the blood of Christ to our souls. Usually, the more particular we are in the confession of sin, the more comfort we have in the sense of the pardon.

9. And he made the court: on the south-side southward the hangings of the court were of fine twined linen, an hundred cubits: 10. Their pillars were twenty, and their brazen sockets twenty; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets were of silver. 11. And for the north side the hangings were an hundred cubits, their pillars were twenty.

and their sockets of brass twenty; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets of silver. 12. And for the west-side were hangings of fifty cubits, their pillars ten, and their sockets ten; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets of silver. 13. And for the east-side eastward fifty cubits. 14. The hangings of the one side of the gate were fifteen cubits; their pillars three, and their sockets three. 15. And for the other side of the court gate, on this hand and that hand, were hangings of fifteen cubits; their pillars three, and their sockets three. 16. All the hangings of the court round about were of fine twined linen. 17. And the sockets for the pillars were of brass; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets of silver; and the overlaying of their chapiters of silver; and all the pillars of the court were filleted with silver. 18. And the hanging for the gate of the court was needlework of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen: and twenty cubits was the length, and the height in the breadth was five cubits, answerable to the hangings of the court. 19. And their pillars were four, and their sockets of brass four; their hooks of silver, and the overlaying of their chapiters and their fillets of silver. 20. And all the pins of the tabernacle, and of the court round about, were of brass.

The walls of the court, or church-yard, were like the rest, curtains or hangings, made according to the appointment, ch. 27. 9, &c. This represented the state of the Old-Testament church; it was a garden enclosed: the worshippers were then confined to a little compass. But the enclosure being of curtains only, intimated that the confinement of the church to one particular nation was not to be perpetual. The dispensation itself was a tabernacle-dispensation, moveable and mutable, and in due time to be taken down and folded up, when the place of the tent should be enlarged and its cords lengthened, to make room for the Gentile world, as is foretold, Isa. 54. 2, 3. The church here on earth is but the court of God's house, and happy they who tread these courts, and flourish in them; but through these courts we are passing to the holy place above; Blessed are they that dwell in that house of God, they will be still praising him. The enclosing of a court before the tabernacle, teaches us a gradual approach to God. The priests that ministered must pass through the holy court, before they entered the holy house. Thus, before solemn ordinances, there ought to be the separated and enclosed court of a solemn preparation, in which we must wash our hands, and so draw near with a true heart.

21. This is the sum of the tabernacle, even of the tabernacle of testimony, as it was counted, according to the commandment of Moses, for the service of the Levites, by the hand of Ithamar, son to Aaron the priest. 22. And Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah, made all that the LORD commanded Moses. 23. And with him was Aholiab, son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan, an engraver, and a cunning workman, and an embroiderer in blue, and in purple, and in scarlet, and fine linen. 24. All the gold that was occupied for the work in all the work of the holy place, even the gold of the offering, was twenty and nine talents, and seven hundred and thirty shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary. 25. And the silver of them that were numbered of the congregation was an hundred talents, and a thousand seven hundred and threescore and fifteen shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary: 26. A bekah for every man, that is, half a shekel, after the shekel of the sanctuary, for every one that went to be numbered, from twenty years old and upward, for six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty men. 27. And of the hundred talents of silver were cast the sockets of the sanctuary, and the sockets of the vail; an hundred sockets of the hundred talents, a talent for a socket. 28. And of the thousand seven hundred seventy and five shekels he made hooks for the pillars, and overlaid their chapiters, and filleted them. 29. And the brass of the offering was seventy talents, and two thousand and four hundred shekels. 30. And therewith he made the sockets to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the brazen altar, and the brazen grate for it, and all the vessels of the altar, 31. And the sockets of the court round about, and the sockets of the court-gate, and all the pins of the tabernacle, and all the pins of the court round about.

Here we have a breviat of the account, which, by Moses's appointment, the Levites took and kept of the gold, silver, and brass, that was brought in for the tabernacle's use, and how it was employed. Ithamar the son of Aaron was appointed to draw up this account, who was thus by lesser services trained up and fitted for greater v. 21. Bezaleel and Aholiab must bring in the account, (v. 22, 23.) and Ithamar must audit it, and give it in to Moses. And it was thus:

1. All the gold was a free-will offering; every man brought as he could and would, and it amounted to twenty-nine talents, and seven hundred and thirty shekels over, which some compute to be about one hundred and fifty thousand pounds worth of gold, according to the present value of it. Of this were made all the golden furniture and vessels.

2. The silver was levied by way of tax; every man was assessed half a shekel, a kind of poll-money, which amounted in the whole to a hundred talents, and one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five shekels over, v. 25, 26. Of this they made the sockets, into which the boards of the tabernacle were let, and on which they rested; so that they were as the foundation of the tabernacle, v. 27. The silver amounted to about thirty-four thousand pounds of our money. The raising of the gold by voluntary contribution, and of the silver by way of tribute, shews that either way may be taken for the defraying of public expences; provided that nothing be done with partiality.

3. The brass, though less valuable, was of use not only for the brazen altar, but for the sockets of the court, which, probably, in other tents were of wood; but it is promised, (Isa. 60. 17.) For wood I will bring brass. See how liberal the people were, and how faithful the workmen were; their good examples ought to be followed.

CHAP. XXXIX.

This chapter gives us an account of the finishing of the work of the tabernacle. I. The last things prepared were the holy garments. The ephod and its curious girdle, v. 1..5. The onyx-stones for the shoulders, v. 6, 7. The breast-plate with the precious stones in it, v. 8..21. The robe of the ephod, v. 22..26. The coats, bonnets, and breeches, for the inferior priests, v. 27..29. And the plate of the holy crown, v. 30, 31. II. A summary account of the whole work, as it was presented to Moses, when it was all finished, v. 32..43.

1. AND of the blue, and purple, and scarlet, they made cloths of service, to do service in the holy place, and made the holy garments for Aaron; as the LORD commanded Moses. 2. And he made the ephod of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen. 3. And they did beat the gold into thin plates, and cut it into wires, to work it in the blue, and in the purple, and in the scarlet, and in the fine linen, with cunning work. 4. They made shoulder-pieces for it, to couple it together: by the two edges was it coupled together. 5. And the curious girdle of his ephod, that was upon it, was of the same, according to the work thereof; of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen; as the LORD commanded Moses. 6. And they wrought onyx-stones enclosed in ouches of gold, graven, as signets are graven, with the names of the children of Israel. 7. And he put them on the shoulders of the ephod, that they should be stones for a memorial to the children of Israel; as the LORD commanded Moses. 8. And he made the breast-plate of cunning work, like the work of the ephod; of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen. 9. It was four-square; they made the breast-plate double: a span was the length thereof, and a span the breadth thereof, being doubled. 10. And they set in it four rows of stones: the first row was a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle: this was the first row. 11. And the second row, an emerald, a sapphire, and a diamond. 12. And the third row, a ligure, an agate, and an amethyst. 13. And the fourth row, a beryl, an onyx, and a jasper: they were enclosed in ouches of gold in their enclosings. 14. And the stones were according to the names of the children of Israel, twelve, according to their names, like the engravings of a signet, every one with his name, according to the twelve tribes. 15. And they made upon the breast-plate chains at the ends, of wreathen work of pure gold. 16. And they made two ouches of gold, and two gold rings, and put the two rings in the two ends of the breast-plate. 17. And they put the two wreathen chains of gold in the two rings on the ends of the breast-plate. 18. And the two ends of the two wreathen chains they fastened in the two ouches, and put them on the shoulder-pieces of the ephod, before it. 19. And they made two rings of gold, and put them on the two ends of the breast-plate, upon the border of it, which was on the side of the ephod inward. 20. And they made two other golden rings, and put them on the two sides of the ephod underneath, toward the fore-part of it, over-against the other coupling thereof, above the curious girdle of the ephod. 21. And they did bind the breast-plate by his rings unto the rings of the ephod with a lace of blue, that it might be above the curious girdle of the ephod, and that the breast-plate might not be loosed from the ephod; as the LORD commanded Moses. 22. And he made the robe of the ephod of woven work, all of blue. 23. And there was an hole in the midst of the robe, as the hole of an habergeon, with a band round about the hole, that it should not rend. 24. And they made upon the hems of the robe pomegranates of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and twined linen. 25. And they made bells of pure gold, and put the bells between the pomegranates upon the hem of the robe, round about between the pomegranates; 26. A bell and a pomegranate, a bell and a pomegranate, round about the hem of the robe to minister in; as the LORD commanded Moses. 27. And they made coats of fine linen of woven work for Aaron and for his sons. 28. And a mitre of fine linen, and goodly bonnets of fine linen, and linen breeches of fine twined linen, 29. And a girdle of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet, of needle-work; as the LORD commanded Moses. 30. And they made the plate of the holy crown of pure gold, and wrote upon it a writing like to the engravings of a signet, HOLINESS TO THE LORD. 31. And they tied unto it a lace of blue, to fasten it on high upon the mitre; as the LORD commanded Moses.

In this account of the making of the priests' garments, according to the instructions given, (ch. 28.) we may observe, 1. That the priests' garments are called here cloths of service, v. 1. Note, Those that wear robes of honour must look upon them as cloths of service; for those upon whom honour is put, from them service is expected. It is said of those that are arrayed in white robes, that they are before the throne of God, and serve him day and night in his temple, Rev. 7. 13, 15. Holy garments were not made for men to sleep in, or to strut in, but to do service in; and then they are indeed for glory and beauty. The Son of Man himself came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. 2. That all the six paragraphs here, which give a distinct account of the making of these holy garments, conclude with those words, as the Lord commanded Moses, v. 5, 7, 21, 26, 29, 31. The like is not in any of the foregoing accounts, as if in these, more than any other of the appurtenances of the tabernacle, they had a particular regard to the divine appointment, both for warrant and for direction. It is an intimation to all the Lord's ministers, to make the word of God their rule in all their ministrations, and to act in observance of, and obedience to, the command of God. 3. That these garments, in conformity to the rest of the furniture of the tabernacle, were very rich and splendid; the church in its infancy was thus taught, thus pleased, with the rudiments of this world; but now under the gospel, which is the ministration of the spirit, to affect and impose such pompous habits as the church of Rome does, under pretence of decency and instruction, is to betray the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, and to entangle the church again in the bondage of those carnal ordinances, which were imposed only till the time of reformation. 4. That they were all shadows of good things to come, but the substance is Christ, and the grace of the gospel; when therefore the substance is come, it is a jest to be fond of the shadow. (1.) Christ is our great high priest; when he undertook the work of our redemption, he put on the cloths of service—he arrayed himself with the gifts and graces of the Spirit, which he received not by measure—girded himself with the curious girdle of resolution, to go through with his undertaking—charged himself with all God's spiritual Israel, bare them on his shoulders, carried them in his bosom, laid them near his heart, engraved them on the palms of his hands, and presented them in the breast-plate of judgment unto his Father. And (lastly) he crowned himself with holiness to the Lord, consecrating his whole undertaking to the honour of his Father's holiness; now consider how great this man is. (2.) True believers are spiritual priests. The clean linen with which all their cloths of service must be made, is the righteousness of saints; (Rev. 19. 8.) and Holiness to the Lord must be so written upon their foreheads, that all who converse with them may see, and say, that they bear the image of God's holiness, and are devoted to the praise of it.

32. Thus was all the work of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation finished; and the children of Israel did according to all that the LORD commanded Moses, so did they. 33. And they brought the tabernacle unto Moses, the tent and all his furniture, his taches, his boards, his bars, and his pillars, and his sockets, 34. And the covering of rams' skins dyed red, and the covering of badgers' skins, and the vail of the covering, 35. The ark of the testimony, and the staves thereof, and the mercy-seat, 36. The table, and all the vessels thereof, and the shew-bread, 37. The pure candlestick, with the lamps thereof, even with the lamps to be set in order, and all the vessels thereof and the oil for light. 38. And the golden altar, and the anointing oil, and the sweet incense, and the hanging for the tabernacle-door, 39. The brazen altar, and his grate of brass, his staves, and all his vessels, the laver and his foot, 40. The hangings of the court, his pillars, and his sockets, and the hanging for the court-gate, his cords, and his pins, and all the vessels of the service of the tabernacle, for the tent of the congregation. 41. The cloths of service to do service in the holy place, and the holy garments for Aaron the priest, and his sons' garments, to minister in the priest's office. 42. According to all that the LORD commanded Moses, so the children of Israel made all the work. 43. And Moses did look upon all the work, and, behold, they had done it as the LORD had commanded, even so had they done it; and Moses blessed them.

Observe here,

1. That the builders of the tabernacle made very good dispatch.

It was not much more than five months from the beginning to the finishing of it. Though there was a great deal of fine work about it, such as is usually the work of time, embroidering and engraving, not only in gold, but in precious stones, yet they went through with it in a little time. Church-work is usually slow work, but they made quick work of this, and yet did it with the greatest exactness imaginable. For, 1. Many hands were employed, all unanimous, and not striving with each other. This expedited the business, and made it easy. 2. The workmen were taught of God, and so were kept from making blunders, which would have retarded them. 3. The people were hearty and zealous in the work, and impatient till it was finished. God had prepared their hearts, and then the thing was done suddenly, 2 Chron. 29. 36. Resolution and industry, and a cheerful application of mind, will, by the grace of God, bring a great deal of good work to pass in a little time; less than one would expect.

II. That they punctually observed their orders, and did not in the least vary from them. They did it according to all that the Lord commanded Moses, v. 32, 42. Note, God's work must be done, in every thing, according to his own will. His institutions neither need nor admit men's inventions to make them either more beautiful, or more likely to answer the intention of them. Add thou not unto his words; God is pleased with wihing worship, but not with will-worship.

III. That they brought all their work to Moses, and submitted it to his inspection and censure, v. 38. He knew what he had ordered them to make; and now, the particulars, were called over, and all produced, that Moses might see both that they had made all, omitting nothing, that they had made all according to the instructions given them, and that, if they had made a mistake in anything, it might be forthwith rectified. Thus they shewed respect to Moses, who was set over them in the Lord; not objecting that Moses did not understand such work, and therefore that there was no reason for submitting it to his judgment; No, that God, who gave them so much knowledge as to do the work, gave them also so much humility as to be willing to have it examined, and compared with the model. Moses was in authority, and they would pay a deference to his place; The spirit of the prophets is subject to the prophets. And besides, though they knew how to do the work better than Moses, Moses had a better and more exact idea of the model than they had, and therefore they could not be well-pleased with their own work, unless they had his approbation. Thus, in all the services of religion, we should labour to be accepted of the Lord.

IV. That Moses, upon search, found all done according to the rule, v. 43. Moses, both for their satisfaction and for his own, did look upon all the work, piece by piece, and, behold, they had done it according to the pattern shewed him, for the same Being that shewed him the pattern guided their hand in the work. All the copies of God's grace exactly agree with the original of his counsels: what God works in us, and by us, is the fulfilling of the good pleasure of his own goodness, and when the mystery of God shall be finished, and all his performances come to be compared with his purposes, it will appear, that, behold, all is done according to the counsel of his own will, not one iota or tittle of which shall fall to the ground, or be varied from.

V. That Moses blessed them. 1. He commended them, and signified his approbation of all they had done. He did not find fault where there was none, as some do, who think they disparage their own judgment, if they do not find something amiss in the best and most accomplished performance. In all this work it is probable there might have been found here and there a stitch amiss, and a stroke awry, which would have served for an over-curious and censorious critic to animadvert upon; but Moses was too candid to notice small faults, where there were no great ones. Note, All governors must be a praise to them that do well, as well as a terror to evil-doers. Why should any take a pride in being heard to be pleased? 2. He not only praised them, but prayed for them. He blessed them as one having authority, for the less is blessed of the better. We read not of any wages that Moses paid them for their work, but this blessing he gave them. For though, ordinarily, the labourer be worthy of his hire, yet, in this case, 1. They wrought for themselves. The honour and comfort of God's tabernacle among them would be recompence enough, If thou be wise, thou shalt be wise for thyself. 2. They had their meat from heaven on free cost, for themselves and their families, and their raiment waxed not old upon them, so that they neither needed wages, nor had reason to expect any. Freely ye have received, freely give. The obligations we lie under, both in duty and interest, to serve God, are sufficient to quicken us to our work, though we had not a reward in prospect. But, 3. This blessing, in the name of the Lord, was wages enough for all their work. Those whom God employs, he will bless, and those whom he blesses, they are blessed indeed. The blessing he commands is life for evermore.

CHAP. XL.

In this chapter, I. Orders are given for the setting-up of the tabernacle, and the fixing of all the appurtenances of it in their proper places, (v. 1. .8.) and the consecrating of it, (v. 9. .11.) and of the priests, v. 12. .15. II. Care is taken to do all this, and as it was appointed to be done, v. 16. .33. III. God takes possession of it by the cloud, v. 34. .38.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying. 2. On the first day of the first month shalt thou set up the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation. 3. And thou shalt put therein the ark of the testimony, and cover the ark with the vail. 4. And thou shalt bring in the table, and set in order the things that are to be set in order upon it; and thou shalt bring in the candlestick, and light the lamps thereof. 5. And thou shalt set the altar of God for the incense before the ark of the testimony, and put the hanging of the door to the tabernacle. 6. And thou shalt set the altar of the burnt-offering before the door of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation. 7. And thou shalt set the laver between the tent of the congregation and the altar, and shalt put water therein. 8. And thou shalt set up the court round about, and hang up the hanging at the court-gate. 9. And thou shalt take the anointing oil, and anoint the tabernacle, and all that is therein, and shalt hallow it, and all the vessels thereof: and it shall be holy. 10. And thou shalt anoint the altar of the burnt-offering, and all his vessels, and sanctify the altar: and it shall be an altar most holy. 11. And thou shalt anoint the laver and his foot, and sanctify it. 12. And thou shalt bring Aaron and his sons unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and wash them with water. 13. And thou shalt put upon Aaron the holy garments, and anoint him, and sanctify him; that he may minister unto me in the priest's office. 14. And thou shalt bring his sons, and clothe them with coats: 15. And thou shalt anoint them, as thou didst anoint their father, that they may minister unto me in the priest's office: for their anointing shall surely be an everlasting priesthood throughout their generations.

The materials and furniture of the tabernacle had been viewed severally, and approved, and now they must be put together.

1. God here directs Moses to set up the tabernacle, and the utensils of it in their places. Though the work of the tabernacle was finished, and every thing ready for rearing, and the people, no doubt, very desirous to see it up, yet Moses will not do it till he has express orders for the doing of it. It is good to see God going before us in every step, Ps. 37. 23. The time for doing this is fixed to the first day of the first month, (v. 2.) which wanted but fourteen days of a year since they came out of Egypt; and a good year's work there was done in it. Probably the work was made ready but just at the end of the year, so that the appointing of this day gave no delay, or next to none, to this good work. We must not put off any necessary duty, under pretence of waiting for some remarkable day, the present season is the most convenient; but the tabernacle happening to be set up on the first day of the first month, intimates that it is good to begin the year with some good work. Let him that is the First have the first; and let the things of his kingdom be first sought. In Hezekiah's time we find they began to sanctify the temple on the first day of the first month, 2 Chron. 29. 17. The new moon (which, by their computation, was the first day of every month) was observed by them with some solemnity; and therefore this first new moon of the year was thus made remarkable. Note, When a new year begins, we should think of serving God more and better than we did the year before.

Moses is particularly ordered to set up the tabernacle itself first, in which God would dwell, and would be served, v. 2. Then to put the ark in its place, and draw the vail before it, v. 3. Then to fix the table, and the candlestick, and the altar of incense, without the vail, (v. 4, 5.) and to fix the hanging of the door before the door. Then in the court he must place the altar of burnt-offering, and the laver, v. 6, 7. And, lastly, He must set up the curtains of the court, and a hanging from the court-gate. And all this would be easily done in one day, many hands, no doubt, being employed in it, under the direction of Moses.

2. He directs Moses, when he had set up the tabernacle and all the furniture of it, to consecrate it and them, by anointing them with the oil which was prepared for the purpose, ch. 30. 26, &c. It was there ordered that this should be done, here it was ordered that it should be done now, (v. 9. .11.) Observe, Every thing was sanctified when it was put in its proper place, and not till then, for till then it was not fit for the use to which it was to be sanctified. As every thing is beautiful in its season, so is every thing in its place.

3. He directs him to consecrate Aaron and his sons; when the goods were brought into God's house, they were marked first, and then servants were hired to bear the vessels of the Lord; and they must be clean who were put into that office, v. 12. .15. The law, which was now ordered to be put in execution, we had before, ch. 29. Thus, in the visible church, which is God's tabernacle among men, it is requisite that there be ministers to keep the charge of the sanctuary, and that they receive the anointing.

16. Thus did Moses: according to all that the LORD commanded him, so did he. 17. And it came to pass in the first month in the second year, on the first day of the month, that the tabernacle was reared up. 18. And Moses reared up the tabernacle, and fastened his sockets, and set up the boards thereof, and put in the bars thereof, and reared up his pillars. 19. And he spread abroad the tent over the tabernacle, and put the covering of the tent above upon it; as the LORD commanded Moses. 20. And he took and put the testimony into the ark, and set the staves on the ark, and put the mercy-seat above upon the ark: 21. And he brought the ark into the tabernacle, and set up the vail of the covering, and covered the ark of the testimony; as the LORD commanded Moses. 22. And he put the table in the tent of the congregation, upon the side of the tabernacle northward, without the vail. 23. And he set the bread in order upon it before the LORD; as the LORD had commanded Moses. 24. And he put the candlestick in the tent of the congregation, over-against the table, on the side of the tabernacle southward. 25. And he lighted the lamps before the LORD; as the LORD commanded Moses. 26. And he put the golden altar in the tent of the congregation before the vail: 27. And he burnt sweet incense thereon; as the LORD commanded Moses. 28. And he set up the hanging at the door of the tabernacle. 29. And he put the altar of burnt-offering by the door of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation, and offered upon it the burnt-offering and the meat-offering; as the LORD commanded Moses. 30. And he set the laver between the tent of the congregation and the altar, and put water there, to wash withal. 31. And Moses and Aaron and his sons washed their hands and their feet thereat: 32. When they went into the tent of the congregation, and when they came near unto the altar, they washed; as the LORD commanded Moses. 33. And he reared up the court round about the tabernacle and the altar, and set up the hanging of the court-gate. So Moses finished the work.

When the tabernacle and the furniture of it were prepared, they did not put off the rearing of it till they came to Canaan, though they now hoped to be there very shortly; but, in obedience to the will of God, they set it up in the midst of their camp, while they were in the wilderness. Those that are unsettled in the world must not think that that will excuse them in their continued irreligion; as if it were enough to begin to serve God when they begin to be settled in the world: No; a tabernacle for God is a very needful and profitable companion even in a wilderness, especially considering that our carcases may fall in that wilderness, and we may be fixed in another world before we come to fix in this.

The rearing of the tabernacle was a good day's work; the consecrating of it, and of the priests, was attended to some days after. Here we have an account only of that new-year's day's work. 1. Moses not only did all that God directed him to do, but in the order that God appointed; for God will be sought in the due order. 2. To each particular there is added an express reference to the divine appointment, which Moses governed himself by as carefully and conscientiously as the workmen did; and therefore, as before, so here it is repeated, as the Lord commanded Moses, seven times in less than fourteen verses. Moses himself, as great a man as he was, would not pretend to vary from the institution, neither to add to it, nor diminish from it, in the least punctilio. They that command others must remember that their Master also is in heaven, and they must do as they are commanded. 3. That which was to be veiled, he veiled, (v. 21.) and that which was to be used, he used immediately, for the instruction of the priests, that, by seeing him do the several offices, they might learn to do them the more dexterously. Though Moses was not properly a priest, yet he is numbered among the priests, (1's. 99. 6.) and the Jewish writers call him the priest of the priests; what he did he did by special warrant and direction from God, rather as a prophet, or lawgiver, than as a priest. He set the wheels a-going, and then left the work in the hands of the appointed ministry. (1.) When he had placed the table, he set the shew-bread in order upon it: (v. 23.) for God will never have his table unfurnished. (2.) As soon as he had fixed the candlestick, he lighted the lamps before the Lord, v. 25. Even that dark dispensation would not admit of unlighted candles. (3.) The golden altar being put in its place, immediately he burnt sweet incense thereon; (v. 27.) for God's altar must be a smoking altar. (4.) The altar of burnt-offering was no sooner set up in the court of the tabernacle, than he had a burnt-offering, and a meat-offering, ready to offer upon it, v. 29. Some think, though this is mentioned here, it was not done till some time after; but it seems to me that he immediately began the ceremony of its consecration, though it was not completed for seven days. (5.) At the laver likewise, when he had fixed that, Moses himself washed his hands and feet. Thus, in all these instances, he not only shewed the priests how to do their duty, but has taught us that God's gifts are intended for use, and not barely for show. Though the altars, and table, and candlestick, were fresh and new, he did not say it was a pity to sully them; no, he hand-selled them immediately. Talents were given to be occupied, not to be buried.

34. Then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the LORD filled the tabernacle. 35. And Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation, because the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the LORD filled the tabernacle. 36. And when the cloud was taken up from over the tabernacle, the children of Israel went onward in all their journies: 37. But if the cloud were not taken up, then they journeyed not till the day that it was taken up. 38. For the cloud of the LORD was upon the tabernacle by day, and fire was on it by night, in the sight of all the house of Israel throughout all their journies.

As when, in the creation, God had finished this earth, which he designed for man's habitation, he made man, and put him in possession of it; so, when Moses had finished the tabernacle, which was designed for God's dwelling-place among men, God came and took possession of it. The Shechinah, the divine eternal Word, though not yet made flesh, yet, as a prelude to that event, came and dwelt among them, John, 1. 14. This was henceforward the place of his throne, and the place of the soles of his feet; (Ezek. 43. 7.) here he resided, here he ruled. By the visible tokens of God's coming among them to take possession of the tabernacle, he testified both the return of his favour to them, which they had forfeited by the golden calf, (ch. 33. 7.) and his gracious acceptance of all the expence they had been at, and all the care and pains they had taken about the tabernacle. Thus God owned them, shewed himself well-pleased with what they had done, and abundantly rewarded them. Note, God will dwell with those that prepare him a habitation. The broken and contrite heart, the clean and holy heart, that is furnished for his service, and devoted to his honour, shall be his rest for ever, here will Christ dwell by faith, Eph. 3. 17. Where God has a throne and an altar in the soul, there is a living temple. And God will be sure to own and crown the operations of his own grace, and the observance of his own appointments.

As God had manifested himself upon mount Sinai, so he did now in this newly-erected tabernacle. We read (ch. 24. 16) that the glory of the Lord abode upon mount Sinai, which is said to be like devouring fire, (v. 17.) and that the cloud covered that glory.

Accordingly, when God descended to take possession of his house, the cloud covered it on the outside, and the glory of the Lord filled it within; to which probably there is an allusion, Zech. 2. 5. where God promises to be a wall of fire round about Jerusalem, (and the pillar of cloud was by night a pillar of fire,) and the glory in the midst of her.

1. The cloud covered the tent; that same cloud, which, as the chariot or pavilion of the Shechinah, had come up before them out of Egypt, and led them hither, now settled upon the tabernacle, and hovered over it, even in the hottest and clearest day; for it was none of those clouds which the sun scatters. This cloud was intended to be, 1. A token of God's presence, constantly visible day and night (v. 38.) to all Israel, even to those that lay in the remotest corners of the camp, that they might never again make a question of it, Is the Lord among us, or is he not? That very cloud, which had already been so pregnant with wonders in the Red sea, and on mount Sinai, sufficient to prove God in it of a truth, was continually in sight of all the house of Israel, throughout all their journies; so that they were inexcusable if they believed not their own eyes. 2. A concealment of the tabernacle, and the glory of God in it. God did indeed dwell among them, but he dwelt in a cloud; Verily, thou art a God that hidest thyself. Blessed be God for the gospel of Christ, in which we all with open face behold, as in a glass, not in a cloud, the glory of the Lord. 3. A protection of the tabernacle. They had sheltered it with one covering upon another, but, after all, the cloud that covered it was its best guard. Those that dwell in the house of the Lord are hidden there, and are safe under the divine protection, Ps. 27. 4, 5. Yet this, which was then a peculiar favour to the tabernacle, is promised to every dwelling-place of mount Zion; (Isa. 4. 5.) for upon all the glory shall be a defence. 4. A guide to the camp of Israel in their march through the wilderness, v. 36, 37. While the cloud continued on the tabernacle, they rested; when it removed, they removed and followed it, as being purely under a divine conduct. This is spoken of more fully, Numb. 9. 15, &c. and mentioned with thankfulness, to the glory of God, long afterward, Neh. 9. 19. Ps. 78. 14.—105. 39. As, before the tabernacle was set up, the Israelites had the cloud for their guide, which appeared sometimes in one place and sometimes in another, but from henceforward rested on the tabernacle, and was to be found there only; so the church had divine revelation for its guide from the first, before the scriptures were written; but since the making up of that canon, it rests in that as its tabernacle, and there only it is to be found; as, in the creation, the light which was made the first day centred in the sun the fourth day. Blessed be God for the law and the testimony!

II. The glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle, v. 34, 35. The Shechinah now made an awful and pompous entry into the tabernacle, through the outer part of which it passed into the most holy place, as the presence-chamber, and there seated itself between the cherubims. It was in light and fire, and (for aught we know) no otherwise, that the Shechinah made itself visible; for God is Light: our God is a consuming Fire; with these the tabernacle was now filled, yet, as before, the bush was not consumed, so, now, the curtains were not so much as singed by this fire; for to those that have received the anointing, the terrible majesty of God is not destroying. Yet so dazzling was the light, and so dreadful was the fire, that Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation, at the door of which he attended, till the splendour was a little abated, and the glory of the Lord retired within the vail, v. 35. This shews how terrible the glory and majesty of God are, and how unable the greatest and best of men are to stand before him. The divine light and fire, let forth in their full strength, will overpower the strongest heads and the purest hearts. But what Moses could not do, in that he was weak through the flesh, our Lord Jesus has done, whom God caused to draw near and approach, and who, as the Forerunner, is for us entered, and has invited us to come boldly even to the mercy-seat. He was able to enter into the holy place not made with hands, (Heb. 9. 24.) nay, he is himself the true Tabernacle, filled with the glory of God, (John, 1. 14.) even with the divine grace and truth prefigured by this fire and light. In him the Shechinah took up its rest for ever, for in him dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. Blessed be God for Jesus Christ.

Practical Observations.

OF THE THIRD BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED,

LEVITICUS.

There is nothing historical in all this book of Leviticus, except the account which it gives us, ch. 8, 9. of the consecration of the priesthood; ch. 10. of the punishment of Nadab and Abihu, by the hand of God, for offering strange fire; and ch. 24. of Shelomith's son, by the hand of the magistrate, for blasphemy. All the rest of the book is taken up with the laws, chiefly the ecclesiastical laws, which God gave to Israel by Moses, concerning their sacrifices and offerings, their meats and drinks, and divers washings, and the other peculiarities, by which God set that people apart for himself, and distinguished them from other nations; all which were shadows of good things to come, which are realized and superseded by the gospel of Christ.—We call the book Leviticus, from the Septuagint, because it contains the laws and ordinances of the Levitical priesthood, (as it is called, Heb. 7. 11.) and the ministrations of it. The Levites were principally charged with these institutions, both to do their part, and to teach the people theirs.—We read, in the close of the foregoing book, of the setting up of the tabernacle, which was to be the place of worship; and as that was framed according to the pattern, so must the ordinances of worship be, which were there to be administered. In these the divine appointment was as particular as in the former, and must be as punctually observed. The remaining record of the abrogated law is of use to us, for the strengthening of our faith in Jesus Christ, as the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world; and for the increase of our thankfulness to God, that by him we are freed from the yoke of the ceremonial law, and live in the times of reformation.

Laws concerning Sacrifices.

CHAP. I

This book begins with the laws concerning sacrifices, of which the most ancient were the burnt-offerings, about which God gives Moses instructions in this chapter. Orders are here given how that sort of sacrifice must be managed. 1. If it were a bullock out of the herd, v. 3. .9. 11. If it were a sheep or goat, a lamb or kid, out of the flock, v. 14. .17. And, whether the offering were more or less valuable in itself, if it was offered with an upright heart, according to these laws, it was accepted of God.

1. AND the LORD called unto Moses, and spake unto him out of the tabernacle of the congregation, saying, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, If any man of you bring an offering unto the LORD, ye shall bring your offering of the cattle, even of the herd, and of the flock.

Observe here, 1. It is taken for granted that people would be inclined to bring offerings to the Lord. The very light of nature directs man, some way or other, to do honour to his Maker, and pay him homage as his Lord. Revealed religion supposes natural religion to be an ancient and early institution, since the fall had directed man to glorify God by sacrifice, which was an implicit acknowledgment of their having received all from God as creatures, their having forfeited all to him as sinners. A conscience thoroughly convinced of dependence and guilt, would be willing to come before God with thousands of rams, Mic. 6. 6. 2. Provision is made that men should not indulge their own fancies, nor become vain in their imaginations and inventions about their sacrifices, lest, while they pretended to honour God, they should really dishonour him, and do that which was unworthy of him. Every thing therefore is directed to be done with a due decorum, by a certain rule, and so as that the sacrifices might be most significant, both of the great sacrifice of atonement which Christ was to offer in the fulness of time, and of the spiritual sacrifices of acknowledgment which believers should offer daily. 3. God gave those laws to Israel by Moses; nothing is more frequently repeated than this, The Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel. God could have spoken it to the children of Israel himself, as he did the ten commandments; but he chose to deliver it to them by Moses, because they had desired he would no more speak to them himself, and he had designed that Moses should, above all the prophets, be a type of Christ, by whom God would in these last days speak to us, Heb. 1. 1. By other prophets God sent messages to his people, but by Moses he gave them laws; and therefore he was fit to typify him to whom the Father has given all judgment. And besides, the treasure of divine revelation was always to be put into earthen vessels, that our faith might be tried, and that the excellency of the power might be of God. 4. God spake to him out of the tabernacle. As soon as ever the Shechinah had taken possession of its new habitation, in token of the acceptance of what was done, God talked with Moses from the mercy-seat, while he attended without the veil, or rather at the door, hearing a voice only; and it is probable that he wrote what he heard at that time, to prevent any mistake, or slip of memory, in the rehearsal of it. The tabernacle was set up to be a place of communion between God and Israel; there, where they performed their services to God, God revealed his will to them; thus, by the word and by prayer, we now have fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ, Acts, 6. 4. When we speak to God, we must desire to hear from him, and reckon it a great favour that he is pleased to speak to us. The Lord called to Moses, not to come near, (under that dispensation, even Moses must keep his distance,) but to attend and hearken to what should be said. A letter less than ordinary in the Hebrew word for called, the Jewish critics tell us, intimates that God spake in a still small voice. The moral law was given with terror from a burning mountain, in thunder and lightning; but the remedial law of sacrifice was given more gently from a mercy-seat, because that was typical of the grace of the gospel, which is the ministration of life and peace.

3. If his offering be a burnt-sacrifice of the herd, let him offer a male without blemish: he shall offer it of his own voluntary will at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the LORD.

4. And he shall put his hand upon the head of the burnt-offering; and it shall be accepted for him to make atonement for him. 5. And he shall kill the bullock before the LORD: and the priests, Aaron's sons, shall bring the blood, and sprinkle the blood round about upon the altar that is by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 6. And he shall flay the burnt-offering, and cut it into his pieces. 7. And the sons of Aaron the priest shall put fire upon the altar, and lay the wood in order upon the fire: 8. And the priests, Aaron's sons, shall lay the parts, the head, and the fat, in order upon the wood that is on the fire which is upon the altar: 9. But his inwards and his legs shall he wash in water: and the priest shall burn all on the altar, to be a burnt-sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD.

If a man were rich, and could afford it, it is supposed that he would bring his burnt-sacrifice, with which he designed to honour God, out of his herd of larger cattle. He that considers that God is the Best that is, will resolve to give him the best he has; else he gives him not the glory due unto his name. Now, if a man determined to kill a bullock, not for an entertainment for his family and friends, but for a sacrifice to his God, these rules must be religiously observed.

1. The beast to be offered must be a male, and without blemish, and the best he had in his pasture; being designed purely for the honour of him that is infinitely perfect, it ought to be the most perfect in its kind. This signified the complete strength and purity that were in Christ, the dying Sacrifice, and the sincerity of heart and unblameableness of life that should be in Christians, who are presented to God as living sacrifices. But literally, in Christ Jesus there is neither male nor female; nor is any natural blemish in the body a bar to our acceptance with God, but only the moral defects and deformities introduced by sin into the soul.

2. The owner must offer it of his voluntary will. What is done in religion, so as to please God, must be done by no other constraint than that of love. God accepts the willing people, and the cheerful giver. Ainsworth and others read it, not as the principle, but as the end, of offering; "Let him offer it for his favourable acceptation before the Lord. Let him propose this to himself, as his end in bringing his sacrifice, and let his eye be fixed steadily upon that end—that he may be accepted of the Lord." Those only shall find acceptance who sincerely desire and design it in all their religious services, 2 Cor. 5. 9.

3. It must be offered at the door of the tabernacle, where the brazen altar of burnt-offerings stood, which sanctified the gift, and not elsewhere; he must offer it at the door, as one unworthy to enter, and acknowledging that there is no admission for a sinner into covenant and communion with God, but by sacrifice; but he must offer it at the tabernacle of the congregation, in token of his communion with the whole church of Israel, even in this personal service.

4. The offerer must put his hand upon the head of his offering, v. 4. "He must put both his hands," say the Jewish doctors, "with all his might between the horns of the beast," signifying thereby, (1.) The transfer of all his right to, and interest in, the beast, to God; actually, and by a manual delivery, resigning it to his service. (2.) An acknowledgment that he deserved to die, and would have been willing to die, if God had required it, for the serving of his honour, and the obtaining of his favour. (3.) A dependence upon the sacrifice, as an instituted type of the great Sacrifice, on which the iniquity of us all was to be laid. The mystical signification of the sacrifices, and especially this rite, some think the apostle means by the doctrine of laying on of hands, (Heb. 6. 2.) which typified evangelical faith. The offerer's putting his hand on the head of the offering was to signify his desire and hope that it might be accepted from him to make atonement for him. The burnt-offerings had not respect to any particular sin, as the sin-offering had, but were to make atonement for sin in general; and he that laid his hand on the head of a burnt-offering was to confess that he had left undone what he ought to have done, and had done that which he ought not to have done; and to pray, that, though he deserved to die himself, the death of his sacrifice might be accepted for the expiating of his guilt.

5. The sacrifice was to be killed by the priests or Levites, before the Lord, that is, in a devout, religious manner, and with an eye to God and his honour. This signified that our Lord Jesus was to make his soul, or life, an offering for sin. Messiah the Prince must be cut off as a sacrifice, but not for himself, Dan. 9. 26. It signified also, that in Christians, who are living sacrifices, the brutal part must be mortified or killed, the flesh crucified, with its corrupt affections and lusts, and all the appetites of the mere animal life.

6. The priests were to sprinkle the blood upon the altar; (v. 5.) for the blood being the life, that was it that made atonement for the soul. This signified the direct and actual regard which our Lord Jesus had to the satisfaction of his Father's justice, and the securing of his injured honour, in the shedding of his blood; he offered himself without spot to God. It also signified the pacifying and purifying of our consciences by the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ upon them by faith, 1 Pet. 1. 2. Heb. 10. 22.

7. The beast was to be flayed and decently cut up, and divided into its several joints or pieces, according to the art of the butcher; and then all the pieces, with the head and the fat, (the legs and inwards being first washed,) were to be burnt together upon the altar, v. 6. 9. "But to what purpose," would some say, "was this waste? Why should all this good meat, which might have been given to the poor, and have served their hungry families for food a great while, be burnt together to ashes?" So was the will of God; and it is not for us to object or find fault with it. When it was burnt, for the honour of God, in obedience to his command, and to signify spiritual blessings, it was really better bestowed, and better answered the end of its creation, than when it was used as food for man. We must never reckon that lost that is laid out for God. The burning of the sacrifice signified the sharp sufferings of Christ, and the devout affections with which, as a holy fire. Christians must offer up themselves, their whole spirit, soul and body, unto God.

Lastly, This is said to be an offering of a sweet savour, or savour of rest, unto the Lord. The burning of flesh is unsavoury in itself; but this, as an act of obedience to a divine command, and a type of Christ, was well-pleasing to God; he was reconciled to the offerer, and did himself take a complacency in that reconciliation. He rested, and was refreshed with these institutions of his grace, as, at first, with his works of creation, (Exod. 31.17.) rejoicing therein, Ps. 104. 41. Christ's offering of himself to God is said to be of a sweet smelling savour; (Eph. 5.2.) and the spiritual sacrifices of Christians are said to be acceptable to God, through Christ, 1 Pet. 2.5.

10. And if his offering be of the flocks, namely, of the sheep, or of the goats, for a burnt-sacrifice; he shall bring it a male without blemish. 11. And he shall kill it on the side of the altar northward before the LORD: and the priests, Aaron's sons, shall sprinkle his blood round about upon the altar. 12. And he shall cut it into his pieces, with his head and his fat: and the priest shall lay them in order on the wood that is on the fire which is upon the altar. 13. But he shall wash the inwards and the legs with water: and the priest shall bring it all, and burnt it upon the altar: it is a burnt-sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD. 14. And if the burnt-sacrifice for his offering to the LORD be of fowls, then he shall bring his offering of turtle-doves, or of young pigeons. 15. And the priest shall bring it unto the altar, and wring off his head, and burn it on the altar; and the blood thereof shall be wrung out at the side of the altar. 16. And he shall pluck away his crop with his feathers, and cast it beside the altar on the east part, by the place of the ashes. 17. And he shall cleave it with the wings thereof, but shall not divide it asunder: and the priest shall burn it upon the altar, upon the wood that is upon the fire: it is a burnt-sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD.

Here we have the laws concerning the burnt-offerings, which were of the flock, or of the fowls. Those of the middle-rank, that could not well afford to offer a bullock, would bring a sheep or a goat; and those that were not able to do that, should be accepted of God, if they brought a turtle-dove, or a pigeon. For God, in his law, and in his gospel, as well as in his providence, considers the poor. It is observable, that those creatures were chosen for sacrifice which were most mild and gentle, harmless and inoffensive; to typify the innocence and meekness that were in Christ, and to teach the innocence and meekness that should be in Christians. Directions are here given,

1. Concerning the burnt-offering of the flock, v.10. The method of managing these is much the same with that of the bullocks; only it is ordered here that the sacrifice should be killed on the side of the altar northward; which, though mentioned here only, probably was to be observed concerning the former and other sacrifices. Perhaps, on that side of the altar there was the largest vacant space, and room for the priests to turn them in. It was of old observed, that Fair weather comes out of the north, and that The north wind drives away rain; and by these sacrifices the storms of God's wrath are scattered, and the light of God's countenance is obtained, which is more pleasant than the brightest, fairest weather.

2. Concerning those of the fowls. They must be either turtle-doves, and if so, "They must be old turtles; (say the Jews;) or pigeons, and if so, they must be young pigeons. What was most acceptable at men's tables must be brought to God's altar. In the offering of these fowls, (1.) The head must be wrung off, "quite off," say some; others think, only pinched so as to kill the bird, and yet leave the head hanging to the body. But it seems more likely that it was to be quite separated, for it was to be burnt first. (2.) The blood was to be wrung out at the side of the altar. (3.) The garbages with the feathers were to be thrown by upon the dunghill. (4.) The body was to be opened, sprinkled with salt, and then burnt upon the altar. "This sacrifice of birds," the Jews say, "was one of the most difficult services the priests had to do;" to teach those that minister in holy things, to be as solicitous for the salvation of the souls of the poor as of the rich; for their services are as acceptable to God, if they come from an upright heart, as the services of the rich; for he expects according to what a man hath, and not according to what he hath not, 2 Cor. 8.12. The poor man's turtle-doves, or young pigeons, are here said to be an offering of a sweet savour, as much as that of an ox or bullock that hath horns and hoofs. Yet, after all, to love God with all our heart, and to love our neighbour as ourselves, is better than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices, Mark, 12.33.

CHAP. II.

In this chapter, we have the law concerning the meat-offerings. I. The matter of it; whether of raw flour with oil and incense, (v.1.) or baked in the oven, (v.4.) or upon a plate, (v.5,6.) or in a frying pan, v.7. II. The management of it; of the flour, (v.2,3.) of the cakes, v.8.10. III. Some particular rules concerning it, That leaven and honey must never be admitted, (v.11,12.) and salt never omitted in the meat-offering, v.13. IV. The law concerning the offering of first-fruits in the ear, v.14.16.

1. AND when any will offer a meat-offering unto the LORD, his offering shall be of fine flour: and he shall pour oil upon it, and put frankincense thereon. 2. And he shall bring it to Aaron's sons the priests: and he shall take thereout his handful of the flour thereof, and of the oil thereof, with all the frankincense thereof; and the priest shall burn the memorial of it upon the altar, to be an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD: 3. And the remnant of the meat-offering shall be Aaron's and his sons': it is a thing most holy of the offerings of the LORD made by fire. 4. And if thou bring an oblation of a meat-offering baked in the oven, it shall be unleavened cakes of fine flour mingled with oil, or unleavened wafers anointed with oil. 5. And if thy oblation be a meat-offering baked in a pan, it shall be of fine flour unleavened, mingled with oil. 6. Thou shalt part it in pieces, and pour oil thereon: it is a meat-offering. 7. And if thy oblation be a meat-offering baked in the frying-pan, it shall be made of fine flour with oil. 8. And thou shalt bring the meat-offering that is made of these things unto the LORD: and when it is presented unto the priest, he shall bring it unto the altar. 9. And the priest shall take from the meat-offering a memorial thereof, and shall burn it upon the altar: it is an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD. 10. And that which is left of the meat-offering shall be Aaron's and his sons': it is a thing most holy of the offerings of the LORD made by fire.

There were some meat-offerings that were only appendixes to the burnt-offerings; as that which was offered with the daily sacrifice, (Exod. 29.38, 39.) and with the peace-offerings; these had drink-offerings joined with them, (see Numb. 15.4, 7, 9, 10.) and in these the quantity was appointed. But the law of this chapter concerns those meat-offerings that were offered by themselves, whenever a man saw cause thus to express his devotion. The first offering we read of in scripture was of this kind; (Gen. 4.3.) Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering. This sort of offerings was appointed,

I. In condescension to the poor and their ability; that they who themselves lived only upon bread and cakes, might offer an acceptable offering to God out of that which was their own coarse and homely fare, and by making for God's altar, as the widow of Serepta for his prophet, a little cake first, might procure such a blessing upon the handful of meal in the barrel, and the oil in the cruse, as that it should not fail.

II. As a proper acknowledgment of the mercy of God to them in their food; this was like a quit-rent, by which they testified their dependence upon God, their thankfulness to him, and their expectations from him as their Owner and Benefactor, who giveth to all life, and breath, and food convenient. Thus must they honour their Lord with their substance, and, in token of their eating and drinking to his glory, must consecrate some of their meat and drink to his immediate service. They that vow, with a grateful charitable heart, deal out their bread to the hungry, and provide for the necessities of those that are destitute of daily food, and when they eat the fat, and drink the sweet themselves, send portions to them for whom nothing is prepared, they offer unto God an acceptable meat-offering. The prophet laments it as one of the direful effects of famine, that thereby the meat-offering and drink-offering were cut off from the house of the Lord; (Joel, 1.9.) and reckoned it the greatest blessing of plenty, that it would be the revival of them, Joel, 2. 14.

Now the laws of the meat-offering were these; 1. The ingredients must always be fine flower and oil, two staple commodities of the land of Canaan, Dent. 8. 8. Oil was to them then in their food, what butter is now to us. If it was undressed, the oil must be poured upon the flour; (v. 1.) if cooked, it must be mingled with the flour, v. 4, &c. 2. If it was flour unbaked, beside the oil, it must have frankincense put upon it, which was to be burnt with it, (v. 1, 2.) for the perfuming of the altar; in allusion to which, gospel ministers are said to be a sweet savour unto God, 2 Cor. 2. 15. 3. If it was prepared, they might do it various ways, either bake it or fry it, or mix the flour and oil upon a plate; for the doing of each of which, conveniences were provided about the tabernacle. The law was very exact even about those offerings that were least costly; to intimate the cognizance God takes of the religious services performed with a devout mind, even by the poor of his people. 4. It was to be presented by the offerer to the priest, which is called bringing it to the Lord, (v. 8.) for the priests were God's receivers, and were ordained to offer gifts. 5. Part of it was to be burnt upon the altar, for a memorial, that is, in token of their mindfulness of God's bounty to them, in giving them all things richly to enjoy. It was an offering made by fire, v. 2, 9. The consuming of it by fire might remind them that they deserved to have all the fruits of the earth thus burnt up, and that it was of the Lord's mercies that they were not. They might also learn, that as meats are for the belly, and the belly for meats, so God shall destroy both it and them, (1 Cor. 6. 13.) and that man lives not by bread alone. This offering made by fire is here said to be of a sweet savour unto the Lord; and so are our spiritual offerings, which are made by the fire of holy love, particularly that of almsgiving, which is said to be an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God, (Phil. 4. 18.) and (Heb. 13. 16.) With such sacrifices God is well-pleased. 6. The remainder of the meat-offering was to be given to the priests, v. 3, 10. It is a thing most holy, not to be eaten by the offerers, as the peace-offerings, (which, though holy, were not most holy;) but by the priests only and their families. Thus God provided that they who served at the altar, should live upon the altar, and live comfortably.

11. No meat-offering, which ye shall bring unto the LORD, shall be made with leaven: for ye shall burn no leaven, nor any honey, in any offering of the LORD made by fire. 12. As for the oblation of the first-fruits, ye shall offer them unto the LORD: but they shall not be burnt on the altar for a sweet savour. 13. And every oblation of thy meat-offering shalt thou season with salt; neither shalt thou suffer the salt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking from thy meat-offering: with all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt. 14. And if thou offer a meat-offering of thy first-fruits unto the LORD, thou shalt offer for the meat-offering of thy first-fruits green ears of corn dried by the fire, even corn beaten out of full ears. 15. And thou shalt put oil upon it, and lay frankincense thereon: it is a meat-offering. 16. And the priest shall burn the memorial of it, part of the beaten corn thereof, and part of the oil thereof, with all the frankincense thereof: it is an offering made by fire unto the LORD.

Here,

I. Leaven and honey are forbidden to be put in any of their meat-offerings, (v. 12.) No leaven, nor any honey, in any offering made by fire. 1. The leaven was forbidden in remembrance of the unleavened bread they ate, when they came out of Egypt. So much dispatch was required in the offerings they made, that it was not convenient they should stay for the leavening of them. The New Testament comparing pride and hypocrisy to leaven, because they swell like leaven, comparing also malice and wickedness to leaven, because they sour like leaven; we are to understand and improve this as a caution to take heed of those sins which will certainly spoil the acceptableness of our spiritual sacrifices. Pure hands must be lifted up without wrath; and all our gospel-feasts kept with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth. 2. Honey was forbidden, though Canaan flowed with it, because to eat much honey is not good, (Prov. 25. 16, 27.) it turns to choler and bitterness in the stomach, though luscious to the taste. Some think the chief reason why these two things, leaven and honey, were forbidden, was, because the Gentiles used them very much in their sacrifices; and God's people must not learn or use the way of the heathen, but his services must be the reverse of their idolatrous services; see Dent. 12. 30, 31. Some make this application of this double prohibition; Leaven signifies grief and sadness of spirit, (Ps. 73. 21.) My heart was leavened: Honey signifies sensual pleasure and mirth. In our service of God both these must be avoided, and a mean observed between those extremes; for the sorrow of the world worketh death, and a love to the delights of sense is a great enemy to holy love.

II. Salt is required in all their offerings, v. 13. The altar was the table of the Lord; and therefore, salt being always set on our tables, God would have it always used at his. It is called the salt of the covenant, because, as men confirmed their covenants with each other, by eating and drinking together, at all which collations salt was used; so God, by accepting his people's gifts, and feasting them upon his sacrifices, supping with them, and they with him, (Rev. 3. 20.) did confirm his covenant with them. Among the ancients salt was a symbol of friendship. The salt for the sacrifice was not brought by the offerers, but was provided at the public charge, as the wood was, Ezra, 7. 22. And there was a chamber in the court of the temple called the chamber of salt, in which they laid it up. Can that which is unsavoury be eaten without salt? God would hereby intimate to them that their sacrifices in themselves were unsavoury. The saints, who are living sacrifices to God, must have salt in themselves, for every sacrifice must be salted with salt, (Mark, 9. 49, 50.) and our speech must be always with grace; (Col. 4. 6.) so must all our religious performances be seasoned with that salt. Christianity is the salt of the earth.

III. Directions are given about the first-fruits.

1. The oblation of their first-fruits at harvest, of which we read, Deut. 26. 2. These were offered to the Lord, not to be burnt upon the altar, but to be given to the priests as perquisites of their office, v. 12. And ye shall offer them, (that is, leaven and honey,) in the oblation of the first-fruits, though they were forbidden in other meat-offerings; for they were proper enough to be eaten by the priests, though not to be burnt upon the altar. The loaves of the first-fruits are particularly ordered to be baked with leaven, Lev. 23. 17. And we read of the first-fruits of honey brought to the house of God, 2 Chron. 31. 5.

2. A meat-offering of their first-fruits. The former was required by the law, this was a free-will offering, v. 14. .16. If a man, with a thankful sense of God's goodness to him, in giving him hopes of a plentiful crop, was disposed to bring an offering in kind, immediately out of his field, and present it to God, owning thereby his dependence upon God, and obligations to him, (1.) Let him be sure to bring the first ripe and full ears, not such as were small and half-withered. Whatever was brought for an offering to God must be the best in its kind, though it were but green ears of corn. We mock God, and deceive ourselves, if we think to put him off with a corrupt thing, while we have in our flock a male, Mal. 1. 14. (2.) These green ears must be dried by the fire, that the corn, such as it was, might be beaten out of them. That is not expected from green ears, which one may justly look for from those that have been left to grow full ripe. If those that are young do God's work as well as they can, they shall be accepted, though they cannot do it so well as those that are aged and experienced. God makes the best of green ears of corn, and so must we. (3.) Oil and frankincense must be put upon it. Thus (as some allude to this) wisdom and humility must soften and sweeten the spirits and services of young people, and then their green ears of corn shall be acceptable. God takes a particular delight in the first ripe fruits of the Spirit, and the expressions of early piety and devotion. Those that can but think and speak as children, yet if they think and speak well, God will be well-pleased with their buds and blossoms, and will never forget the kindness of their youth. (4.) It must be used as other meat-offerings; v. 16. compare v. 9. He shall offer all the frankincense, it is an offering made by fire. The fire and the frankincense seem to have had a special significancy. [1.] The fire denotes the fervency of spirit which ought to be in all our religious services. In every good thing we must be zealously affected. Holy love to God is the fire by which all our offerings must be made; else they are not of a sweet savour to God. [2.] The frankincense denotes the mediation and intercession of Christ, by which all our services are perfumed and recommended to God's gracious acceptance. Blessed be God that we have the substance which all these observances were but shadows of; the fruit that was hid under these leaves.

CHAP. III.

In this chapter we have the law concerning the peace-offerings, whether they were, I. Of the herd, a bullock or a heifer, v. 1. .5. Or, II. Of the flock, either a lamb, (v. 6. .11.) or a goat, v. 12. .17. The ordinances concerning each of these are much the same, yet they are repeated, to shew the care we ought to take that all our services be done according to the appointment, and the pleasure God takes in the services that are so performed. It is likewise to intimate, what need we have of precept upon precept, and line upon line.

1. AND if his oblation be a sacrifice of peace-offering, if he offer it of the herd; whether it be a male or female, he shall offer it without blemish before the LORD. 2. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of his offering, and kill it at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: and Aaron's sons, the priests, shall sprinkle the blood upon the altar round about. 3. And he shall offer of the sacrifice of the peace-offering an offering made by fire unto the LORD; the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards, 4. And the two kidneys, and the fat that is on them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away. 5. And Aaron's sons shall burn it on the altar, upon the burnt sacrifice, which is upon the wood that is on the fire; it is an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD.

The burnt-offerings had regard to God, as in himself the best of beings, most perfect and excellent; were purely expressive of adoration; and therefore were wholly burnt. But the peace-offerings had regard to God as a Benefactor to his creatures, and the giver of all good things to us; and therefore these were divided between the altar, the priest, and the owner. Peace signifies, 1. Reconciliation, concord, and communion. And so these were called peace-offerings, because in them God and his people did, as it were, feast together in token of friendship. The priest, who was ordained for men in things pertaining to God, gave part of this peace-offering to God, (that part which he required, and it was fit he should be first served,) burning it upon God's altar; part he gave to the offerer, to be eaten by him with his family and friends; and part he took to himself, as the day-man that laid his hand upon them both. They could not thus eat together, unless they were agreed; so that it was a symbol of friendship and fellowship between God and man, and a confirmation of the covenant of peace. 2. It signifies prosperity and all happiness: Peace be to you, was as much as All good be to you; and so the peace-offerings were offered, either, (1.) By way of supplication or request for some good that was wanted and desired. If a man were in the pursuit or expectation of any mercy, he would back his prayer for it with a peace-offering, and, probably, put up the prayer when he laid his hand upon the head of the offering. Christ is our Peace, our Peace-Offering; for through him alone it is that we can expect to obtain mercy, and an answer of peace to our prayers; and in him an upright prayer shall be acceptable and successful, though we bring not a peace-offering. The less costly our devotions are, the more lively and serious they should be. Or, (2.) By way of thanksgiving for some particular mercy received; it is called a peace-offering of thanksgiving, for so it was sometimes; as in other cases a vow, ch. 7. 15, 16. And some make the original word to signify retribution. When they had received any special mercy, and were inquiring what they should render, this they were directed to render to the God of their mercies as a grateful acknowledgment of the benefit done to them, Ps. 116. 12. And we must offer to God the sacrifice of praise continually, by Christ our Peace; and then this shall please the Lord better than an ox or bullock.

Now,

I. As to the matter of the peace-offering. Suppose it were of the herd, it must be without blemish; and, if it was so, it was indifferent whether it was male or female, v. 1. In our spiritual offerings, it is not the sex, but the heart that God looks at, Gal. 3. 28.

II. As to the management of it.

1. The offerer was, by a solemn manmission, to transfer his interest in it to God, (v.2.) and, with his hand on the head of the sacrifice, to acknowledge the particular mercies for which he designed this a thank-offering; or, if it were a vow, to make his prayer.

2. It must be killed; and though that might be done in any part of the court, yet it is said to be at the door of tabernacle, because the mercies received or expected were acknowledged to come from God, and the prayers or praises were directed to him, and both, as it were, through that door. Our Lord Jesus has said, I am the Door, for he is indeed the Door of the tabernacle.

3. The priest must sprinkle the blood upon the altar, for it was the blood that made atonement for the soul; and though this was not a sin-offering, yet we must be taught that in all our offerings we must have an eye to Christ as the Propitiation for sin, as those who know that the best of our services cannot be accepted, unless through him our sins be pardoned. Penitent confessions must always go along with our thankful acknowledgments; and, whatever mercy we pray for, in order to it, we must pray for the removal of guilt, as that which keeps good things from us. First, take away all iniquity, and then receive us graciously; or, give good, Hos. 14. 2.

4. All the fat of the inwards, that which we call the tallow and suet, with the caul that encloses it, and the kidneys in the midst of it, were to be taken away, and burnt upon the altar, as an offering made by fire, v.3. .5. And that was all that was sacrificed to the Lord out of the peace-offering; how the rest was to be disposed of, we shall find, ch.7,11, &c. It is ordered to be burnt upon the burnt sacrifice, that is, the daily burnt-offering, the lamb which was offered every morning before any other sacrifice was offered; so that the fat of the peace-offerings was an addition to that, and a continuation of it. The great sacrifice of peace, that of the Lamb of God which takes away the sins of the world, prepares the altar for our sacrifices of praise, which are not accepted till we are reconciled. Now the burning of this fat is supposed to signify, (1.) The offering up of our good affections to God in all our prayers and praises. God must have the inwards; for we must pour out our souls, and lift up our hearts, in prayer, and must bless his name with all that is within us. It is required that we be inward with God in every thing wherein we have to do with him. The fat denotes the best and choicest, which must always be devoted to God, who has made for us a feast of fat things. (2.) The mortifying of our corrupt affections and lusts, and the burning up of them by the fire of divine grace, Col.3.5. Then we are truly thankful for former mercies, and prepared to receive further mercy, when we part with our sins, and have our minds cleared from all sensuality, by the spirit of judgment, and the spirit of burning, Isa. 4.4.

6. And if his offering for a sacrifice of peace-offering unto the LORD be of the flock; male or female, he shall offer it without blemish. 7. If he offer a lamb for his offering, then shall he offer it before the LORD. 8. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of his offering, and kill it before the tabernacle of the congregation: and Aaron's sons shall sprinkle the blood thereof round about upon the altar. 9. And he shall offer of the sacrifice of the peace-offering an offering made by fire unto the LORD; the fat thereof, and the whole rump, it shall he take off hard by the back-bone; and the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards. 10. And the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away. 11. And the priest shall burn it upon the altar: it is the food of the offering made by fire unto the LORD. 12. And if his offering be a goat, then he shall offer it before the LORD. 13. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of it, and kill it before the tabernacle of the congregation; and the sons of Aaron shall sprinkle the blood thereof upon the altar round about. 14. And he shall offer thereof his offering, even an offering made by fire unto the LORD; the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards, 15. And the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away. 16. And the priest shall burn them upon the altar: it is the food of the offering made by fire for a sweet savour: all the fat is the LORD'S. 17. It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood.

Directions are here given concerning the peace-offering, if it were a sheep or a goat. Turtle-doves or young pigeons, which might be brought for whole burnt-offerings, were not allowed for peace-offerings, because they have no fat considerable enough to be burnt upon the altar; and they would be next to nothing, if they were to be divided according to the law of the peace-offerings. The laws concerning a lamb or goat, offered for a peace-offering, are much the same with those concerning a bullock, and a little now occurs here; but,

1. That the rump of the mutton was to be burnt with the fat of the inwards upon the altar; the whole rump, (v.9.) because in those countries it was very fat and large. Some observe from this, that, be a thing ever so contemptible, God can make it honourable, by applying it to his service. Thus God is said to give more abundant honour to that part which lacked, 1 Cor. 12. 23, 24.

2. That that which was burnt upon the altar is called the food of the offering, v.11,16. It fed the holy fire; it was acceptable to God as our food is to us; and since in the tabernacle God did, as it were, keep house among them, by the offerings on the altar he kept a good table, as Solomon in his court, 1 Kings, 4. 22, &c.

3. Here is a general rule laid down, that all the fat is the Lord's, (v.16.) and a law made thereupon, that they should eat neither fat nor blood, no not in their private houses, v.17. (1.) As for the fat it is not meant of that which is interlarded with the meat, that they might eat; (Neh.8. 10.) but the fat of the inwards, the suet, which was always God's part out of the sacrificed beasts; and therefore they must not eat of it, no not out of the beasts that they killed for their common use. Thus would God preserve the honour of that which was sacred to himself. They must not only not feed upon that very fat which was to be the food of the altar, but not upon any like it, lest the table of the Lord, (as the altar is called,) if something were not reserved peculiar to it, should become contemptible, and the fruit thereof, even its meat, contemptible, Mal. 1. 7, 12. (2.) The blood was universally forbidden likewise, for the same reason that the fat was, because it was God's part of every sacrifice. The heathen drank the blood of their sacrifices; hence we read of their drink-offerings of blood, Ps. 16. 4. But God would not permit the blood that made atonement to be used as a common thing, (Heb. 10. 29.) nor will he allow us, though we have the comfort of the atonement made, to assume to ourselves any share in the honour of making it. He that glories, let him glory in the Lord, and to his praise let all the blood be poured out.

CHAP. IV.

This chapter is concerning the sin-offering, which was properly intended to make atonement for a sin committed through ignorance; either, I. By the priest himself, v. 1..12. Or, II. By the whole congregation, v.13..21. Or, III. By a ruler, v.22..26. Or, IV. By a private person, v.27..35.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a soul shall sin through ignorance against any of the commandments of the LORD concerning things which ought not to be done, and shall do against any of them: 3. If the priest that is anointed do sin according to the sin of the people; then let him bring for his sin which he hath sinned a young bullock without blemish unto the LORD for a sin-offering. 4. And he shall bring the bullock unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the LORD; and shall lay his hand upon the bullock's head, and kill the bullock before the LORD. 5. And the priest that is anointed shall take of the bullock's blood, and bring it to the tabernacle of the congregation. 6. And the priest shall dip his finger in the blood, and sprinkle of the blood seven times before the LORD, before the veil of the sanctuary. 7. And the priest shall put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar of sweet incense before the LORD, which is in the tabernacle of the congregation; and shall pour all the blood of the bullock at the bottom of the altar of the burnt-offering, which is at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 8. And he shall take off from it all the fat of the bullock for the sin-offering: the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards, 9. And the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away, 10. As it was taken off from the bullock of the sacrifice of peace-offerings: and the priest shall burn them upon the altar of the burnt-offering. 11. And the skin of the bullock, and all his flesh, with his head, and with his legs, and his inwards, and his dung, 12. Even the whole bullock shall he carry forth without the camp unto a clean place, where the ashes are poured out, and burn him on the wood with fire: where the ashes are poured out shall he be burnt.

The laws contained in the three first chapters seem to have been delivered to Moses at one time. Here begin the statutes of another session, another day. From the throne of glory between the cherubims God delivered these orders. And he enters now upon a subject more strictly new than those before. Burnt-offerings, meat-offerings, and peace-offerings, it should seem, had been offered before the giving of the law upon mount Sinai; those sacrifices the patriarchs had not been altogether unacquainted with, (Gen. 8. 20. Exod. 20. 24.) and in those they had respect to sin, to make atonement for it, Job, 1. 5. But the law being now added because of transgressions, (Gal. 3. 19.) and having entered, that eventually the offence might abound, (Rom. 5. 20.) they were put into a way of making atonement for sin more particularly by sacrifice, which was (more than any of the ceremonial institutions) a shadow of good things to come, but the substance is Christ, and that one offering of himself, by which he put away sin, and perfected for ever them which are sanctified.

I. The general case supposed, we have, v. 2. We observe, 1. Concerning sin in general, That it is described to be against any of the commandments of the Lord; for sin is the transgression of the law, the divine law. The wits or wills of men, their inventions, or their injunctions, cannot make that to be sin which the law of God has not made to be so. It is said likewise, if a soul sin, for it is not sin, if it be not some way or other the soul's act; hence it is called the sin of the soul, (Mic. 6. 7.) and it is the soul that is injured by it, Prov. 8. 36. 2. Concerning the sins for which those offerings were appointed. (1.) They are supposed to be overt-acts; for had they been to bring a sacrifice for every sinful thought or word, it had been endless. Atonement was made for those in the gross, on the day of expiation, once a year; but these are said to be done against the commandments. (2.) They are supposed to be sins of commission, things which ought not to be done. Omissions are sins, and must come into judgment; but what had been omitted at one time might be done at another, and so, to obey was better than sacrifice; but a commission was past recall. (3.) They are supposed to be sins committed through ignorance. If they were done presumptuously, and with an avowed contempt of the law, and the Law-Maker, the offender was to be cut off, and there remained no sacrifice for the sin, Heb. 10. 26, 27. Numb. 15. 30. But if the offender were either ignorant of the law, as, in divers instances, we may suppose many were, (so numerous and various were the prohibitions,) or were surprised into the sin unawares, the circumstances being such as made it evident that his resolution against the sin was sincere, but that he was overtaken in it, as the expression is, (Gal. 6. 1.) in this case, relief was provided by the remedial law of the sin-offering. And the Jews say, "Those crimes only were to be expiated by sacrifice, if committed ignorantly, for which the criminal was to have been cut off, if they had been committed presumptuously."

II. The law begins with the case of the anointed priest, that is, the high priest, provided he should sin through ignorance; for the law made men priests which had infirmity; though his ignorance was of all others least excusable, yet he is allowed to bring his offering. His office did not so far excuse his offence, as that it should be forgiven him without a sacrifice; yet it did not so far aggravate it, but that it should be forgiven him, when he did bring his sacrifice. If he sin according to the sin of the people, (so the case is put, v. 3.) which supposes him in this matter to stand upon the level with other Israelites, and to have no benefit of his clergy at all. Now the law concerning the sin-offering for the high priest is,

1. That he must bring a bullock without blemish for a sin-offering, (v. 3.) as valuable an offering as that for the whole congregation; (v. 14.) whereas for any other ruler, or a common person, a kid of the goats should serve, v. 23, 28. This intimated the greatness of the guilt connected with the sin of a high priest. The eminency of his station, and his relation both to God and to the people, greatly aggravated his offences; see Rom. 2. 21.

2. The hand of the offerer must be laid upon the head of the offering, (v. 4.) with a solemn penitent confession of the sin he had committed, putting it upon the head of the sin-offering, ch. 26. 21. No remission without confession, Ps. 32. 5. Prov. 28. 13. It signified also a confidence in this instituted way of expiating guilt, as a figure of something better yet to come, which they could not steadfastly discern. He that laid his hand on the head of the beast, thereby owned that he deserved to die himself; and that it was God's great mercy, that he would please to accept the offering of this beast to die for him. The Jewish writers themselves say, that neither the sin-offering nor the trespass-offering made atonement, except for those that repent, and believe in their atonement.

3. The bullock must be killed, and a great deal of solemn

There must be in disposing of the blood; for it was the blood that made atonement, and without shedding of blood there was no remission, v. 5 . . 7. Some of the blood of the high priest's sin-offering was to be sprinkled seven times before the vail, with an eye toward the mercy-seat, though it was veiled; some of it was to be put upon the horns of the golden altar, because at that altar the priest himself ministered; and thus was signified the putting away of that pollution, which from his sins did cleave to his services. It likewise serves to illustrate the influence which Christ's satisfaction has upon the prevalency of his intercession. The blood of his sacrifice is put upon the altar of his incense, and sprinkled before the Lord. When this was done, the remainder of the blood was poured at the foot of the brazen altar. By this rite, the sinner acknowledged that he deserved to have his blood thus poured out like water: it likewise signified the pouring out of the soul before God in true repentance; and typified our Saviour's pouring out his soul unto death.

4. The fat of the inwards was to be burnt upon the altar of burnt-offering, v. 3 . . 10. By this, the intention of the offering and of the atonement made by it was directed to the glory of God, who, having been dishonoured by the sin, was thus honoured by the sacrifice. It signified the sharp sufferings of our Lord Jesus, when he was made sin, that is, a Sin-offering for us, especially the sorrows of his soul and his inward agonies. It likewise teaches us, in conformity to the death of Christ, to crucify the flesh.

5. The head and body of the beast, skin and all, were to be carried without the camp, to a certain place appointed for that purpose, and there burnt to ashes, v. 11, 12. This was very significant, (1.) Of the duty of repentance, which is the putting away of sin as a detestable thing, which our soul hates. True penitents say to their idols, "Get you hence; What have we to do any more with idols?" The sin-offering is called sin. What they did to that, we must do to our sins; the body of sin must be destroyed, Rom. 6. 6. (2.) Of the privilege of remission. When God pardons sin, he quite abolishes it, casts it behind his back; The iniquity of Judah shall be sought for, and not found. The apostle takes particular notice of this ceremony, and applies it to Christ, (Heb. 13. 11 . . 13.) who suffered without the gate, in the place of a skull, where the ashes of dead men, as those of the altar, were poured out.

13. And if the whole congregation of Israel sin through ignorance, and the thing be hid from the eyes of the assembly, and they have done some-what against any of the commandments of the Lord concerning things which should not be done, and are guilty: 14. When the sin, which they have sinned against it, is known, then the congregation shall offer a young bullock for the sin, and bring him before the tabernacle of the congregation. 15. And the elders of the congregation shall lay their hands upon the head of the bullock before the LORD: and the bullock shall be killed before the LORD. 16. And the priest that is anointed shall bring of the bullock's blood to the tabernacle of the congregation: 17. And the priest shall dip his finger in some of the blood, and sprinkle it seven times before the LORD, even before the vail. 18. And he shall put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar which is before the LORD, that is in the tabernacle of the congregation, and shall pour out all the blood at the bottom of the altar of the burnt-offering, which is at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 19. And he shall take all his fat from him, and burn it upon the altar. 20. And he shall do with the bullock as he did with the bullock for a sin-offering, so shall he do with this: and the priest shall make an atonement for them, and it shall be forgiven them. 21. And he shall carry forth the bullock without the camp, and burn him as he burned the first bullock: it is a sin-offering for the congregation.

This is the law for expiating the guilt of a national sin by a sin-offering. If the leaders of the people, through mistake concerning the law, caused them to err, when the mistake was discovered, an offering must be brought, that wrath might not come upon the whole congregation. Observe,

1. It is possible that the church may err, and that her guides may mislead her. It is here supposed, that the whole congregation may sin, and sin through ignorance. God will always have a church on earth; but he never said it should be infallible, or perfectly pure from corruption, on this side heaven.

2. When a sacrifice was to be offered for the whole congregation, the elders were to lay their hands upon the head of it, three of them at least, as representatives of the people, and agents for them. The sin we suppose to have been some common custom, taken up and used by the generality of the people, upon presumption of its being lawful, which afterward, upon search, appeared to be otherwise. In this case, the commonness of the usage, received perhaps by tradition from their fathers, and the vulgar opinion of its being lawful, would not so far excuse them from sin, but that they must bring a sacrifice to make atonement for it. There are many bad customs and forms of speech, which are thought to have no harm in them, and yet may bring guilt and wrath upon a land, which therefore it concerns the elders both to reform, and to intercede with God for the pardon of, Joel, 2. 16.

3. The blood of this sin-offering, as of the former, was to be sprinkled seven times before the Lord, v. 17. It was not to be poured out there, but sprinkled only; for the cleansing virtue of the blood of Christ was then and is still sufficiently signified and represented by sprinkling, Isa. 52. 15. It was to be sprinkled seven times; seven is a number of perfection, because when God had made the world in six days, he rested the seventh; so this signified the perfect satisfaction Christ made, and the complete cleansing of the souls of the faithful by it; see Heb. 10. 14. The blood was likewise to be put upon the horns of the incense-altar, to which there seems to be an allusion, (Jer. 17. 1.) where the sin of Judah is said to be graven upon the horns of their altars. If they did not forsake their sins, the putting of the blood of their sin-offerings upon the horns of their altars, instead of taking away their guilt, did but bind it on the faster, perpetuated the remembrance of it, and remained a witness against them. It is likewise alluded to, (Rev. 9. 13.) where a voice is heard from the four horns of the golden altar; that is, an answer of peace is given to the prayers of the saints, which are acceptable and prevalent only by virtue of the blood of the Sin-offering put upon the horns of that altar; compare Rev. 8. 3.

4. When the offering is completed, it is said, atonement is made, and the sin shall be forgiven, v. 20. The promise of remission is founded upon the atonement. It is spoken here of the forgiveness of the sin of the whole congregation, that is, the turning away of those national judgments which the sin deserved. Note, The saving of churches and kingdoms from ruin is owing to the satisfaction and mediation of Christ.

22. When a ruler hath sinned, and done some-what through ignorance against any of the commandments of the LORD his God concerning things which should not be done, and his guilty; 23. Or if his sin, wherein he hath sinned, come to his knowledge; he shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a male without blemish: 24. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of the goat, and kill it in the place where they kill the burnt-offering before the LORD: it is a sin-offering. 25. And the priest shall take of the blood of the sin-offering with his finger, and put it upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offering, and shall pour out his blood at the bottom of the altar of burnt-offering. 26. And he shall burn all his fat upon the altar, as the fat of the sacrifice of peace-offerings: and the priest shall make an atonement for him as concerning his sin, and it shall be forgiven him.

Observe here, 1. That God takes notice of, and is displeas'd with, the sins of rulers. They who have power to call others to account, are themselves accountable to the Ruler of rulers, for, as high as they are, there is a higher than they. This is intimated, in that here only the commandment transgressed is said to be the commandment of the Lord his God, v. 22. He is a prince to others, but let him know the Lord is a God to him. 2. The sin of the ruler, which he committed through ignorance, is supposed afterward to come to his knowledge, (v. 23.) which must be either by the check of his own conscience, or by the reproof of his friends, both which we should all, even the best and greatest, not only submit to, but be thankful for. What we have done amiss, we should be very desirous to come to the knowledge of. That which I see not, teach thou me, and shew me wherein I have erred, are prayers we should put up to God every day; that though through ignorance we fall into sin, we may not through ignorance lie still in it. 3. The sin-offering for a ruler was to be a kid of the goats, not a bullock, as for the priest, and the whole congregation; nor was the blood of his sin-offering to be brought into the tabernacle, as of the other two, but it was all bestow'd upon the brazen altar; (v. 25.) nor was the flesh of it to be burnt, as that of the other two, without the camp; which intimated that the sin of a ruler, though worse than that of a common person, yet was not so heinous, nor of such pernicious consequence, as the sin of the high priest, or of the whole congregation. A kid of the goats was sufficient to be offered for a ruler, but a bullock for a tribe; to intimate that the ruler, though major singulis—greater than each, was minor universis—less than the whole. It is bad when great men give ill examples, but worse when all men follow them. 4. It is promised that the atonement shall be accepted, and the sin forgiven, (v. 26.) to wit, if he repent and reform; for, otherwise, God sware concerning Eli, a judge in Israel, that the iniquity of his house should not be purged with sacrifice nor offering for ever, 1 Sam. 3. 14.

27. And if any one of the common people sin through ignorance, while he doeth somewhat against any of the commandments of the LORD concerning things which ought not to be done, and be guilty; 28. Or if his sin, which he hath sinned, come to his knowledge: then he shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a female without blemish, for his sin which he hath sinned. 29. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of the sin-offering, and slay the sin-offering in the place of the burnt-offering. 30. And the priest shall take of the blood thereof with his finger, and put it upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offering, and shall pour out all the blood thereof at the bottom of the altar: 31. And he shall take away all the fat thereof, as the fat is taken away from off the sacrifice of peace-offerings; and the priest shall burn it upon the altar for a sweet savour unto the LORD; and the priest shall make an atonement for him, and it shall be forgiven him. 32. And if he bring a lamb for a sin-offering, he shall bring it a female without blemish. 33. And he shall lay his hand upon the head of the sin-offering, and slay it for a sin-offering in the place where they kill the burnt-offering. 34. And the priest shall take of the blood of the sin-offering with his finger, and put it upon the horns of the altar of burnt-offering, and shall pour out all the blood thereof at the bottom of the altar: 35. And he shall take away all the fat thereof, as the fat of the lamb is taken away from the sacrifice of the peace-offerings; and the priest shall burn them upon the altar, according to the offerings made by fire unto the LORD: and the priest shall make an atonement for his sin that he hath committed, and it shall be forgiven him.

Here is the law of the sin-offering for a common person, which differs from that for a ruler only in this, that a private person might bring either a kid or a lamb, a ruler only a kid; and that for a ruler must be a male, for the other a female: in all the circumstances of the management of the offering they agreed. Observe, 1. The case supposed, If any one of the common people sin through ignorance, v. 27. The prophet supposes that they were not so likely as the great men to know the way of the Lord, and the judgment of their God, (Jer. 5. 4.) and yet, if they sin through ignorance, they must bring a sin-offering. Note, Even sins of ignorance need to be atoned for by sacrifice. To be able to plead, when we are charged with sin, that we did it ignorantly, and through the surprise of temptation, will not bring us off, if we be not interested in that great plea, Christ hath died, and entitled to the benefit of that. We have all need to pray, with David, (and he was a ruler,) to be cleansed from secret faults, the errors which we ourselves do not understand, or are not aware of, Ps. 19. 12. 2. That the sins of ignorance committed by a single person, a common, obscure, person, did require a sacrifice; for, as the greatest are not above the censure, so the meanest are not below the cognizance, of the divine justice. None of the common people, if offenders, were overlooked in a crowd. 3. That a sin-offering was not admitted only, but accepted, even from one of the common people, and an atonement made by it, v. 31, 35. Here rich and poor, prince and peasant, meet together; they are both alike welcome to Christ, and to an interest in his sacrifice, upon the same terms. See Job, 34. 19.

From all these laws concerning the sin-offerings, we may learn, (1.) To hate sin, and to watch against it. This is certainly a very bad thing, to make atonement for which so many innocent and useful creatures must be slain and mangled thus. (2.) To value Christ, the great and true Sin-offering, whose blood cleanses from all sin, which it was not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away. Now if any man sin, Christ is the Propitiation, (1 John, 2. 1, 2.) not for Jews only, but for Gentiles. And perhaps there was some allusion to this law concerning sacrifices for sins of ignorance, in that prayer of Christ's, just when he was offering up himself a sacrifice, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.

CHAP. V.

This chapter, and part of the next, concerns the trespass-offering. The difference between this and the sin-offering lay not so much in the sacrifices themselves, and the management of them, as in the occasions of the offering of them. They were both intended to make atonement for sin; but the former was more general, this applied to some particular instances. Observe what is here said, 1. Concerning the trespass. If a man sin, 1. In concealing his knowledge, when he is adjured, v. 1. 2. In touching an unclean thing, v. 2, 3. 3. In swearing, v. 4. 4. In embezzling the holy things, v. 14, 16. 5. In any sin of infirmity, v. 17, 19. Some other cases there are, in which these offerings were to be offered, ch. 6. 2, 4.—14. 12.—19. 21. Numb. 6. 12. 11. Concerning the trespass-offering, 1. Of the flock, v. 5, 6. 2. Of fowls, v. 7, 13. 3. Of flour, v. 11, 13. but chiefly a ram without blemish, v. 15, 19.

1. AND if a soul sin, and hear the voice of swearing, and is a witness, whether he hath seen or known of it; if he do not utter it, then he shall bear his iniquity. 2. Or if a soul touch any unclean thing, whether it be a carcase of an unclean beast, or a carcase of unclean cattle, or the carcase of unclean creeping things, and if it be hidden from him; he also shall be unclean, and guilty. 3. Or if he touch the uncleanness of man, whatsoever uncleanness it be that a man shall be defiled withal, and it be hid from him; when he knoweth of it, then he shall be guilty. 4. Or if a soul swear, pronouncing with his lips to do evil, or to do good; whatsoever it be that a man shall pronounce with an oath, and it be hid from him; when he knoweth of it, then he shall be guilty in one of these. 5. And it shall be, when he shall be guilty in one of these things, that he shall confess that he hath sinned in that thing: 6. And he shall bring his trespass-offering unto the LORD for his sin which he hath sinned, a female from the flock, a lamb or a kid of the goats, for a sin-offering; and the priest shall make an atonement for him concerning his sin.

The offences here supposed are,

1. A man's concealing the truth, when he was sworn as a witness to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Judges among the Jews had power to adjure, not only the witnesses, as with us, but the person suspected, (contrary to a rule of our law, that no man is bound to accuse himself,) as appears by the high priest's adjuring our Saviour, who thereupon answered, though before he stood silent, Matth. 26. 63, 64. Now, (v. 1.) If a soul sin, that is, a person, (for the soul is the man,) if he hear the voice of swearing, that is, if he be adjured to testify what he knows, by an oath of the Lord upon him, (1 Kings, 8. 31.) if in such a case, for fear of offending one that either has been his friend or may be his enemy, he refuses to give evidence, or gives it but in part, he shall bear his iniquity. And that is a heavy burthen, which, if some course be not taken to get it removed, will sink a man to the lowest hell. He that heareth cursing, that is, that is thus adjured, and bewrayeth it not, that is, stifles his evidence, and does not utter it, he is a partner with the sinner, and hateth his own soul; see Prov. 29. 24. Let all that are called out at any time to bear testimony, think of this law, and be free and open in their evidence, and take heed of prevaricating. An oath of the Lord is a sacred thing, and not to be dallied with.

2. A man's touching any thing that was ceremonially unclean,

v. 2, 3. If a man, polluted by such touch, came into the sanctuary inconsiderately, or if he neglected to wash himself according to the law, then he was to look upon himself as under guilt, and must bring his offering. Though his touching of the unclean thing contracted only a ceremonial defilement, yet his neglect to wash himself according to the law was such an instance either of carelessness or contempt, as contracted a moral guilt. If at first it be hid from him, yet when he knows it, he shall be guilty. Note, As soon as ever God by his Spirit convinces our consciences of any sin or duty, we must immediately set in with the conviction, and prosecute it, as those that are not ashamed to own our former mistake.

3. Rash swearing; that a man will do or not do such a thing: if the performance of his oath afterward prove either unlawful or impracticable, by which he is discharged from the obligation; yet he must bring an offering to atone for his folly in swearing so rashly, as David that he would kill Nabal. And then it was, that he must say before the angel, that it was an error; (Ecl. 5. 6.) He shall be guilty in one of these: (ch. 5. 4.) guilty if he do not perform his oath; and yet, if the matter of it were evil, guilty if he do. Such wretched dilemmas as these do some men bring themselves into by their own rashness and folly; go which way they will, their consciences are wounded; sin stares them in the face, so sadly are they snared in the words of their mouth. A more sad dilemma this is than that of the lepers, "If we sit still, we die; if we stir, we die." Wisdom and watchfulness beforehand would prevent these straits.

Now in these cases, (1.) The offender must confess his sin, and bring his offering; (v. 5, 6.) and the offering was not accepted, unless it was accompanied with a penitential confession, and a humble prayer for pardon. Observe, the confession must be particular, that he hath sinned in that thing; such was David's confession, (Psa. 51. 4.) I have done this evil; and Achan's, (Josh. 7. 20.) Thus and thus have I done. Deceit lies in generals; many will own in general they have sinned, for that all must own, so that it is not any particular reproach to them; but that they have sinned in this thing, they stand too much upon their honour to acknowledge: but the way to be well assured of pardon, and to be well armed against sin for the future, is to be particular in our penitent confessions. (2.) The priest must make an atonement for him. As the atonement was not accepted without his repentance, so his repentance would not justify him without the atonement. Thus in our reconciliation to God, Christ's part and our's are both needful.

7. And if he be not able to bring a lamb, then he shall bring for his trespass, which he hath committed, two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, unto the LORD; one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering. 8. And he shall bring them unto the priest, who shall offer that which is for the sin-offering first, and wring off his head from his neck, but shall not divide it asunder. 9. And he shall sprinkle of the blood of the sin-offering upon the side of the altar; and the rest of the blood shall be wrung out at the bottom of the altar: it is a sin-offering. 10. And he shall offer the second for a burnt-offering, according to the manner: and the priest shall make an atonement for him for his sin which he hath sinned, and it shall be forgiven him. 11. But if he be not able to bring two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, then he that sinned shall bring for his offering the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour for a sin-offering; he shall put no oil upon it, neither shall he put any frankincense thereon: for it is a sin-offering. 12. Then shall he bring it to the priest, and the priest shall take his handful of it, even a memorial thereof, and burn it on the altar, according to the offerings made by fire unto the LORD: it is a sin-offering. 13. And the priest shall make an atonement for him as touching his sin that he hath sinned in one of these, and it shall be forgiven him: and the remnant shall be the priest's, as a meat-offering.

Provision is here made for the poor of God's people, and the pacifying of their consciences under the sense of guilt. Those that were not able to bring a lamb, might bring for a sin-offering a pair of turtle doves, or two young pigeons; nay, if any were so extremely poor, that they were not able to procure those so often as they would have occasion, they might bring a pottle of fine flour, and that should be accepted. Thus the expence of the sin-offering was brought lower than that of any other offering; to teach us that no man's poverty shall ever be a bar in the way of his pardon. The poorest of all may have atonement made for them, if it be not their own fault. Thus the poor are evangelized; and no man shall say that he had not wherewithal to bear the charges of a journey to heaven.

Now, 1. If the sinner brought two doves, one was to be offered for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering, v. 7. Observe, (1.) Before he offered the burnt-offering, which was for the honour and praise of God, he must offer the sin-offering, to make atonement. We must first see to it that our peace be made with God, and then we may expect that our services for his glory will be accepted. The sin-offering must make way for the burnt-offering. (2.) After the sin-offering, which made atonement, came the burnt-offering, as an acknowledgment of the great mercy of God, in appointing and accepting the atonement.

2. If he brought fine flour, a handful of it was to be offered, but without either oil or frankincense; (v. 11.) not only because that would make it too costly for the poor, for whose comfort this sacrifice was appointed, but because it was a sin-offering; and therefore, to shew the loathsomeness of the sin for which it was offered, it must not be made grateful either to the taste by oil, or to the smell by frankincense. The unsavouriness of the offering was to intimate that the sinner must never relish his sin again as he had done. God by these sacrifices did speak, (1.) Comfort to those that had offended, that they might not despair, or pine away in their iniquity; but peace being thus made for them with God, they might have peace in him. (2.) Caution likewise not to offend any more, remembering what an expensive troublesome thing it was to make atonement.

14. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 15. If a soul commit a trespass, and sin through ignorance, in the holy things of the LORD; then he shall bring for his trespass unto the LORD a ram without blemish out of the flocks, with thy estimation by shekels of silver, after the shekel of the sanctuary, for a trespass-offering: 16. And he shall make amends for the harm that he hath done in the holy thing, and shall add the fifth part thereto, and give it unto the priest: and the priest shall make an atonement for him with the ram of the trespass-offering, and it shall be forgiven him. 17. And if a soul sin, and commit any of these things which are forbidden to be done by the commandments of the LORD; though he wist it not, yet is he guilty, and shall bear his iniquity. 18. And he shall bring a ram without blemish out of the flock, with thy estimation, for a trespass-offering, unto the priest: and the priest shall make an atonement for him concerning his ignorance wherein he erred and wist it not, and it shall be forgiven him. 19. It is a trespass-offering: he hath certainly trespassed against the LORD.

Hitherto in this chapter orders were given concerning those sacrifices that were both sin-offerings and trespass-offerings, for they go by both names, v. 6. Here we have the law concerning those that were properly and peculiarly trespass-offerings, which were offered to atone for trespasses done against a neighbour; those sins we commonly call trespasses. Now injuries done to another may be either in holy things, or in common things; of the former we have the law in these verses; of the latter, in the beginning of the next chapter. If a man did harm (as it is v. 16.) in the holy things of the Lord, he thereby committed a trespass against the priests, the Lord's ministers, who were intrusted with the care of these holy things, and had the benefit of them. Now if a man did alienate or convert to his own use any thing that was dedicated to God, unwittingly, he was to bring this sacrifice; as suppose he had ignorantly made use of the tithes, or first-fruits, or first-born of his cattle, or (which, it should seem by ch. 22. 14. . 16, is principally meant here) had eaten any of those parts of the sacrifices which were appropriated to the priests; this was a trespass. It is supposed to be done through mistake, or forgetfulness, for want either of care or zeal; for if it was done presumptuously, and in contempt of the law, the offender died without mercy, Heb. 10. 28. But in case of negligence and ignorance this sacrifice was appointed; and Moses is told,

1. What must be done in case the trespass appeared to be certain. The trespasser must, (1.) Bring an offering to the Lord, which, in all those that were purely trespass-offerings, must be a ram without blemish, "of the second year," say the Jewish doctors. (2.) He must likewise make restitution to the priest according to a just estimation of the thing which he had so alienated; adding a fifth part to it, that he might learn to take more heed next time of embezzling what was sacred to God, finding to his cost that there was nothing got by it, and that he paid dear for his oversights.

2. What must be done in case it were doubtful whether he had trespassed or no; he had cause to suspect it, but he wist it not, (v. 17.) that is, he was not very certain; in this case, because it is good to be sure, he must bring his trespass-offering, and the value of that which he feared he had embezzled; only he was not to add the fifth part to it. Now this was designed to shew the very great evil there is in sacrilege; Achan, that was guilty of it presumptuously, died for it; so did Ananias and Sapphira. But this goes further to shew the evil of it, that if a man had, through mere ignorance, and unwittingly, alienated the holy things, nay, if he did but suspect that he had done so, he must be at the expence, not only of a full restitution with interest, but of an offering, with the trouble of bringing it, and must take shame to himself, by making confession of it; so bad a thing is it to invade God's property, and so cautious should we be to abstain from all appearances of this evil. We are also taught here to be jealous over ourselves with a godly jealousy, to ask pardon for the sin, and make satisfaction for the wrong, which we do but suspect ourselves guilty of. In doubtful cases we should take and keep the safer side.

CHAP. VI.

The seven first verses of this chapter would fitly have been added to the foregoing chapter, being a continuation of the law of the trespass-offering, and the putting of other cases in which it was to be offered; and with this end the instructions God gave concerning the several kinds of sacrifices that should be offered: and then at v. 8. (which in the original begins a new section of the law,) he comes to appoint the several rites and ceremonies concerning these sacrifices, which had not been mentioned before. I. The burnt-offering, v. 8. 13. II. The meat-offering, (v. 14. 18.) particularly that at the consecration of the priest, v. 19. 23. III. The sin-offering, v. 21. 30.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. If a soul sin, and commit a trespass against the LORD, and lie unto his neighbour in that which was delivered him to keep, or in fellowship, or in a thing taken away by violence, or hath deceived his neighbour; 3. Or hath found that which was lost, and lieth concerning it, and sweareth falsely; in any of all these that a man doeth, sinning therein: 4. Then it shall be, because he hath sinned, and is guilty, that he shall restore that which he took violently away, or the thing which he hath deceitfully gotten, or that which was delivered him to keep, or the lost thing which he found, 5. Or all that about which he hath sworn falsely; he shall even restore it in the principal, and shall add the fifth part more thereto, and give it unto him to whom it appertaineth, in the day of his trespass-offering. 6. And he shall bring his trespass-offering unto the LORD, a ram without blemish out of the flock, with thy estimation, for a trespass-offering, unto the priest: 7. And the priest shall make an atonement for him before the LORD: and it shall be forgiven him for any thing of all that he hath done in trespassing therein.

This is the latter part of the law of the trespass-offering: the former part, which concerned trespasses about holy things, we had in the close of the foregoing chapter; this concerns trespasses in common things. Observe here,

1. The trespass supposed, v. 2, 3. Though all the instances relate to our neighbour, yet it is called a trespass against the Lord; because, though the injury be done immediately to our neighbour, yet an affront is thereby given to his Maker, and our Master. He that speaks evil of his brother, is said to speak evil of the law, and consequently of the Law-Maker, Jam. 4. 11. Though the person injured be ever so mean and despicable, and every way our inferior, yet the injury reflects upon that God who has made the command of loving our neighbour second to that of loving himself. The trespasses instanced are, (1.) Denying a trust; If a man lie unto his neighbour in that which was delivered him to keep; or, which is worse, which was lent him for his use. If we claim that as our own, which is only borrowed, left in our custody, or committed to our care, this is a trespass against the Lord, who, for the benefit of human society, will have property and truth maintained. (2.) Defrauding a partner; If a man lie in fellowship, claiming a sole interest in that wherein he has but a joint-interest. (3.) Disowning a manifest wrong; If a man, has the front to lie in a thing taken away by violence, which ordinarily cannot be hid. (4.) Deceiving in commerce; or, as some think, by false accusation; if a man have deceitfully oppressed his neighbour, as some read it, either withholding what is due, or extorting what is not. (5.) Detaining what is found, and denying it; (v. 3.) if a man have found that which was lost, he must not call it his own presently, but endeavour to find out the owner, to whom it must be returned; this is doing as we would be done by: but he that lies concerning it, that says he knows nothing of it, when he does, especially if he back that lie with a false oath, he trespasseth against the Lord, who to every thing that is said is a Witness, but in an oath he is the Party appealed to, and highly affronted when he is called to witness to a lie.

2. The trespass-offering appointed. (1.) In the day of his trespass-offering he must make satisfaction to his brother. This must be first done; if thy brother hath aught against thee, (v. 4, 5.) Because he hath sinned and is guilty, that is, is convicted of his guilt by his own conscience, and is touched with remorse for it, seeing himself guilty before God, let him faithfully restore all that he has got by fraud or oppression, with a fifth part added, to make amends to the owner for the loss and trouble he had sustained in the meantime; let him account both for debt and damages. Note, Where wrong has been done, restitution must be made; and till it is made to the utmost of our power, or an equivalent accepted by the person wronged, we cannot have the comfort of the forgiveness of the sin; for the keeping of what is unjustly got avows the taking, and both together make but one continued act of unrighteousness. To repent is to undo what we have done amiss, which (whatever we pretend) we cannot be said to do, till we restore what has been got by it, as Zaccheus, (Luke, 19. 8.) and make satisfaction for the wrong done. (2.) He must then come and offer his gift, must bring his trespass-offering to the Lord, whom he had offended; and the priest must make an atonement for him, v. 6, 7. This trespass-offering could not, of itself, make satisfaction for sin, or reconciliation between God and the sinner, but as it signified the atonement that was to be made by our Lord Jesus, when he should make his soul an offering for sin, a trespass-offering; it is the same word that is here used, Isa. 53. 10. The trespasses here mentioned are trespasses still against the law of Christ, which insists as much upon justice and truth as ever the law of nature or the law of Moses did: and though now we may have them pardoned without a trespass-offering, yet not without true repentance, restitution, reformation, and an humble faith in the righteousness of Christ; and if any make the more bold with their sins, because they are not now put to the expence of a trespass-offering for them, they turn the grace of God into wantonness, and so bring upon themselves a swift destruction. The Lord is the Avenger of all such, 1 Thess. 4. 6.

8. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 9. Command Aaron and his sons, saying, This is the law of the burnt-offering: It is the burnt-offering, because of the burning upon the altar all night unto the morning, and the fire of the altar shall be burning in it. 10. And the priest shall put on his linen garment, and his linen breeches shall he put upon his flesh, and take up the ashes which the fire hath consumed with the burnt-offering on the altar, and he shall put them beside the altar. 11. And he shall put off his garments, and put on other garments, and carry forth the ashes without the camp unto a clean place. 12. And the fire upon the altar shall be burning in it; it shall not be put out: and the priest shall burn wood on it every morning, and lay the burnt-offering in order upon it; and he shall burn thereon the fat of the peace-offering. 13. The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar; it shall never go out.

Hitherto, Moses had given the people instructions concerning the sacrifices; but here begin the instructions he was to give to the priests; he must command Aaron and his sons, v. 9. The priests were rulers in the house of God, but these rulers must be ruled; and they that had the command of others must themselves be commanded. Let ministers remember, that not only commissions, but commands, were given to Aaron and his sons, who must be in subjection to them.

In these verses we have the law of the burnt-offering, as far as it was the peculiar care of the priests. The daily sacrifice of a lamb, which was offered morning and evening for the whole congregation, is here chiefly referred to.

1. The priest must take care of the ashes of the burnt-offering, that they be decently disposed of, v. 10, 11. He must clear the altar of them every morning, and put them on the east-side of the altar, which was furthest from the sanctuary; this he must do in his linen garment, which he always wore when he did any service at the altar; and then he must shift himself, and put on other garments, either such as were his common wear, or (as some think) other priestly garments less honourable, and must carry the ashes into a clean place without the camp. Now, (1.) God would have this done, for the honour of his altar, and the sacrifices that were burnt upon it. Even the ashes of the sacrifice must be preserved, to testify the regard God had to it; by the burnt-offering he was honoured, and therefore thus it was honoured. And some think that this care, which was taken of the ashes of the sacrifice, typified the burial of our Saviour; his dead body (the ashes of his sacrifice) was carefully laid up in a garden, in a new sepulchre, which was a clean place. It was also requisite that the altar should be kept as clean as might be, the fire upon it would burn the better; and it is decent in a house to have a clean fire-side. (2.) God would have the priests themselves to keep it so, to teach them and us to stoop to the meanest services for the honour of God and of his altar. The priest himself must not only kindle the fire, but clean the hearth, and carry out the ashes. God's servants must think nothing below them but sin.

2. The priest must take care of the fire upon the altar, that that should be kept always burning. This is much insisted on here, (v. 9, 12.) and this express law is given, (v. 13.) The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar, it shall never go out. We may suppose that no day passed without some extraordinary sacrifices, which were always offered between the morning and evening lamb; so that from morning to night the fire on the altar was kept up of course. But to preserve it all night unto the morning, (v. 9.) required some care. Those that keep good houses, never let their kitchen-fire go out; therefore God would thus give an instance of his good house-keeping. The first fire upon the altar came from heaven, (ch. 9. 24.) so that by keeping that up continually with constant supply of fuel, all their sacrifices throughout all their generations might be said to be consumed with that fire from heaven, in token of God's acceptance. If, through carelessness, they should ever let it go out, they could not expect to have it so kindled again. Accordingly, the Jews tell us, That the fire never did go out upon the altar, till the captivity in Babylon. This is referred to, Isa. 31. 9. where God is said to have his fire in Zion, and his furnace in Jerusalem. By this law we are taught to keep up in our minds a constant disposition to all acts of piety and devotion, an habitual affection to divine things, so as to be always ready to every good word and work. We must not only not quench the Spirit, but we must stir up the gift that is in us. Though we be not always sacrificing, yet we must keep the fire of holy love always burning; and thus we must pray always.

14. And this is the law of the meat-offering: the sons of Aaron shall offer it before the LORD, before the altar. 15. And he shall take of it his handful, of the flour of the meat-offering, and of the oil thereof, and all the frankincense which is upon the meat-offering, and shall burn it upon the altar for a sweet savour, even the memorial of it, unto the LORD. 16. And the remainder thereof shall Aaron and his sons eat: with unleavened bread shall it be eaten in the holy place; in the court of the tabernacle of the congregation they shall eat it. 17. It shall not be baked with leaven.

I have given it unto them for their portion of my offerings made by fire; it is most holy, as is the sin-offering, and as the trespass-offering. 18. All the males among the children of Aaron shall eat of it. It shall be a statute for ever in your generations concerning the offerings of the LORD made by fire: Every one that toucheth them shall be holy. 19. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 20. This is the offering of Aaron and of his sons, which they shall offer unto the LORD in the day when he is anointed; the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour for a meat-offering perpetual, half of it in the morning, and half thereof at night. 21. In a pan it shall be made with oil; and when it is baked, thou shalt bring it in: and the baked pieces of the meat-offering shalt thou offer for a sweet savour unto the LORD. 22. And the priest of his sons that is anointed in his stead shall offer it: it is a statute for ever unto the LORD: it shall be wholly burnt. 23. For every meat-offering for the priest shall be wholly burnt: it shall not be eaten.

The meat-offering was either that which was offered by the people, or that by the priests at their consecration. Now,

1. As to the common meat-offering; only a handful of it was to be burnt upon the altar, all the rest was allowed to the priests for their food. The law of the burnt-offerings was such as imposed upon the priests a great deal of care and work, but allowed them little profit; for the flesh was wholly burnt, and the priests had nothing but the skin. But, to make them amends, the greatest part of the meat-offering was their own. The burning of a handful of it upon the altar, (v. 15.) was ordered before, ch. 2. 2, 9. Here the remainder of it is consigned to the priests, the servants of God's house; I have given it unto them for their portion of my offerings, v. 17. Note, (1.) It is the will of God that his ministers should be well provided for with food convenient; and what is given to them he accepts as offered to himself, if it be done with a single eye. (2.) All Christians, being spiritual priests, do themselves share in the spiritual sacrifices they offer. It is not God that is the Gainer by them; the handful burnt upon the altar was not worth speaking of, in comparison with the priest's share; we ourselves are the gainers by our religious services. Let God have all the frankincense, and the priests shall have the flour and the oil; what we give to God the praise and glory of, we may take to ourselves the comfort and benefit of.

The laws concerning the eating of it were, [1.] That it must be eaten unleavened, v. 16. What was offered to God must have no leaven in it, and the priests must have it as the altar had it, and no otherwise. Thus must we keep the feasts of the Lord with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth. [2.] It must be eaten in the court of the tabernacle, (here called the holy place,) in some room prepared by the side of the court for this purpose. It was a great crime to carry any of it out of the court. The very eating of it was a sacred rite by which they were to honour God; and therefore it must be done in a religious manner, and with a holy reverence, which was preserved by confining it to the holy place. [3.] The males only must eat of it, v. 18. Of the lesser holy things, as the first-fruits and tithes, and the shoulder and breasts of the peace-offerings, the daughters of the priests might eat, for they might be carried out of the court; but this was of the most holy things, which being to be eaten only in the tabernacle, the sons of Aaron only might eat of it. [4.] The priests only, that were clean, might eat of it; Every one that toucheth them shall be holy, v. 18. Holy things for holy persons. Some read it, Every thing that toucheth it shall be holy; all the furniture of the table on which these holy things were eaten, must be appropriated to that use only, and never after used as common things.

2. As to the consecration meat-offering, which was offered for the priests themselves, it was to be wholly burnt, and none of it eaten, v. 23. It comes in here as an exception to the foregoing law. It should seem that this law concerning the meat-offering of initiation did not only oblige the high priest to offer it, and on that day only that he was anointed, and so for his successors in the day they were anointed; but the Jewish writers say, that, by this law, every priest, on the day he first entered upon his ministry, was bound to offer this meat-offering; and that the high priest was bound to offer it every day of his life, from the day in which he was anointed; and that it was to be offered beside the meat-offering that attended the morning and evening sacrifice, because it is said here to be a meat-offering perpetual, v. 20. Josephus says, "The high priest sacrificed twice every day at his own charges, and this was his sacrifice." Note, Those whom God has advanced above others in dignity and power, ought to consider that he expects more from them than from others, and should take every intimation of service to be done for him. The meat-offering of the priest was to be baked as if it were to be eaten, and yet it must be wholly burnt. Though the priest that ministered was to be paid for serving the people, yet there was no reason that he should be paid for serving the high priest, who was the father of the family of the priests, and whom, therefore, any priest should take a pleasure in serving gratis. Nor was it fit that the priests should eat of the offerings of a priest; for as the sins of the people were typically transferred to the priests, which was signified by their eating of their offerings, (Hos. 4. 8.) so the sins of the priests must be typically transferred to the altar, which therefore must eat up all their offerings. We are all undone, both ministers and people, if we must bear our own iniquity; nor could we have had any comfort or hope, if God had not laid on his dear Son the iniquity of us all, and he is both the Priest and the Altar.

24. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 25. Speak unto Aaron and to his sons, saying, This is the law of the sin-offering: In the place where the burnt-offering is killed shall the sin-offering be killed before the LORD: it is most holy. 26. The priest that offereth it for sin shall eat it: in the holy place shall it be eaten, in the court of the tabernacle of the congregation. 27. Whatsoever shall touch the flesh thereof shall be holy; and when there is sprinkled of the blood thereof upon any garment, thou shalt wash that whereon it was sprinkled in the holy place. 28. But the earthen vessel wherein it is sodden shall be broken: and if it be sodden in a brazen pot, it shall be both scoured, and rinsed in water. 29. All the males among the priests shall eat thereof: it is most holy. 30. And no sin-offering, whereof any of the blood is brought into the tabernacle of the congregation to reconcile withal in the holy place, shall be eaten: it shall be burnt in the fire.

We have here so much of the law of the sin-offering as did peculiarly concern the priests that offered it. As, 1. That it must be killed, in the place where the burnt-offering was killed, (v. 25.) that was on the north side of the altar, (ch. 1. 11.) which some think typified the crucifying of Christ on mount Calvary, which was on the north side of Jerusalem. 2. That the priest who offered it for the sinner, was (with his sons, or other priests, v. 29.) to eat the flesh of it, after the blood and fat had been offered to God, in the court of the tabernacle, v. 26. Hereby they were to bear the iniquity of the congregation, as it is explained, ch. 10. 17. 3. The blood of the sin-offering was with great reverence to be washed out of the clothes on which it happened to light, (v. 27.) which signified the awful regard we ought to have to the blood of Christ, not counting it a common thing; that blood must be sprinkled on the conscience, not on the raiment. 4. The vessel in which the flesh of the sin offering was boiled, must be broken, if it were an earthen one; and, if a brazen one, well-washed, v. 28. This intimated, that the defilement was not wholly taken away by the offering, but did rather cleave to it, such was the weakness and deficiency of those sacrifices; but the blood of Christ thoroughly cleanses from all sin, and after it there needs no cleansing. 5. That all this must be understood of the common sin-offerings, not of those for the priest, or the body of the congregation, either occasional, or stated, upon the day of atonement: for it had been before ordained, and was now ratified, that if the blood of the offering was brought into the holy place, as it was in those extraordinary cases, the flesh was not to be eaten, but burnt without the camp, v. 30. Hence the apostle infers the advantage we have under the gospel, above what they had under the law; for though the blood of Christ was brought into the tabernacle, to reconcile within the holy place, yet we have a right by faith to eat of the altar, (Heb. 13. 10. . 12.) and so to take the comfort of the great Propitiation.

CHAP. VII.

Here is, I. The law of the trespass-offering, (v. 1. . 7.) with some further directions concerning the burnt-offering and the meat-offering, v. 8. . 10. II. The law of the peace-offering. The eating of it, (v. 11. . 21.) on which occasion the prohibition of eating fat or blood is repeated, (v. 22. . 27.) and the priest's share of it, v. 28. . 31. III. The conclusion of these institutions, v. 35. . 38.

1. LIKELIKE this is the law of the trespass-offering: it is most holy. 2. In the place where they kill the burnt-offering shall they kill the trespass-offering: and the blood thereof shall he sprinkle round about upon the altar. 3. And he shall offer of it all the fat thereof; the rump, and the fat that covereth the inwards, 4. And the two kidneys, and the fat that is on them, which is by the flanks, and the caul that is above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away: 5. And the priest shall burn them upon the altar for an offering made by fire unto the LORD: it is a trespass-offering. 6. Every male among the priests shall eat thereof: it shall be eaten in the holy place: it is most holy. 7. As the sin-offering is, so is the trespass-offering: there is one law for them: the priest that maketh atonement therewith shall have it. 8. And the priest that offereth any man's burnt-offering, even the priest shall have to himself the skin of the burnt-offering which he hath offered. 9. And all the meat-offering that is baked in the oven, and all that is dressed in the frying-pan, and in the pan, shall be the priest's that offereth it. 10. And every meat-offering, mingled with oil, and dry, shall all the sons of Aaron have, one as much as another.

Observe here,

1. Concerning the trespass-offering: that being much of the same nature with the sin-offering, it was to be governed by the same rules, v. 6. When the blood and fat were offered to God to make atonement, the priests were to eat the flesh, as that of the sin-offering, in the holy place. The Jews have a tradition (as we have it from the learned Bishop Patrick) concerning the sprinkling of the blood of the trespass-offering round about upon the altar, "That there was a scarlet line which went round about the altar exactly in the middle, and the blood of the burnt-offerings was sprinkled round about above the line, but that of the trespass-offerings and peace-offerings round about below the line." As to the flesh of the trespass-offering, the right to it belonged to the priest that offered it, v. 7. He that did the work must have the wages; this was an encouragement to the priests to give diligent attendance on the altar; the more ready and busy they were, the more they got. Note, The more diligent we are in the services of religion, the more we shall reap of the advantages of it. But any of the priests, and the males of their families, might be invited by him to whom it belonged to partake with him, v. 6. Every male among the priests shall eat thereof, that is, may eat thereof, in the holy place. And, no doubt, it was the usage to treat one another with those perquisites of their office, by which friendship and fellowship were kept up among the priests. Freely they had received, and must freely give. It seems the offerer was not himself to have any share of his trespass-offering, as he was to have of his peace-offering; but it was all divided between the altar and the priest. They offered peace-offerings in thankfulness for mercy, and then it was proper to feast; but they offered trespass-offerings in sorrow for sin, and then fasting was more proper, in token of holy mourning, and a resolution to abstain from sin.

2. Concerning the burnt-offering; it is here appointed that the priest that offered it should have the skin, (v. 8.) which, no doubt, he might make money of. "This" (the Jews say) "is meant only for the burnt-offerings which were offered by particular persons; for the profit of the skins of the daily burnt-offerings for the congregation went to the repair of the sanctuary." Some suggest, that this appointment will help us to understand God's clothing our first parents with coats of skins, Gen. 3. 21. It is probable that the beasts whose skins they were, were offered in sacrifice as whole burnt-offerings, and that Adam was the priest that offered them; and then God gave him the skins, as his fee, to make clothes of for himself and his wife, in remembrance of which, the skins ever after pertained to the priest; and see Gen. 27. 16.

3. Concerning the meat-offering: if it was dressed, it was fit to be eaten immediately; and therefore the priest that offered it was to have it, v. 9. If it was dry, there was not so much occasion for being in haste to use it; and therefore an equal dividend of it must be made among all the priests that were then in waiting, v. 10.

11. And this is the law of the sacrifice of peace-offerings, which he shall offer unto the LORD. 12. If he offer it for a thanksgiving, then he shall offer with the sacrifice of thanksgiving unleavened cakes mingled with oil, and unleavened wafers anointed with oil, and cakes mingled with oil, of fine flour, fried. 13. Besides the cakes, he shall offer for his offering leavened bread, with the sacrifice of thanksgiving of his peace-offerings. 14. And of it he shall offer one out of the whole oblation for an heave-offering unto the LORD, and it shall be the priest's that sprinkleth the blood of the peace-offerings. 15. And the flesh of the sacrifice of his peace-offerings for thanksgiving shall be eaten the same day that it is offered; he shall not leave any of it until the morning. 16. But if the sacrifice of his offering be a vow, or a voluntary offering, it shall be eaten the same day that he offereth his sacrifice: and on the morrow also the remainder of it shall be eaten: 17. But the remainder of the flesh of the sacrifice on the third day shall be burnt with fire. 18. And if any of the flesh of the sacrifice of his peace-offerings be eaten at all on the third day, it shall not be accepted, neither shall it be imputed unto him that offereth it: it shall be an abomination, and the soul that eateth of it shall bear his iniquity. 19. And the flesh that toucheth any unclean thing shall not be eaten; it shall be burnt with fire: and as for the flesh, all that be clean shall eat thereof. 20. But the soul that eateth of the flesh of the sacrifice of peace-offerings, that pertain unto the LORD, having his uncleanness upon him, even that soul shall be cut off from his people. 21. Moreover, the soul that shall touch any unclean thing, as the uncleanness of man, or any unclean beast, or any abominable unclean thing, and eat of the flesh of the sacrifice of peace-offerings, which pertain unto the LORD, even that soul shall be cut off from his people. 22. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 23. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, Ye shall eat no manner of fat, of ox, or of sheep, or of goat. 24. And the fat of the beast that dieth of itself, and the fat of that which is torn with beasts, may be used in any other use: but ye shall in no wise eat of it. 25. For whosoever eateth the fat of the beast, of which men offer an offering made by fire unto the LORD, even the soul that eateth it shall be cut off from his people. 26. Moreover, ye shall eat no manner of blood, whether it be of fowl, or of beast, in any of your dwellings. 27. Whatsoever soul it be that eateth any manner of blood, even that soul shall be cut off from his people. 28. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 29. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, He that offereth the sacrifice of his peace-offerings unto the LORD shall bring his oblation unto the LORD of the sacrifice of his peace-offerings. 30. His own hands shall bring the offerings of the LORD made by fire, the fat with the breast, it shall he bring, that the breast may be waved for a wave-offering before the LORD. 31. And the priest shall burn the fat upon the altar: but the breast shall be Aaron's and his sons'. 32. And the right shoulder shall ye give unto the priest for an heave-offering of the sacrifices of your peace-offerings. 33. He among the sons of Aaron, that offereth the blood of the peace-offerings, and the fat shall have the right shoulder for his part. 34. For the wave-breast and the heave-shoulder have taken of the children of Israel, from off the sacrifice of their peace-offerings, and have given them unto Aaron the priest, and unto his sons, by a statute for ever, from among the children of Israel.

All this relates to the peace-offerings: it is the repetition and explication of what we had before, with divers additions.

I. The nature and intention of the peace-offerings are here more distinctly opened. They were offered, either, 1. In thankfulness for some special mercy received, such as recovery from sickness, preservation in a journey, deliverance at sea, redemption out of captivity, all which are specified in Ps. 107. and for them men are called upon to offer the sacrifice of thanksgiving, v. 22. Or, 2. In performance of some vow, which a man made when he was in distress, (v. 16.) and this was less honourable than the former, though the omission of it would have been more culpable. Or, 3. In supplication for some special mercy which a man was in the pursuit and expectation of, here called a voluntary offering. This accompanied a man's prayers, as the former did his praises. We do not find that men were bound by the law, unless they had bound themselves by vow, to offer these peace-offerings, upon such occasions as those on which they were to bring their sacrifices of atonement, in case of sin committed. Not but that prayer and praise are as much our duty as repentance is; but here, in the expressions of their sense of mercy, God left them more to their liberty, than in the expressions of their sense of sin—to try the generosity of their devotion, and that their sacrifices, being free-will offerings, might be the more laudable and acceptable; and, by obliging them to bring the sacrifices of atonement, God will shew the necessity of the great Propitiation.

II. The rites and ceremonies about the peace-offerings are enlarged upon.

1. If it was offered for a thanksgiving, a meat-offering must be offered with it, cakes of several sorts, and wafers, (v. 12.) and (which was peculiar to the peace-offerings) leavened bread must be offered, not to be burnt upon the altar, that was forbidden, (ch. 2. 11.) but to be eaten with the flesh of the sacrifice, that nothing might be wanting to make it a complete and pleasant feast; for unleavened bread was less grateful to the taste; and therefore, though enjoined in the passover for a particular reason, yet in other festivals, leavened bread, which was lighter and more pleasant, was appointed, that men might feast at God's table as well as at their own. And some think that a meat-offering is required to be brought with every peace-offering, as well as with that of thanksgiving, by that law here, (v. 29.) which requires an oblation with it, that the table might be as well-furnished as the altar.

2. The flesh of the peace-offerings, both that which was the priest's share, and that which was the offerer's, must be eaten quickly, and not kept long, either raw or dressed, cold. If it was a peace-offering for thanksgiving, it must be all eaten the same day; (v. 15.) if a vow, or voluntary offering, it must be eaten either the same day or the day after, v. 16. If any was left beyond the time limited, it was to be burnt; (v. 17.) and if any person ate of it, it should be animadverted upon as a very high misdemeanor, v. 18. Though they were not obliged to eat it in the holy place as those offerings that are called most holy, but might take it to their own tents, and feast upon it there, yet God would by this law make them to know a difference between that and other meat, and religiously to observe it: that whereas they might keep other meat cold in the house as long as they thought fit, and warm it again if they pleased, and eat it three or four days after, they might not do so with the flesh of their peace-offerings; that must be eaten immediately. (1.) Because God would not have that holy flesh to be in danger of putrefying, or being fly-blown; to prevent which, it must be salted with fire, (as the expression is, Mark, 9. 49.) if it were kept; as, if it was used, it must be salted with salt. (2.) Because God would not have his people to be niggardly and sparing, and distrustful of providence, but cheerfully to enjoy what God gives them, (Ecc. 8. 15.) and to do good with it, and not to be anxiously solicitous for the morrow.

(3.) The flesh of the peace-offerings was God's treat, and therefore God would have the disposal of it; and he orders it to be used generously for the entertainment of their friends and charitably for the relief of the poor; to shew that he is a bountiful Benefactor, giving us all things richly to enjoy, the bread of the day in its day. If the sacrifice was a thanksgiving, they were especially obliged thus to testify their holy joy in God's goodness by their holy feasting. This law is made very strict, (v. 18.) that if the offerer did not take care to have all his offering eaten by himself, or his family, his friends, or the poor, within the time limited by the law; and if, in the event of any part being left, he should burn it, (which was the most decent way of disposing of it, the sacrifices upon the altar being consumed by fire;) then his offering should not be accepted, nor imputed to him. Note, All the benefit of our religious services is lost, if we do not improve them, and manage ourselves aright afterward. They are not acceptable to God, if they have not a due influence upon ourselves. If a man seemed generous in bringing a peace-offering, and yet afterward proved sneaking and paltry in the using of it, it was as if he had never brought it; nay, it shall be an abomination. Note, There is no mean between God's acceptance and his abhorrence. If our persons and performances are sincere and upright, they are accepted; if not, they are an abomination, Prov. 15. 8. He that eats it after the time appointed, shall bear his iniquity, that is, he shall be cut off from his people, as it is explained, (ch. 19. 8.) where this law is repeated. This law of eating the peace-offerings before the third day, that they might not putrefy, is applicable to the resurrection of Christ after two days, that, being God's Holy One, he might not see corruption, Ps. 16. 10. And some think that it instructs us speedily, and without delay, to partake of Christ and his grace; feeding and feasting thereupon by faith, to day, while it is called to day, (Heb. 3. 13, 14.) for it will be too late shortly.

3. Both the flesh and those that eat it must be pure. (1.) The flesh must touch no unclean thing; if it did, it must not be eaten, but burnt, v. 19. If, in carrying it from the altar to the place where it was eaten, a dog touched it, or it touched a dead body or any other unclean thing, it was then unfit to be used in a religious feast. Every thing we honour the holy God with must be pure, and carefully kept from all pollution. It is a case adjudged, (Hag. 2. 12.) that the holy flesh could not by its touch communicate holiness to what was common; but by this law it is determined, that, by the touch of that which was unclean, it received pollution from it; which intimates that the infection of sin is more easily and more frequently communicated, than the savour of grace. (2.) It must not be eaten by any unclean person. When a person was upon any account ceremonially unclean, it was at his peril, if he presumed to eat of the flesh of the peace-offerings, v. 20, 21. Holy things are only for holy persons; the holiness of the food being ceremonial, those were incapacitated to partake of it who lay under any ceremonial uncleanness; but we are hereby taught to preserve ourselves pure from all the pollutions of sin, that we may have the benefit and comfort of Christ's sacrifice, 1 Pet. 2. 1, 2. Our consciences must be purged from dead works, that we may be fit to serve the living God, Heb. 9. 14. But if any dare to partake of the table of the Lord, under the pollution of sin unrepented of, and so profane sacred things, they eat and drink judgment to themselves, as those did that ate of the peace-offerings in their uncleanness, 1 Cor. 11. 29. A good reason for the strictness of this law is intimated in the description given of the peace-offerings, (v. 20.) and again, (v. 21.) that they pertain unto the Lord: whatever pertains to the Lord, is sacred, and must be used with great reverence, and not with unhallowed hands. "Be ye holy, for God is holy, and ye pertain to him."

4. The eating of blood and the fat of the inwards is here again prohibited; and the prohibition is annexed as before to the law of the peace-offerings, ch. 3. 17. (1.) The prohibition of the fat seems to be confined to those beasts which were used for sacrifice, the beeves, sheep, and goats; but of the roe-buck, the hart, and other clean beasts, they might eat the fat; for those only, of which offerings were brought, are mentioned here, v. 23. . 25. This was to preserve in their minds a reverence for God's altar, on which the fat of the inwards was burned. The Jews say, "If a man eat so much as an olive of forbidden fat—if he do it presumptuously, he is in danger of being cut off by the hand of God—if ignorantly, he is to bring a sin-offering, and so to pay dear for his carelessness." To eat of the flesh of that which died of itself, or was torn of beasts, was unlawful; but to eat of the fat of such was doubly unlawful, v. 24. (2.) The prohibition of blood is more general, (v. 26, 27.) because the fat was offered to God only by way of acknowledgment; but the blood made atonement for the soul, and so typified Christ's sacrifice much more than the burning of the fat did; to this, therefore, a greater reverence must be paid, till these types had their accomplishment in the offering up of the body of Christ once for all. The Jews rightly expound this law, as forbidding only the blood of the life, as they express it, not that which we call the gravy, for of that they supposed it was lawful to eat.

5. The priest's share of the peace-offerings is here cut out for himself; out of every beast that was offered for a peace-offering, the priest that offered it was to have to himself the breast and the right shoulder, v. 30. . 31. Observe here, (1.) That when the sacrifice was killed, the offerer himself must, with his own hands, present God's part of it, that he might signify thereby his cheerful giving it up to God, and his desire that it might be accepted. He was with his own hands to lift it up, in token of his regard to God as the God of heaven; and then to wave it to and fro, in token of his regard to God, as the Lord of the whole earth; to whom thus, as far as he could reach, he offered it, shewing his readiness and wish to do him honour. Now, that which was thus heaved and waved, was the fat, and the breast, and the right shoulder, it was all offered to God; and then he ordered the fat to his altar, and the breast and shoulder to his priest, both being his receivers. (2.) That, when the fat was burnt, the priest took his part, on which he and his family were to feast, as well as the offerer and his family. In holy joy and thanksgiving, it is good to have our ministers to go before us, and to be our mouth to God. The melody is then sweet, when he that sows and they that reap rejoice together. Some observe a significance in the parts assigned to the priests: the breast and the shoulder intimate the affections and the actions, which must be devoted to the honour of God by all his people, and to the service also of the church by all his priests. Christ, our great Peace-offering, feasts all his spiritual priests with the breast and shoulder, with the dearest love, and the sweetest and strongest supports; for he is the Wisdom of God, and the Power of God. When Saul was designed for a king, Samuel ordered the shoulder of the peace-offering to be set before him, (1 Sam. 9. 24.) which gave him a hint of something great and sacred intended him. Jesus Christ is our great Peace-offering; for he made himself a Sacrifice not only to atone for sin, and to save us from the curse, but to purchase a blessing for us, and all good. By our joyful partaking of the benefits of redemption, we feast upon the sacrifice; to signify which, the Lord's supper was instituted.

35. This is the portion of the anointing of Aaron, and of the anointing of his sons, out of the offerings of the LORD made by fire, in the day when he presented them to minister unto the LORD in the priest's office; 36. Which the LORD commanded to be given them of the children of Israel, in the day that he anointed them, by a statute for ever throughout their generations. 37. This is the law of the burnt-offering, of the meat-offering, and of the sin-offering, and of the trespass-offering, and of the consecrations, and of the sacrifice of the peace-offerings; 38. Which the LORD commanded Moses in mount Sinai, in the day that he commanded the children of Israel to offer their oblations unto the LORD, in the wilderness of Sinai.

Here is the conclusion of these laws concerning the sacrifices, though some of them are afterward repeated and explained. They are to be considered, 1. As a grant to the priests, v. 35, 36. In the day they were ordained to that work and office, this provision was made for their comfortable maintenance. Note, God will take care that those who are employed for him be well paid and well provided for. They that receive the anointing of the Spirit, to minister unto the Lord, shall have their portion, and it shall be a worthy portion, out of the offerings of the Lord; for God's work is its own wages, and there is a present reward of obedience in obedience. 2. As a statute for ever to the people, that they should bring these offerings according to the rules prescribed, and cheerfully give the priests their share out of them. God commanded the children of Israel to offer their oblations, v. 38. Note, The solemn acts of religious worship are commanded. They are not the things that we are left to our liberty in, and which we may do or not do at our pleasure; but we are under indispensable obligations to perform them in their season; and it is at our peril, if we omit them. The observance of the laws of Christ cannot be less necessary than the observance of the laws of Moses was.

CHAP. VIII.

This chapter gives us an account of the solemn consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priest's office. I. It was done publicly, and the congregation was called together to be witnesses of it, v. 1. . A. II. It was done exactly according to God's appointment, v. 5. 1. They were washed and dressed, v. 1. . 9, 13 2. The tabernacle and the utensils of it were anointed, and then the priests, v. 10. . 12. 3. A sin-offering was offered for them, v. 14. . 17. 4. A burnt-offering, v. 18. . 21. 5. The ram of consecration, v. 22. . 30. 6. The continuance of this solemnity for seven days, v. 31. . 36.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Take Aaron and his sons with him, and the garments, and the anointing oil, and a bullock for the sin-offering, and two rams, and a basket of unleavened bread; 3. And gather thou all the congregation together unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 4. And Moses did as the LORD commanded him; and the assembly was gathered together unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 5. And Moses said unto the congregation, This is the thing which the LORD commanded to be done. 6. And Moses brought Aaron and his sons, and washed them with water. 7. And he put upon him the coat, and girded him with the girdle, and clothed him with the robe, and put the ephod upon him, and he girded him with the curious girdle of the ephod, and bound it unto him therewith. 8. And he put the breast-plate upon him: also he put in the breast-plate the Urim and the Thummim. 9. And he put the mitre upon his head; also upon the mitre, even upon his forefront, did he put the golden plate, the holy crown; as the LORD commanded Moses. 10. And Moses took the anointing oil, and anointed the tabernacle and all that was therein, and sanctified them. 11. And he sprinkled thereof upon the altar seven times, and anointed the altar and all his vessels, both the laver and his foot, to sanctify them. 12. And he poured of the anointing oil upon Aaron's head, and anointed him, to sanctify him. 13. And Moses brought Aaron's sons, and put coats upon them, and girded them with girdles, and put bonnets upon them; as the LORD commanded Moses.

God had given Moses orders to consecrate Aaron and his sons to the priest's office, when he was with him the first time upon mount Sinai; (Exod. 28, and 29.) where we have also the particular instructions he had how to do it. Now here we have,

I. The orders repeated; what was there commanded to be done, is here commanded to be done now, v. 2, 3. The tabernacle was newly set up, which, without the priests, would be as a candlestick without a candle; the law concerning sacrifices was newly given, but could not be observed without priests; for though Aaron and his sons had been nominated to the office, they could not officiate till they were consecrated; which yet must not be done till the place of their ministration was prepared, and the ordinances instituted, that they might apply themselves to work as soon as ever they were consecrated, and might know that they were ordained, not only to the honour and profit, but to the business of the priesthood. Aaron and his sons were near relations to Moses, and therefore he would not consecrate them till he had further orders, lest he should seem too forward to bring honour into his family.

II. The congregation called together at the door, that is, in the court of the tabernacle, v. 4. The elders and principal men of the congregation, who represented the body of the people, were summoned to attend; for the court would hold but a few of the many thousands of Israel. It was done thus publicly, 1. Because it was a solemn transaction between God and Israel; the priests were to be ordained for men in things pertaining to God, for the maintaining of a settled correspondence, and the negotiating of all affairs between the people and God; and therefore it was fit that both sides should appear to own the appointment at the door of the tabernacle of meeting. 2. The spectators of the solemnity could not but be possessed, by the sight of it, with a great veneration for the priests and their office, which was necessary among a people so wretchedly prone as these were to envy and discontent. It was strange, that any of those who were witnesses of what was here done, should afterward say, as some of them did, Ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi; but what would they have said, if it had been done clandestinely? Note, It is very fit, and of good use, that ministers should be ordained publicly, plebe presente—in the presence of the common people, according to the usage of the primitive church.

III. The commission read, v. 5. Moses, who was God's representative in this solemnity, produced his orders before the congregation, This is the thing which the Lord commanded to be done. Though God had crowned him king in Jeshurun, when he made his face to shine in the sight of all Israel; yet he did not institute or appoint any thing in God's worship, but what God himself had commanded. The priesthood he delivered to them, was that which he had received from the Lord. Note, All that minister about holy things, must have an eye to God's command, as their rule and warrant; for it is only in the observance of that, that they can expect to be owned and accepted of God. Thus we must be able to say, in all acts of religious worship, This is the thing which the Lord commanded to be done.

IV. The ceremony performed according to the divine ritual. 1. Aaron and his sons were washed with water, (v. 6.) to signify that they ought now to purify themselves from all sinful dispositions and inclinations, and ever after to keep themselves pure. Christ washes those from their sins in his own blood, whom he makes to our God kings and priests; (Rev. 1. 5, 6.) and those that draw near to God must be washed in pure water, Heb. 10. 22. Though they were ever so clean before, and no filth was to be seen upon them, yet they must be washed, to signify their purification from sin, with which their souls were polluted, how clean soever their bodies were. 2. They were clothed with the holy garments: Aaron with his, (v. 7. .9.) which typified the dignity of Christ our great High Priest; and his sons with their's, (v. 13.) which typified the decency of Christians, who are spiritual priests. Christ wears the breast-plate of judgment, and the holy crown; for the church's High Priest is her Prophet and King. All believers are clothed with the robe of righteousness, and girt with the girdle of truth, resolution, and close application; and their heads are bound, as the word here is, with the bonnet or diadem of beauty, the beauty of holiness. 3. The high priest was anointed, and, it should seem, the holy things were anointed at the same time; some think that they were anointed before, but that it is mentioned here, because Aaron was anointed with the same oil that they were anointed with; but the manner of relating it here makes it more probable that it was done at the same time, and that the seven days employed in consecrating the altar were coincident with the seven days of the priests' consecration. The tabernacle, and all its utensils, had some of the anointing oil put upon them with Moses's finger, (v. 10.) so had the altar; (v. 11.) these were to sanctify the gold and the gift, (Matth. 23. 17. .19.) and therefore must themselves be thus sanctified; but he poured it out more plentifully upon the head of Aaron, (v. 12.) so that it ran down to the skirts of his garments, because his unction was to typify the anointing of Christ with the Spirit, which was not given in measure to him. Yet all believers also have received the anointing, which puts an indelible character upon them, 1 John, 2. 27.

14. And he brought the bullock for the sin offering: and Aaron and his sons laid their hands upon the head of the bullock for the sin-offering. 15. And he slew it; and Moses took the blood, and put it upon the horns of the altar round about with his finger, and purified the altar, and poured the blood at the bottom of the altar, and sanctified it, to make reconciliation upon it. 16. And he took all the fat that was upon the inwards, and the caul above the liver, and the two kidneys, and their fat, and Moses burned it upon the altar. 17. But the bullock and his hide, his flesh, and his dung, he burnt with fire without the camp; as the LORD commanded Moses. 18. And he brought the ram for the burnt-offering: and Aaron and his sons laid their hands upon the head of the ram. 19. And he killed it; and Moses sprinkled the blood upon the altar round about. 20. And he cut the ram into pieces: and Moses burnt the head, and the pieces, and the fat. 21. And he washed the inwards and the legs in water; and Moses burnt the whole ram upon the altar: it was a burnt sacrifice for a sweet savour, and an offering made by fire unto the LORD; as the LORD commanded Moses. 22. And he brought the other ram, the ram of consecration: and Aaron and his sons laid their hands upon the head of the ram. 23. And he slew it; and Moses took of the blood of it, and put it upon the tip of Aaron's right ear, and upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of his right foot. 24. And he brought Aaron's sons, and Moses put of the blood upon the tip of their right ear, and upon the thumbs of their right hands, and upon the great toes of their right feet: and Moses sprinkled the blood upon the altar round about. 25. And he took the fat, and the rump, and all the fat that was upon the inwards, and the caul above the liver, and the two kidneys, and their fat, and the right shoulder: 26. And out of the basket of unleavened bread, that was before the LORD, he took one unleavened cake, and a cake of oiled bread, and one wafer, and put them on the fat, and upon the right shoulder: 27. And he put all upon Aaron's hands, and upon his sons' hands, and waved them for a wave-offering before the LORD. 28. And Moses took them from off their hands, and burnt them on the altar upon the burnt-offering; they were consecrations for a sweet savour: it is an offering made by fire unto the LORD. 29. And Moses took the breast, and waved it for a wave-offering before the LORD; for of the ram of consecration it was Moses' part; as the LORD commanded Moses. 30. And Moses took of the anointing oil, and of the blood which was upon the altar, and sprinkled it upon Aaron, and upon his garments, and upon his sons, and upon his sons' garments with him; and sanctified Aaron, and his garments, and his sons, and his sons' garments with him.

The covenant of priesthood must be made by sacrifice, as well as other covenants, Ps. 50. 5. And thus Christ was consecrated by the sacrifice of himself, once for all. Sacrifices of each kind must be offered for the priests, that they might with the more tenderness and concern offer the gifts and sacrifices of the people, with compassion on the ignorant, and on them that were out of the way, not insulting over those for whom sacrifices were offered, remembering that they themselves had had sacrifices offered for them, being compassed with infirmity.

1. A bullock, the largest sacrifice, was offered for a sin-offering, (v. 14.) that hereby atonement might be made, and they might not bring any of the guilt of the sins of their former state into the new character they were now to put on. When Isaiah was sent to be a prophet, he was told to his comfort, Thine iniquity is taken away, Isa. 6. 7. Ministers, that are to declare the remission of sins to others, should give diligence to get it made sure to themselves in the first place, that their own sins are pardoned. Those to whom is committed the ministry of reconciliation, must first be reconciled to God themselves, that they may deal for the souls of others as for their own.

2. A ram was offered for a burnt-offering, v. 18. 21. By this they gave to God the glory of this great honour which was now put upon them, and returned him praise for it, as Paul thanked Christ Jesus for putting him into the ministry, 1 Tim. 1. 12. They also signified the devoting of themselves and all their services to the honour of God.

3. Another ram, called the ram of consecration, was offered for a peace-offering, v. 22, &c. The blood of it was part put on the priests, on their ears, thumbs, and toes, and part sprinkled upon the altar; and thus he did (as it were) marry them to the altar, which they must all their days give attendance upon. All the ceremonies about this offering, as those before, were appointed by the express command of God; and, if we compare this chapter with Exod. 29. we shall find that the performance of the solemnity exactly agrees with the precept there, and in nothing varies. Here therefore, as in the account we had of the tabernacle and its vessels, it is again and again repeated, As the Lord commanded Moses. And thus Christ, when he sanctified himself with his own blood, had an eye to his Father's will in it, As the Father gave me commandment, so I do, John, 14. 31.—10. 18.—6. 38

31. And Moses said unto Aaron and to his sons, Boil the flesh at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: and there eat it with the bread that is in the basket of consecrations, as I commanded, saying, Aaron and his sons shall eat it. 32. And that which remaineth of the flesh and of the bread shall ye burn with fire. 33. And ye shall not go out of the door of the tabernacle of the congregation in seven days, until the days of your consecration be at an end: for seven days shall he consecrate you. 34. As he hath done this day, so the LORD hath commanded to do, to make an atonement for you. 35. Therefore shall ye abide at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation day and night seven days, and keep the charge of the LORD, that ye die not: for so I am commanded. 36. So Aaron and his sons did all things which the LORD commanded by the hand of Moses.

Moses, having done his part of the ceremony, now leaves Aaron and his sons to do their's.

I. They must boil the flesh of their peace-offering, and eat it in the court of the tabernacle, and what remained they must burn with fire, v. 31, 32. This signified their thankful consent to the consecration: when God gave Ezekiel his commission, he bid him eat the roll, Ezek. 3. 1, 2.

II. They must not stir out of the court of the tabernacle for seven days, v. 33. The priesthood being a good warfare, they must thus learn to endure hardness, and to disentangle themselves from the affairs of this life, 2 Tim. 2. 3, 4. Being consecrated to their service, they must give themselves wholly to it, and attend continually to this very thing. Thus Christ's apostles were appointed to wait for the promise of the Father, Acts, 1. 4. During this time appointed for their consecration, they were daily to repeat the same sacrifices which were offered the first day, v. 34. This shews the imperfection of the legal sacrifices, which, because they could not take away sin, were often repeated, (Heb. 10. 1, 2.) but were here repeated seven times, (a number of perfection,) because they typified that one offering, which perfected for ever them that were sanctified. The work lasted seven days; for it was a kind of creation: and this time was appointed in honour of the sabbath, which, probably, was the last day of the seven; for which they were to prepare during the six days. Thus the time of our life, like the six days, must be our preparation for the perfection of our consecration to God in the everlasting sabbath; they attended day and night, (v. 35.) and so constant should we be in our meditation on God's law, Ps. 1. 2. They attended to keep the charge of the Lord; we have every one of us a charge to keep, an eternal God to glorify, an immortal soul to provide for, needful duty to be done, our generation to serve; and it must be our daily care to keep this charge, for it is the charge of the Lord our Master, who will shortly call us to an account about it, and it is at our utmost peril if we neglect it. Keep it, that ye die not; it is death, eternal death, to betray the trust we are charged with; by the consideration of this we must be kept in awe. Lastly, We are told (v. 36.) that Aaron and his sons did all that was commanded. Thus their consecration was completed; and thus they set an example, before the people, of an exact obedience to the laws of sacrifices now newly given, and then they could with the better grace teach them.

Thus the covenant of peace, (Numb. 25. 12.) of life and peace,

(Mal. 2. 5.) was made with Aaron and his sons: but, after all the ceremonies that were used in their consecration, there was one point of ratification which was reserved to be the honour and establishment of Christ's priesthood, which was this, that they were made priests without an oath, but Christ with an oath, (Heb. 7. 21.) for neither such priests nor their priesthood could continue, but Christ's is a perpetual and unchangeable priesthood.

Gospel-ministers are compared to them who served at the altar, for they minister about holy things, (1 Cor. 9. 13.) they are God's mouth to the people, and the people's to God, the pastors and teachers Christ has appointed to continue in the church to the end of the world: they seem to be meant in that promise which points at gospel-times, (Isa. 66. 21.) I will take of them for priests and for Levites. No man may take this honour to himself, but he who upon trial is found to be clothed and anointed by the Spirit of God with gifts and graces to qualify him for it; and who with purpose of heart devotes himself entirely to the service; and is then by the word and prayer, (for so every thing is sanctified,) and the imposition of the hands of those that give themselves to the word and prayer, set apart to the office, and recommended to Christ as a servant, and to the church as a steward and guide. And they that are thus solemnly dedicated to God, ought not to depart from his service, but faithfully to abide in it all their days; and they that do so, and continue labouring in the word and doctrine, are to be accounted worthy of double honour, double to that of the Old-Testament priests.

CHAP. IX.

Aaron and his sons, having been solemnly consecrated to the priesthood, are in this chapter entering upon the execution of their office, the very next day after their consecration was completed. I. Moses (no doubt by direction from God) appoints a meeting between God and his priests, as the representatives of his people, ordering them to attend him, and assuring them that he would appear to them, v. 1. 7. II. The meeting is held according to the appointment. 1. Aaron attends on God by sacrifice, offering a sin-offering and a burnt-offering for himself, (v. 8. 11.) and then the offerings for the people, whom he blessed in the name of the Lord, v. 15. 22. 2. God signifies his acceptance, (1.) Of their persons, by shewing them his glory, v. 23. (2.) Of their sacrifices, by consuming them with fire from heaven, v. 24.

1. AND it came to pass on the eighth day, that Moses called Aaron and his sons, and the elders of Israel; 2. And he said unto Aaron, Take thee a young calf for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering, without blemish, and offer them before the LORD. 3. And unto the children of Israel thou shalt speak, saying, Take ye a kid of the goats for a sin-offering; and a calf and a lamb, both of the first year, without blemish, for a burnt-offering; 4. Also a bullock and a ram for peace-offerings, to sacrifice before the LORD; and a meat-offering mingled with oil: for to-day the LORD will appear unto you. 5. And they brought that which Moses commanded, before the tabernacle of the congregation: and all the congregation drew near and stood before the LORD. 6. And Moses said, This is the thing which the LORD commanded that ye should do: and the glory of the LORD shall appear unto you. 7. And Moses said unto Aaron, Go unto the altar, and offer thy sin-offering, and thy burnt-offering, and make an atonement for thyself, and for the people: and offer the offering of the people, and make an atonement for them; as the LORD commanded.

Orders are here given for another solemnity upon the eighth day; for the newly-ordained priests were set to work immediately after the days of their consecration were finished, to let them know that they were not ordained to be idle: He that desires the office of a bishop, desires a good work, which must be looked at with desire, more than the honour and benefit. The priests had not so much as one day's respite from service allowed them, that they might divert themselves, and receive the compliments of their friends upon their elevation, but were busily employed the very next day after; for their consecration was the filling of their hands. God's spiritual priests have constant work cut out for them, which the duty of every day requires; and they that would give up their account with joy must redeem time; see Ezek. 43. 26, 27.

Now, 1. Moses raises their expectation of a glorious appearance of God to them this day; (v. 4.) "To-day the Lord will appear to you, that are the priests." And when all the congregation are gathered together, and stand before the Lord, he tells them, (v. 6.) The glory of the Lord shall appear to you. Though they had reason enough to believe God's acceptance of all that which they had done according to his appointment, upon the general assurance we have, that he is the Rewarder of them that diligently seek him, (notwithstanding he had not given them any sensible token of it,) yet, that if possible they and their's might be effectually obliged to the service and worship of God, and might never turn aside to idols, the glory of God appeared to them, and visibly owned what they had done. We are not now to expect such appearances; we Christians walk more by faith, and less by sight, than they did. But we may be sure that God does draw nigh to those who draw nigh to him, and that the offerings of faith are really acceptable to him; though, the sacrifices being spiritual, the tokens of the acceptance are, as it is fit they should be, spiritual likewise. To them who are duly consecrated to God he will undoubtedly manifest himself.

2. He put both priests and people upon preparing to receive this favour which God designed them. Aaron and his sons, and the elders of Israel, are all summoned to attend, v. 1. Note, God will manifest himself in the solemn assemblies of his people and ministers; and those that would have the benefit and comfort of God's appearances, must in them give their attendance.

(1.) Aaron is ordered to prepare his offerings; (v. 2.) A young calf for a sin-offering. The Jewish writers suggest, that a calf was appointed for a sin-offering, to remind him of his sin in making the golden calf, by which he had rendered himself for ever unworthy of the honour of the priesthood, and which he had reason to reflect upon with sorrow and shame, in all the atonements he made.

(2.) Aaron must direct the people to get their's ready. Hitherto Moses had told the people what they must do; but now Aaron, as high priest over the house of God, must be their teacher in things pertaining to God; (v. 3.) Unto the children of Israel thou shalt speak. Now that he was to speak from them to God in the sacrifices, (the language of which he that appointed them very well understood,) he must speak from God to them in the laws about the sacrifices. Thus Moses would engage the people's respect and obedience to him, as one that was set over them in the Lord, to admonish them.

(3.) Aaron must offer his own first, and then the people's, v. 7. Aaron must now go to the altar, Moses having shewed him the way to it; and there, [1.] He must make an atonement for himself; for the high priest, being compassed with infirmity, ought, as for the people, so also for himself, to offer for sins, (Heb. 5. 2, 3.) and for himself first; for how can we expect to be accepted in our prayers for others, if we ourselves be not reconciled to God? Nor is any service pleasing to God, till the guilt of sin be removed by our interest in the great Propitiation. Those that have the care of the souls of others, are also hereby taught to look to their own in the first place; this charity must begin at home, though it must not end there. It is the charge to Timothy, to take care to save himself first, and then those that heard him, 1 Tim. 4. 16. The high priest made atonement for himself, as one that was joined with sinners; but we have a High Priest that was separated from sinners, and needed it not; when Messiah the Prince was cut off as a sacrifice, it was not for himself; for he knew no sin. [2.] He must make an atonement for the people, by offering their sacrifices. Now that he was made a high priest, he must lay to heart the concerns of the people, and this as their great concern, their reconciliation to God, and the putting away of sin which had separated between them and God. He must make atonement as the Lord commanded. See here the wonderful condescension of the mercy of God, that he not only allows an atonement to be made, but commands it; not only admits, but requires us to be reconciled to him. No room therefore is left to doubt, but that the atonement which is commanded will be accepted.

8. Aaron therefore went unto the altar, and slew the calf of the sin-offering, which was for himself. 9. And the sons of Aaron brought the blood unto him; and he dipped his finger in the blood, and put it upon the horns of the altar, and poured out the blood at the bottom of the altar. 10. But the fat, and the kidneys, and the caul above the liver of the sin-offering, he burnt upon the altar; as the LORD commanded Moses. 11. And the flesh and the hide he burnt with fire without the camp. 12. And he slew the burnt-offering; and Aaron's sons presented unto him the blood, which he sprinkled round about upon the altar. 13. And they presented the burnt-offering unto him, with the pieces thereof, and the head, and he burnt them upon the altar. 14. And he did wash the inwards and the legs, and burnt them upon the burnt-offering on the altar. 15. And he brought the people's offering, and took the goat, which was the sin-offering for the people, and slew it, and offered it for sin, as the first. 16. And he brought the burnt-offering, and offered it according to the manner. 17. And he brought the meat-offering, and took a handful thereof, and burnt it upon the altar, beside the burnt-sacrifice of the morning. 18. He slew also the bullock and the ram for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, which was for the people: and Aaron's sons presented unto him the blood, which he sprinkled upon the altar round about, 19. And the fat of the bullock and of the ram, the rump, and that which covereth the inwards, and the kidneys, and the caul above the liver: 20. And they put the fat upon the breasts, and he burnt the fat upon the altar: 21. And the breasts and the right shoulder Aaron waved for a wave-offering before the LORD; as Moses commanded. 22. And Aaron lifted up his hand toward the people, and blessed them, and came down from offering of the sin-offering, and the burnt-offering, and peace-offerings.

These being the first offerings that ever were offered by the levitical priesthood, according to the newly-enacted law of sacrifices, the manner of offering them is particularly related, that it might appear how exactly they agreed with the institution. 1. Aaron with his own hands slew the offering, (v. 8.) and did the work of the inferior priests; for, great as he was, he must not think any service below him which he could do for the honour of God: and as Moses had shewed him how to do this work decently and decorously, so he shewed his sons, that they might do likewise; for that is the best way of teaching; and thus parents should instruct their children by example. Therefore as Moses before, so Aaron now, offered some of each of the several sorts of sacrifices that were appointed, whose rites differed, that they might be thoroughly furnished for every good work. 2. He offered these beside the burnt-sacrifice of the morning, which was every day offered first, v. 17. Note, Our accustomed devotions morning and evening, alone, and in our families, must not be omitted upon any pretence whatsoever, no, not when extraordinary services are to be performed; whatever is added, those must not be diminished. 3. It is not clear, whether, when it is said that he burnt such and such parts of the sacrifices upon the altar, (v. 10. . 20.) the meaning is that he burnt them immediately with ordinary fire, as formerly, or that he laid them upon the altar ready to be burnt with the fire from heaven, which they expected; (v. 24.) or whether, as Bishop Patrick thinks, he burnt the offerings for himself with ordinary fire, but, when they were burnt out, he laid the people's sacrifices upon the altar, which were kindled and consumed by the fire of the Lord. I would rather conjecture, because it is said of all these sacrifices, that he burnt them, (except the burnt-offering for the people, of which it is said that he offered it according to the manner, (v. 16.) which seems to be equivalent,) that he did not kindle the fire to burn them, but that then the fire from the Lord fastened upon them, put out the fire that he had kindled, (as we know a greater fire puts out a lesser,) and suddenly consumed the remainder, which the fire he had kindled would have consumed slowly. 4. When Aaron had done all that on his part was to be done about the sacrifices, he lifted up his hand toward the people, and blessed them, v. 22. This was one part of the priest's work, in which he was a type of Christ, who came into the world to bless us; and when he was parted from his disciples at his ascension, lifted up his hands and blessed them, and in them his whole church, of which they were the elders and representatives, as the great High Priest of our profession. Aaron lifted up his hands, in blessing them, to intimate whence he desired and expected the blessing to come, even from heaven, which is God's throne; Aaron could but crave a blessing, it is God's prerogative to command it. Aaron, when he had blessed, came down; Christ, when he blessed, went up.

23. And Moses and Aaron went into the tabernacle of the congregation, and came out, and blessed the people: and the glory of the LORD appeared unto all the people. 24. And there came a fire out from before the LORD, and consumed upon the altar the burnt-offering and the fat: which when all the people saw, they shouted, and fell on their faces.

We are not told what Moses and Aaron went into the tabernacle to do, v. 23. Some of the Jewish writers say, "They went in to pray for the appearance of the divine glory;" most probably they went in, that Moses might instruct Aaron how to do the service that was to be done there—burn incense, light the lamps, set the shew-bread, &c. that he might instruct his sons in it. But when they came out, they both joined in blessing the people, who stood expecting the promised appearance of the divine glory; and it was now (when Moses and Aaron concurred in praying) that they had what they waited for. Note, God's manifestations of himself and his glory and grace are commonly given in answer to prayer. When Christ was praying, the heavens were opened, Luke, 3. 21. The glory of God appeared, not while the sacrifices were in offering, but when the priests prayed, (as 2 Chron. 5. 13.) when they praised God; which intimates that the prayers and praises of God's spiritual priests are more pleasing to God than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices.

CHAP. X.

When the solemnity was finished, the blessing pronounced, and the congregation ready to be dismissed, in the close of the day, then God testified his acceptance, which gave them such satisfaction as was well worth waiting for.

1. The glory of the Lord appeared unto all the people, v. 23. What the appearance of it was we are not told; no doubt, it was such as carried its own evidence along with it. The glory which filled the tabernacle, (Exod. 40. 34.) now shewed itself at the door of the tabernacle to those that attended there, as a prince shews himself to the expecting crowd to gratify them. God hereby testified of their gifts, and shewed them that he was worthy for whom they should do all this. Note, Those that diligently attend upon God in the way he has appointed, shall have such a sight of his glory as shall be abundantly to their satisfaction. They that dwell in God's house with an eye of faith, may behold the beauty of the Lord.

2. There came a fire out from before the Lord, and consumed the sacrifice, v. 24. Here the learned Bishop Patrick has a very probable conjecture, that Moses and Aaron staid in the tabernacle, till it was time to offer the evening sacrifice, which Aaron did, but it is not mentioned, because it was done of course, and that was it which the fire that came out from the Lord consumed. Whether this fire came from heaven, or out of the most holy place, or from that visible appearance of the glory of God which all the people saw, it was a manifest token of God's acceptance of their service, as, afterward, of Solomon's sacrifice, 2 Chron. 7. 1. and Elijah's, 1 Kings, 18. 38. This fire did, (1.) Consume (or, as the word is, eat up) the present sacrifice. And two days this was a testimony of acceptance. [1.] It signified the turning away of God's wrath from them. God's wrath is a consuming fire; this fire might justly have fastened upon the people, and consumed them for their sins; but its fastening upon the sacrifice, and consuming that, signified God's acceptance of that, as an atonement for the sinner. [2.] It signified God's entering into covenant and communion with them: they ate their part of the sacrifice, and the fire of the Lord ate up his part; and thus he did, as it were, sup with them, and they with him, Rev. 3. 20. (2.) This fire did, as it were, take possession of the altar. The fire was thus kindled in God's house, which was to continue as long as the house stood, as we read before, ch. 6. 13. This also was a figure of good things to come: The Spirit descended upon the apostles in fire, (Acts, 2. 3.) so ratifying their commission, as this spoken of here did the priests'. And the descent of this holy fire into our souls, to kindle in them pious and devout affections toward God, and such a holy zeal as burns up the flesh and the lusts of it, is a certain token of God's gracious acceptance of our persons and performances. That redounds to God's glory, which is the work of his own grace in us. Hereby we know that we dwell in God, and God in us, because he hath thus given us of his Spirit, 1 John, 4. 13. Now from henceforward, [1.] All their sacrifices and incense must be offered with this fire. Note, Nothing goes to God but what comes from him. We must have grace, that holy fire, from the God of grace, else we cannot serve him acceptably, Heb. 12. 28. [2.] The priests must keep it burning with a constant supply of fuel, and the fuel must be wood, the cleanest of fuel. Thus those to whom God has given grace, must take heed of quenching the Spirit.

Lastly, We are here told how the people were affected, with this discovery of God's glory and grace; they received it, (1.) With the highest joy, they shouted; so stirring up themselves, and one another, to a holy triumph in the assurance now given them, that they had God nigh unto them; which is spoken of the grandeur of their nation, Dent. 4. 7. (2.) With the lowest reverence; they fell on their faces, humbly adoring the majesty of that God who vouchsafed thus to manifest himself to them. That is a sinful fear of God, which drives us from him; a gracious fear makes us bow before him. Very good impressions were made upon their minds for the present, but they soon wore off, as those commonly do which are made by that which is only sensible; while the influences of faith are durable.

The story of this chapter is as sad an interruption to the institutions of the Levitical law, as that of the golden calf was to the account of the erecting of the tabernacle. Here is, I. The sin and death of Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, v. 1, 2. II. The quieting of Aaron under this sore affliction, v. 3. III. Orders given and observed about the funeral and mourning, v. 4, 5. IV. A command to the priests not to drink wine when they went in to minister, v. 8, 11. V. The cure Moses took that they should go on with their work, notwithstanding the agitation produced by this event, v. 12. . 20.

1. AND Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, took either of them his censer, and put fire therein, and put incense thereon, and offered strange fire before the LORD, which he commanded them not. 2. And there went out fire from the LORD, and devoured them, and they died before the LORD.

Here is,

I. The great sin that Nadab and Abihu were guilty of: and a great sin we must call it, how little soever it appears in our eye; because it is evident, by the punishment of it, that it was highly provoking to the God of heaven, whose judgment, we are sure, is according to truth. But what was their sin? All the account here given of it, is, that they offered strange fire before the Lord, which he commanded them not, (v. 1.) and the same, Numb. 3. 4. 1. It does not appear that they had any orders to burn incense at all at this time. It is true, their consecration was completed the day before, and it was part of their work, as priests, to serve at the altar of incense; but, it should seem, the whole service of this solemn day of inauguration was to be performed by Aaron himself, for he slew the sacrifices, (ch. 9. 8, 15, 18.) and his sons were only to attend him; (v. 9, 12, 18.) therefore Moses and Aaron only went into the tabernacle, v. 23. But Nadab and Abihu were so proud of the honour they were newly advanced to, and so ambitious of doing the highest and most honourable part of their work immediately, that though the service of this day was extraordinary, and all done by particular direction from Moses, yet without receiving orders, or so much as asking leave from him, they took their censers, and they would enter into the tabernacle, at the door of which they thought they had attended long enough, and would burn incense. And then their offering strange fire is the same with offering strange incense, which is expressly forbidden, Exod. 30. 9. Moses, we may suppose, had the custody of the incense which was prepared for this purpose, (Exod. 30. 38.) and they, doing this without his leave, had none of the incense which should have been offered, but common incense, so that the smoke of their incense came from a strange fire. God had indeed required the priests to burn incense, but, at this time, it was what he commanded them not; and so their crime was like that of Uzziah the king, 2 Chron. 26. 16. The priests were to burn incense, only when it was their lot, (Luke, 1. 9.) and, at this time it was not their's. 2. Presuming thus to burn incense of their own without order, no marvel that they made a further blunder, and instead of taking of the fire from the altar, which was newly kindled from before the Lord, and which from henceforward must be used in offering both sacrifice and incense, (Rev. 8. 5.) they took common fire, probably, from that with which the flesh of the peace-offerings was boiled, and this they made use of in burning incense; not being holy fire, it is called strange fire; and though not expressly forbidden, it was crime enough that God commanded it not. For, (as Bishop Hall well observes here,) "It is a dangerous thing, in the service of God, to decline from his own institutions; we have to do with a God who is wise to prescribe his own worship, just to require what he has prescribed, and powerful to reverse what he has not prescribed." 3. Incense was always to be burned by only one priest at a time, but here they would both go in together to do it. 4. They did it rashly, and with precipitation.

They snatched their censers, so some read it, in a light careless way, without due reverence and seriousness: when all the people fell upon their faces, before the glory of the Lord, they thought the dignity of their office was such as to exempt them from such abasements. The familiarity they were admitted to, bred a contempt of the divine Majesty; and now that they were priests, they thought they might do what they pleased. 5. There is reason to suspect that they were drunken when they did it, because of the law which was given upon this occasion, v. 8. They had been feasting upon the peace-offerings, and the drink-offerings that attended them, and so their heads were light, or, at least, their hearts were merry with wine, they drank and forgot the law, (Prov. 31. 5.) and were guilty of this fatal miscarriage. 6. No doubt, it was done presumptuously; for if it had been done through ignorance, they had been allowed the benefit of the law lately made, even for the priests, that they should bring a sin-offering, ch. 4. 2, 3. But the soul that doth aught presumptuously, and in contempt of God's majesty, authority, and justice, that soul shall be cut off, Numb. 15. 30.

H. The dreadful punishment of this sin, v. 2. There went out fire from the Lord, and devoured them. This fire, which consumed the sacrificers, came the same way with that which had consumed the sacrifices, (ch. 9. 24.) which shewed what justice would have done to all the guilty people, if infinite mercy had not found and accepted a ransom; and if that fire struck such an awe upon the people, much more would this. Observe, 1. They died. Might it not have sufficed, if they had been only struck with a leprosy, as Uzziah, or struck dumb, as Zechariah, and both by the altar of incense? No; they were both struck dead. The wages of this sin was death. 2. They died suddenly, in the very act of their sin, and had not time so much as to cry, "Lord, have mercy upon us!" Though God is longsuffering to us-ward, yet sometimes he makes quick work with sinners; sentence is executed speedily: presumptuous sinners bring upon themselves a swift destruction, and are justly denied even space to repent. 3. They died before the Lord; that is, before the veil that covered the mercy-seat; for even mercy itself will not suffer its own glory to be affronted. They that sinned before the Lord, died before him. Damned sinners are said to be tormented in the presence of the Lamb, intimating that he does not interpose in their behalf, Rev. 14. 10. 4. They died by fire, as by fire they sinned. They slighted the fire that came from before the Lord to consume the sacrifices, and thought other fire would do every jot as well; and now God justly made them feel the power of that fire which they did not reverence. Thus they that hate to be refined by the fire of divine grace, will undoubtedly be ruined by the fire of divine wrath. The fire did not burn them to ashes, as it had done the sacrifices, nor so much as singe their coats, (v. 5.) but, like lightning, struck them dead in an instant: by these different effects of the same fire, God would shew that it was no common fire, but kindled by the breath of the Almighty, Isa. 30. 33. 5. It is twice taken notice of in scripture, that they died childless, Numb. 3. 4. and 1 Chron. 24. 2. By their presumption they had reproached God's name, and God justly blotted out their names, and laid that honour in the dust which they were proud of.

But why did the Lord deal thus severely with them? Were they not the sons of Aaron, the saint of the Lord, nephews to Moses, the great favourite of Heaven? Was not the holy anointing oil sprinkled upon them, as men whom God had set apart for himself? Had they not diligently attended during the seven days of their consecration, and kept the charge of the Lord, and might not that atone for this rashness? Would it not excuse them, that they were young men, as yet unexperienced in these services; that it was the first offence, and done in a transport of joy for their elevation? And besides, never could men be worse spared: a great deal of work was now lately cut out for the priests to do, and the priesthood was confined to Aaron and his seed; he has but four sons; if two of them die, there will not be hands enough to do the service of the tabernacle: if they die childless, the house of Aaron will become weak and little, and the priesthood will be in danger of being lost for want of heirs. But none of all these considerations shall serve either to excuse the offence, or bring off the offenders.

For, (1.) The sin was greatly aggravated. It was a manifest contempt of Moses, and the divine law that was given by Moses. Hitherto it had been expressly observed concerning every thing that was done, that they did it as the Lord commanded Moses; in opposition to which it is here said, they did that which the Lord commanded them not, but they did it of their own heads. God was now teaching his people obedience, and to do every thing by rule, as become servants; for priests therefore to break rules, and disobey, was such a provocation as must by no means go unpunished. Their character made their sin more exceeding sinful; for the sons of Aaron, his eldest sons, whom God had chosen to be immediate attendants upon him, for them to be guilty of such a piece of presumption, it cannot be suffered. There was in their sin a contempt of God's glory, which had now newly appeared in fire; as if that fire were needless, they had as good of their own before.

(2.) Their punishment was a piece of necessary justice, now at the first settling of the ceremonial institutions. It is often threatened in the law, that such and such offenders should be cut off from the people; and here God explained the threatening with a witness. Now that the laws concerning sacrifices were newly made, lest any should be tempted to think lightly of them, because they descended to many circumstances which seemed very minute, these that were the first transgressors were thus punished, for warning to others, and to shew how jealous God is in the matters of his worship: Thus he magnified the law, and made it honourable: and let his priests know that the caution which so often occurs in the laws concerning them, that they must do so, that they die not, was not a mere bugbear, but fair warning of their danger, if they did the work of the Lord negligently. And no doubt this exemplary piece of justice at first prevented many irregularities afterward. Thus Ananias and Sapphira were punished, when they presumed to lie to the Holy Ghost, that newly descended fire.

Lastly, As the people's falling into idolatry, presently after the moral law was given, shews the weakness of the law, and its insufficiency to take away sin; so the sin and punishment of these priests shewed the imperfection of that priesthood from the very beginning, and its inability to shelter any from the fire of God's wrath, otherwise than as it was typical of Christ's priesthood, in the execution of which there never was, nor can be, any irregularity or false step taken.

3. Then Moses said unto Aaron, This is it that the LORD spake, saying, I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me, and before all the people I will be glorified. And Aaron held his peace. 4. And Moses called Mishael and Elzaphan, the sons of Uzziel the uncle of Aaron, and said unto them, Come near, carry your brethren from before the sanctuary out of the camp. 5. So they went near, and carried them in their coats out of the camp; as Moses had said. 6. And Moses said unto Aaron, and unto Eleazar and unto Ithamar, his sons, Uncover not your heads, neither rend your clothes, lest ye die, and lest wrath come upon all the people: but let your brethren, the whole house of Israel, bewail the burning which the LORD hath kindled. 7. And ye shall not go out from the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die; for the anointing oil of the LORD is upon you. And they did according to the word of Moses.

We may well think, when Nadab and Abihu were struck with death, all about them were struck with horror, and every face, as well as their's, gathered blackness: consternation, no doubt, seized them, and they were all full of confusion; but, whatever the rest were, Moses was composed, and knew what he said and did, not being displeased, as David was in a like case, 2 Sam. 6. 3. But though it touched him in a very tender part, and was a dreadful damp to one of the greatest joys he ever knew, yet he kept possession of his own soul, and took care to keep good order, and a due decorum in the sanctuary.

I. He endeavours to pacify Aaron, and to keep him in a good frame under this sad dispensation, v. 3. Moses was a brother that was born for adversity, and has taught us, by his example, with reasonable counsels and comforts, to support the weak, and strengthen the feeble-minded.

Observe here, 1. What it was that Moses suggested to his poor brother upon this occasion, This is it that the Lord spake. Note, (1.) The most quieting considerations under affliction are those that are fetched from the word of God. So and so the Lord hath said, and it is not for us to gainsay it. (2.) In all God's providences it is good to observe the fulfilling of scripture, and to compare God's word and his works together; which if we do, we shall find an admirable harmony and agreement between them, and that they mutually explain and illustrate each other. But, [1.] Where did God speak this? We do not find the very words; but to this purport he had said, (Exod. 19. 22.) Let the priests which come near to the Lord sanctify themselves, lest the Lord break forth upon them. Indeed the whole scope and tenor of his law spake this, that being a holy God, and a sovereign Lord, he must always be worshipped with holiness and reverence, and exactly according to his own appointment; and if any jest with him, it is at their peril. Much had been said to this purport, as Exod. 29. 43, 44.—34. 14. ch. 8. 35. [2.] What was it that God spake? It is this; (the Lord by his grace speak it to all our hearts!) I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me, who ever they are, and before all the people I will be glorified. Note, First, Whenever we worship God, we come nigh unto him as spiritual priests. This consideration ought to make us very reverent and serious in all acts of devotion, that in them we approach to God, and present ourselves before him. Secondly, It concerns us all, when we come nigh to God, to sanctify him, that is, to give him the praise of his holiness, to perform every religious exercise, as those that believe that the God with whom we have to do is a holy God, a God of spotless purity and transcendent perfection, Isa. 8. 13. Thirdly, When we sanctify God, we glorify him, for his holiness is his glory; and when we sanctify him in our solemn assemblies, we glorify him before all the people, confessing our own belief of his glory, and desiring that others also may be affected with it. Fourthly, If God be not sanctified and glorified by us, he will be sanctified and glorified upon us. He will take vengeance on those that profane his sacred name by trifling with him. If his rent be not paid, it shall be distrained for. [3.] But what was this to the present case? What was there in this to quiet Aaron? Two things. First, This must silence him, that his sons deserved their death; for they were thus cut off from their people, because they did not sanctify and glorify God. The acts of necessary justice, how hard soever they may seem to bear upon the persons concerned, are not to be complained of, but submitted to. Secondly, This must satisfy him, that the death of his sons redounded to the honour of God, and his impartial justice would for it be adored throughout all ages.

2. What good effects they had upon him; Aaron held his peace, that is, he patiently submitted to the holy will of God in this sad providence, was dumb, and opened not his mouth, because God said it. Something he was ready to say by way of complaint, (as losers think they may have leave to speak,) but he wisely suppressed it, laid his hand upon his mouth, and said nothing, for fear lest he should offend with his tongue, now that his heart was hot within him. Note, (1.) When God corrects us or our's for our sin, it is our duty to be silent under the correction, not to quarrel with God, or arraign his justice, or charge him with folly, but to acquiesce in all that God does; not only bearing, but accepting, the punishment of iniquity, and saying, as Eli, in a case not much unlike this here. It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good, 1 Sam. 3. 18. If our children have sinned against God, (as Bildad puts the case, Job, 8. 4.) and he have cast them away for their transgression, though it must needs be grievous to think that the children of our love should be the children of God's wrath, yet we must awfully adore the divine justice, and make no exceptions against its processes. (2.) The most effectual arguments to quiet a gracious spirit under afflictions, are those that are fetched from God's glory; this silenced Aaron. It is true, he is a loser in his comforts by this severe execution, but Moses has shewed him that God is a Gainer in his glory, and therefore he has not a word to say against it: if God be sanctified, Aaron is satisfied. Far be it from him that he should honour his sons more than God, or wish that God's name, or house, or law, should be exposed to reproach or contempt, for the preserving of the reputation of his family. No; now, as well as in the matter of the golden calf, Levi does not acknowledge his brethren, nor know his own children; and therefore they shall teach Jacob thy judgments, and Israel thy law, Deut. 33. 9, 10. Ministers and their families are sometimes exercised with sore trials, that they may be examples to the believers of patience and resignation to God, and may comfort others with that with which they themselves have been comforted.

II. Moses gives orders about the dead bodies. It was not fit that they should be left to lie where they fell; yet their own father and brethren, the amazed spectators of this dismal tragedy, durst not offer to lift them up, no not to see whether there were any life left in them; they must neither be diverted from, nor unfitted for, the great work that was now upon their hands. Let the dead bury their dead, but they must go on with their service; "Rather let the dead be unburied, if there be nobody else to do it, than that work for God should be left undone by those whom he has called to it." But Moses takes care of this matter, that though they died by the hand of justice, in the act of sin, yet they should be decently buried, and they were so, v. 4, 5. 1. Some of their nearest relations were employed in it, who were cousin-germans to their father, and are here named, who would perform this office with tenderness and respect. They were Levites only, and might not have come into the sanctuary, no not upon such an occasion as this, if they had not had a special command for it. 2. They carried them out of the camp to be buried, so far were they from burying them in the place of worship, or the court of it, according to our modern usage, though they died there, that they did not bury them, nor any of their dead, within the lines of their camp; as afterward their burying places were out of their cities. The tabernacle was pitched in the midst of the camp, so that they could not carry these dead priests to their graves, without carrying them through one of the squadrons of the camp; and doubtless it was a very awful and affecting sight to the people. The names of Nadab and Abihu were become very great and honourable among them; none more talked of, nor more expected to appear abroad after the days of their consecration, to receive the honours and caresses of the crowd, whose manner it is to adore the rising sun; and, next to Moses and Aaron, who were old and going off, Nadab and Abihu (who had been in the mount with God, Exod. 24. 1.) were looked upon as the great favourites of Heaven, and the hopes of their people; and now on a sudden, when the tidings of the event had scarcely reached their ears, to see them both carried out dead, with the visible marks of divine vengeance upon them, as sacrifices to the justice of God, they could not choose but cry out, Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? 1 Sam. 6. 20. 3. They carried them out (and, probably, buried them) in their coats, the garments of their priesthood, which they had lately put on, and perhaps were too proud of. Thus the impartiality of God's justice was proclaimed, and all the people were made to know that even priests' garments would not protect an offender from the wrath of God. And it was easy to argue, "If they escape not when they transgress, can we expect to go unpunished? And the priests' clothes being so soon made grave-clothes, might intimate both that the law worketh death, and that in process of time that priesthood itself should be abolished, and buried in the grave of the Lord Jesus.

III. He gives directions about the mourning:

1. That the priests must not mourn; Aaron and his two surviving sons, though sad in spirit, must not use any outward expressions of sorrow upon this sad occasion, nor so much as follow the corpse one step from the door of the tabernacle, v. 7. It was afterward forbidden to the high priest to use the ceremonies of mourning for the death of any friend whatsoever, though it were a father or mother; (ch. 21. 11.) yet it was allowed at the same time to the inferior priests to mourn for their near relations, v. 2, 3. But here it was forbidden both to Aaron and his sons, because, (1.) They were now actually in waiting, doing a great work, which must by no means cease; (Neh. 6. 3.) and it was very much for the honour of God that their attendance on him should take place of their respects to their nearest relations, and that all services should give way to those of their ministry. By this they must make it to appear that they had a greater value and affection for their God and their work, than for the best friend they had in the world; as Christ did, Matth. 12. 47, 48. And we are hereby taught, when we are serving God in holy duties, to keep our minds, as much as may be, intent and engaged, and not to suffer them to be diverted by any worldly thoughts, or cares, or passions. Let us always attend upon the Lord without distraction. (2.) Their brethren were cut off for their transgression by the immediate hand of God, and therefore they must not mourn for them, lest they should seem to countenance the sin, or impeach the justice of God in the punishment. Instead of lamenting their own loss, they must be wholly taken up in applauding the sentence, and subscribing to the equity of it. Note, The public concerns of God's glory ought to lie nearer our hearts than any private affections of our own. Observe how Moses frightens them into this submission, and holds the rod over them to still their crying, (v. 6.) "Lest ye die likewise, and lest wrath come upon all the people, who may be in danger of suffering for your irreverence, and disobedience, and ungoverned passions;" and again, (v. 7.) lest ye die. See here what use we are to make of the judgments of God upon others, we must double our guard over ourselves, lest we likewise perish. The death, especially the sudden death, of others, instead of moving our passion, should compose us into a holy reverence of God, a cautious separation from all sin, and a serious expectation of our own death. The reason given them is, because the anointing oil of your God is upon you, the honour of which must be carefully preserved by your doing the duty of your office with cheerfulness. Note, Those that through grace have received the anointing, ought not to disturb themselves with the sorrow of the world, which worketh death. It was very hard, no doubt, for Aaron and his sons to restrain themselves, upon such an extraordinary occasion, from inordinate grief, but reason and grace mastered the passion, and they bore the affliction with an obedient patience, they did according to the word of Moses, because they knew it to be the word of God. Happy they who thus are themselves under God's government, and have their passions under their own government.

2. The people must mourn Let the whole house of Israel bewail the burning which the Lord has kindled. The congregation must lament, not only the loss of their priests, but especially the displeasure of God which appeared in it. They must bewail the burning that was kindled, that it might not burn further. Aaron and his sons were in danger of being too much affected with the providence, and therefore they are forbidden to mourn; the house of Israel were in danger of being too little affected with it, and therefore they are commanded to lament. Thus nature must always be governed by grace, according as it needs to be either constrained or restrained.

8. And the LORD spake unto Aaron, saying,
9. Do not drink wine nor strong drink, thou nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die: It shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations:

10. And that ye may put difference between holy and unholy, and between unclean and clean;
11. And that ye may teach the children of Israel all the statutes which the LORD hath spoken unto them by the hand of Moses.

Aaron having been very observant of what God said to him by Moses, now God does him the honour to speak to him immediately; (v. 8.) The Lord spake unto Aaron, and the rather because what was now to be said, Aaron might perhaps have taken amiss from Moses, as if he had suspected him to have been a gluttonous man and a wine-bibber; so apt are we to resent cautions as accusations; therefore God saith it himself to him. Do not drink wine nor strong drink, when ye go into the tabernacle, and this at their peril, lest ye die, v. 9. Probably they had seen the ill effect of it in Nadab and Abihu, and therefore must take warning by them.

Observe here, 1. The prohibition itself, Do not drink wine nor strong drink. At other times they were allowed it, (it was not expected that every priest should be a Nazarite,) but during the time of their ministration they were forbidden it. This was one of the laws in Ezekiel's temple, (Ezek. 44. 21.) and so it is required of gospel-ministers, that they be not given to wine, 1 Tim. 3. 3. Note, Drunkenness is bad in any, but it is especially scandalous and pernicious in ministers, who of all men ought to have the clearest heads and the cleanest hearts.

2. The penalty annexed to the prohibition, Lest ye die; lest ye die when ye are in drink, and so that day come upon you unawares, Luke, 21. 34. Or, "Lest ye do that which will make you liable to be cut off by the hand of God." The danger of death we are continually in, should engage us to be sober, 1 Pet. 4. 7. It is pity that it should ever be used for the support of licentiousness, as it is by those who argue, Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die.

3. The reasons assigned for this prohibition. They must needs be sober, else they could not duly discharge their office; they will be in danger of erring through wine, Isa. 28. 7. They must be sure to keep sober, (1.) That they might be able to distinguish themselves, in their ministrations, between that which was sacred and that which was common, and might never confound them, v. 10. It concerns the Lord's ministers to put a difference between holy and unholy, both things and persons, that they may separate between the precious and the vile, Jer. 15. 19. (2.) That they might be able to teach the people, (v. 11.) for that was a part of the priests' work, (Deut. 33. 10.) and those that are addicted to drunkenness are very unfit to teach people God's statutes, both because they that live after the flesh can have no experimental acquaintance with the things of the Spirit, and because such teachers pull down with one hand what they build up with the other.

12. And Moses spake unto Aaron, and unto Eleazar and unto Ithamar, his sons that were left, Take the meat-offering that remaineth of the offerings of the LORD made by fire, and eat it without leaven beside the altar: for it is most holy:
13. And ye shall eat it in the holy place, because it is thy due, and thy sons' due, of the sacrifices of the LORD made by fire: for so I am commanded.
14. And the wave-breast and heave-shoulder shall ye eat in a clean place; thou, and thy sons, and thy daughters with thee: for they be thy due, and thy sons' due, which are given out of the sacrifices of peace-offerings of the children of Israel. 15. The heave-shoulder and the wave-breast shall they bring with the offerings made by fire of the fat, to wave it for a wave-offering before the LORD; and it shall be thine, and thy sons with thee, by a statute for ever; as the LORD hath commanded. 16. And Moses diligently sought the goat of the sin-offering, and, behold, it was burnt: and he was angry with Eleazar and Ithamar, the sons of Aaron which were left alive, saying, 17. Wherefore have ye not eaten the sin-offering in the holy place, seeing it is most holy, and God hath given it you to bear the iniquity of the congregation, to make atonement for them before the LORD? 18. Behold, the blood of it was not brought in within the holy place: ye should indeed have eaten it in the holy place, as I commanded. 19. And Aaron said unto Moses, Behold, this day have they offered their sin-offering and their burnt-offering before the LORD; and such things have befallen me: and if I had eaten the sin-offering to-day, should it have been accepted in the sight of the LORD? 20. And when Moses heard that, he was content.

Moses is here directing Aaron to go on with his service after this interruption. Afflictions should rather quicken us to our duty than take us off from it. Observe, (v. 12.) he spake unto Aaron and to his sons that were left. The notice taken of their survivorship intimates, 1. That Aaron should take comfort under the loss of two of his sons, from this consideration, that God had graciously spared him the other two, and that he had reason to be thankful for the remnant that was left, that all his sons were not dead, and, in token of his thankfulness to God, to go on cheerfully in his work. 2. That God's sparing of them should be an engagement upon them to proceed in his service, and not to fly off from it. Here were four priests consecrated together, two were taken away, and two left; therefore the two that were left should endeavour to fill up the places of them that were gone, by double care and diligence in the services of the priesthood.

Now,

I. Moses repeats the directions he had formerly given them about eating their share of the sacrifices, v. 12, 14, 15. The priests must learn, not only to put a difference between the holy and the unholy, as they had been taught, (v. 10.) but also to distinguish between that which was most holy, and that which was only holy, of the things they were to eat. That part of the meat-offering which remained to the priest, was most holy, and therefore must be eaten in the courts of the tabernacle, and by Aaron's sons only; (v. 12, 13.) but the breast and shoulder of the peace-offerings might be eaten in any decent place out of the courts of the tabernacle, and by the daughters of their families. The meat-offerings, being annexed to the burnt-offerings, were intended only and wholly for the glory of God; but the peace-offerings were ordained for the furtherance of men's joy and comfort; the former therefore were the more sacred, and to be had more in veneration. This distinction the priests must carefully observe, and take heed of making any blunders. Moses does not pretend to give any reasons for this difference, but refers himself to his instructions; for so am I commanded, v. 13. That was reason enough; he had received of the Lord all that he delivered unto them, 1 Cor. 11. 23.

II. He inquires concerning one deviation from the appointment, which, it seems, had happened upon this occasion, which was this; there was a goat to be sacrificed as a sin-offering for the people, ch. 9. 15. Now the law of the sin-offering was, that if the blood of them was brought into the holy place, as that of the sin-offering for the priest was, then the flesh was to be burnt without the camp; otherwise it was to be eaten by the priest in the holy place, ch. 6. 30. The meaning of which is here explained, (v. 17.) that the priests did hereby bear the iniquity of the congregation, that is, they were types of him who was to be made sin for us, and on whom God would lay the iniquity of us all. Now the blood of this goat was not brought into the holy place, and yet, it seems, it was burnt without the camp.

Now observe here, 1. The gentle reproof Moses gives to Aaron and his sons, for this irregularity. Here again Aaron's sons are said to be those that were left alive, (v. 16.) who therefore ought to take warning; and Moses was angry with them. Though he was the meekest man in the world, it seems he could be angry; and when he thought God was disobeyed and dishonoured, and the priesthood endangered, he would be angry. Yet observe how very mildly he deals with Aaron and his sons, considering their present affliction. He only tells them, They should indeed have eaten it in the holy place, but is willing to hear what they have to say for themselves, being loath to speak to the grief of those whom God had wounded.

2. The plausible excuse which Aaron makes for this mistake. Moses charged the fault upon Eleazar and Ithamar, (v. 16.) but it is probable that what they did was by Aaron's direction, and therefore he apologized for it. He might have pleaded that this was a sin-offering for the congregation, and if it had been a bullock it must have been wholly burnt, (ch. 4. 21.) and therefore why not now that it was a goat? But it seems it was otherwise ordered at this time, and therefore he makes his affliction his excuse, v. 19. Observe, (1.) How he speaks of affliction, Such things have befallen me, such sad things, which could not but go near his heart, and make it very heavy. He was an high priest taken from among men, and could not put off natural affection when he put on the holy garments. He held his peace, (v. 3.) yet his sorrow was stirred, as David's, Ps. 39. 2. Note, There may be a deep sense of affliction even where there is a sincere resignation to the will of God in the affliction. "Such things as never befell me before, and as I little expected now. My spirits cannot but sink, when I see my family sinking; I must needs be heavy, when God is angry." thus it is easy to say a great deal to aggravate an affliction, but it is better to say little. (2.) How he makes that an excuse for his varying from the appointment about the sin-offering. He could not have eaten it but in his mourning, and with a sorrowful spirit; and would that have been accepted? He does not plead that his heart was so full of grief that he had no stomach to it, but that he feared it would not be accepted. Note, [1.] Acceptance with God is the great thing we should desire and aim at in all our religious services, particularly in the Lord's supper, which is our eating of the sin-offering. [2.] The sorrow of the world is a very great hinderance to our acceptable performance of holy duties; as it is discomposing to ourselves, takes off our chariot-wheels, and makes us drive heavily, (1 Sam. 1. 7, 8.) and as it is displeasing to God, whose will it is that we should serve him cheerfully, Deut. 12. 7. Mourners' bread was polluted, Hos. 9. 4. See Mal. 2. 14.

3. Moses acquiesces in the excuse, (v. 20.) He was content. Perhaps he thought it justified what they had done. God had provided that what could not be eaten might be burnt. Our unfitness for duty, when it is natural and not sinful, will have great allowances made for it; and God will have mercy and not sacrifice. At least, he thought it did very much extenuate the fault; the spirit indeed was willing but the flesh was weak. God by Moses shewed that he considered his frame. It appeared that Aaron sincerely aimed at God's acceptance; and those that do so with an upright heart, shall find he is not extreme to mark what they do amiss. Nor must we be severe in our animadversions upon every mistake concerning ourselves, lest we also be tempted.

CHAP. XI.

The ceremonial law is described by the apostle (Heb. 9. 9, 10.) to consist, not only in gifts and sacrifices, which hitherto have been treated of in this book, but in meats, and drinks, and divers washings from ceremonial uncleanness: the laws concerning which begin with this chapter, which puts a difference between some sorts of flesh-meat and others, allowing some to be eaten as clean, and forbidding others as unclean. There is one kind of flesh of men. Nature startles at the thought of eating that, and none do it but such as are arrived at the highest degree of barbarity, and are become but one remove from brutes; therefore there needed no law against that. But there is another kind of flesh of beasts, concerning which the law directs here, (v. 1. .8.) another of fishes, (v. 9. .12.) another of birds, (v. 13. .19.) and another of creeping things, which are distinguished into two sorts, flying creeping things, (v. 20. .28.) and creeping things upon the earth, v. 29. .43. And the law concludes with the general rule of holiness, and reasons for it, v. 44. .47.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses and to Aaron, saying unto them, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, These are the beasts which ye shall eat among all the beasts that are on the earth. 3. Whatsoever parteth the hoof, and is cloven-footed, and cheweth the cud, among the beasts, that shall ye eat. 4. Nevertheless, these shall ye not eat of them that chew the cud, or of them that divide the hoof: as the camel, because he cheweth the cud, but divideth not the hoof; he is unclean unto you. 5. And the cony, because he cheweth the cud, but divideth not the hoof; he is unclean unto you. 6. And the hare, because he cheweth the cud, but divideth not the hoof; he is unclean unto you. 7. And the swine, though he divide the hoof, and be cloven-footed, yet he cheweth not the cud; he is unclean to you. 8. Of their flesh shall ye not eat, and their carcase shall ye not touch; they are unclean to you.

Now that Aaron was consecrated a high priest over the house of God, God spake to him with Moses, and appoints them both as joint-commissioners to deliver his will to the people. He spake both to Moses and to Aaron about this matter; for it was particularly required of the priests, that they should put a difference between clean and unclean, and teach the people to do so. After the flood, God entered into covenant with Noah and his sons, he allowed them to eat flesh, (Gen. 9. 3.) whereas before they were confined to the productions of the earth. But the liberty allowed to the sons of Noah is here limited to the sons of Israel. They might eat flesh, but not all kinds of flesh; some they must look upon as unclean and forbidden to them, others as clean and allowed them. The law in this matter is both very particular and very strict. But what reason can be given for this law? Why may not God's people have as free a use of all the creatures as other people?

1. It is reason enough, that God would have it so: his will, as it is law sufficient, so it is reason sufficient; for his will is his wisdom. He saw good thus to try and exercise the obedience of his people, not only in the solemnities of his altar, but in matters of daily occurrence at their own table, that there they might remember they were under authority. Thus God had tried the obedience of man in innocency, by forbidding him to eat of one particular tree.

2. Most of the meats forbidden as unclean are such as were really unwholesome, and not fit to be eaten; and those of them that we think wholesome enough, and use accordingly, as the cony, the hare, and the swine, perhaps in those countries, and to their bodies, might be hurtful. And then God in this law did by them but as a wise and loving father does by his children, whom he restrains from eating that which he knows will make them sick.

Note, The Lord is for the body, and it is not only folly, but sin against God, to prejudice our health for the pleasing of our appetite.

3. God would thus teach his people to distinguish themselves from other people, not only in their religious worship, but in the common actions of life. Thus he would shew them that they must not be numbered among the nations. It should seem there had been, before this, some difference between the Hebrews and other nations in their food, kept up by tradition, for the Egyptians and they would not eat together, Gen. 43. 42. And even before the flood there was a distinction of beasts into clean and not clean, (Gen. 7. 2.) which distinction was quite lost, with many other instances of religion, among the Gentiles. But by this law it is reduced to a certainty, and ordered to be kept up among the Jews; that thus, by having a diet peculiar to themselves, they might be kept from familiar conversation with their idolatrous neighbours, and might typify God's spiritual Israel, who, not in these little things, but in the temper of their spirits, and the course of their lives, should be governed by a sober singularity, and not be conformed to this world. The learned observe further, That most of the creatures which by this law were to be abominated as unclean, were such as were had in high veneration among the heathen, not so much for food, as for divination and sacrifice to their gods; and therefore those are here mentioned as unclean, and an abomination, which yet they would not be in any temptation to eat, that they might keep up a religious loathing of that which the Gentiles had a superstitious value for. The swine, with the later Gentiles, was sacred to Venus, the owl to Minerva, the eagle to Jupiter, the dog to Hecate, &c. and all these are here made unclean.

As to the beasts, there is a general rule laid down, that those beasts which both part the hoof and chew the cud were clean, and those only: they are particularly mentioned in the repetition of this law, (Deut. 14. 4, 5.) where it appears that they had variety enough allowed them, and needed not to complain of the confinement they were under. Those beasts that did not both chew the cud and divide the hoof were unclean: by which rule the flesh of swine, and of hares, and of rabbits, was prohibited to them, though commonly used among us. Therefore, particularly at the eating of any of these, we should give thanks for the liberty granted us in this matter by the gospel, which teaches us that every creature of God is good, and we are to call nothing common or unclean. Some observe a significancy in the rule laid down here for them to distinguish by, or, at least, think it may be alluded to. Meditation, and other acts of devotion done by the hidden man of the heart, may be signified by the chewing of the cud, digesting our spiritual food; justice and charity toward men, and the acts of a good conversation, may be signified by the dividing of the hoof. Now either of these, without the other, will not serve to recommend us to God, but both must go together; good affections in the heart, and good works in the life: if either be wanting, we are not clean, surely we are not clean. Of all the creatures here forbidden as unclean, none has been more dreaded and detested by the pious Jews than swine's flesh. Many were put to death by Antiochus, because they would not eat it. This, probably, they were most in danger of being tempted to, and therefore possessed themselves and their children with a particular antipathy to it, calling it not by its proper name, but a strange thing. It should seem the Gentiles used it superstitiously, (Isa. 65. 4.) they eat swine's flesh; and therefore God forbids all use of it to his people, lest they should learn of their neighbours to make that ill use of it. Some suggest that the prohibition of these beasts as unclean was intended to be a caution to the people against the bad qualities of these creatures. We must not be filthy nor wallow in the mire as swine, nor be timorous and faint-hearted as hares, nor dwell in the earth as rabbits; let not man, that is in honour, make himself like these beasts that perish. The law forbade, not only the eating of them, but the very touching of them; for those that would be kept from any sin must be careful to avoid all temptations to it, and every thing that looks towards it, or leads to it.

9. These shall ye eat of all that are in the waters: whatsoever hath fins and scales in the waters, in the seas, and in the rivers, them shall ye eat. 10. And all that have not fins nor scales in the seas, and in the rivers, of all that move in the waters, and of any living thing which is in the waters, they shall be an abomination unto you. 11. They shall be even an abomination unto you; ye shall not eat of their flesh, but ye shall have their carcasses in abomination. 12. Whatsoever hath no fins nor scales in the waters, that shall be an abomination unto you. 13. And these are they which ye shall have in abomination among the fowls, they shall not be eaten, they are an abomination: the eagle, and the ossifrage, and the ospray, 14. And the vulture, and the kite after his kind; 15. Every raven after his kind; 16. And the owl, and the night-hawk, and the cuckow, and the hawk after his kind; 17. And the little owl, and the cormorant, and the great owl; 18. And the swan, and the pelican, and the gier eagle. 19. And the stork, the heron after her kind, and the lapwing, and the bat.

Here is,

1. A general rule concerning fishes, which were clean, and which not. All that had fins and scales they might eat, and were forbidden only those odd sort of water-animals that have not, v. 9, 10. The ancients accounted fish the most delicate food; (so far were they from allowing it on fasting-days, or making it an instance of mortification to eat fish;) therefore God did not lay much restraint upon his people in them; for he is a Master that allows his servants not only for necessity but for delight. Concerning the prohibited fish, it is said, They shall be an abomination to you, (v. 10. . 12.) that is, "Ye shall count them unclean, and not only not eat of them, but keep at a distance from them." Note, Whatever is unclean should be to us an abomination; touch not the unclean thing. But observe, it was to be an abomination only to Jews; the neighbouring nations were under none of these obligations, nor are they to be an abomination to us Christians. The Jews were honoured with peculiar privileges, and therefore, lest they should be proud of those, Transcunt cum onere—They were likewise laid under peculiar restraints. Thus God's spiritual Israel, as they are dignified above others by the gospel-covenant of adoption and friendship, so they must be mortified more than others by the gospel-commands of self-denial and bearing the cross.

2. Concerning fowls here is no general rule given, but a particular enumeration of those fowls that they must abstain from as unclean, which implies an allowance of all others. The critics here have their hands full, to find out what is the true signification of the Hebrew words here used, some of which still remain uncertain; some sort of fowls being particular to some countries. Were the law in force now, we should be concerned to know for certain what are prohibited by it; and perhaps if we did, and were better acquainted with the nature of the fowls here mentioned, we should admire the knowledge of Adam in giving them names expressive of their natures, Gen. 2. 20. But the law being repealed, and the learning in a great measure lost, it is sufficient for us to observe, that of the fowls here forbidden, (1.) Some are birds of prey, as the eagle, vulture, &c. and God would have his people to abhor every thing that is barbarous and cruel, and not to live by blood and rapine. Doves, that are preyed upon, were fit to be food for man, and offerings to God; but kites and hawks, that prey upon them, must be looked upon as an abomination to God and man; for the condition of those that are persecuted for righteousness' sake, appears to an eye of faith every way better than that of their persecutors. (2.) Others of them are solitary birds, that abide in dark and desolate places, as the owl and the pelican, (Ps. 102. 6.) and the cormorant and raven; (Isa. 34. 11.) for God's Israel should not be a melancholy people, nor affect sadness and constant solitude. (3.) Others of them feed upon that which is impure, as the stork on serpents, others of them on worms; and we must not only abstain from all impurity ourselves, but from communion with those that allow themselves in it. (4.) Others of them were used by the Egyptians and other Gentiles in their divinations. Some birds were reckoned fortunate, others ominous; and their soothsayers had great regard to the flights of these birds, all which therefore must be an abomination to God's people, who must not learn the way of the heathen.

20. All fowls that creep, going upon all four, shall be an abomination unto you. 21. Yet these may ye eat of every flying creeping thing that goeth upon all four, which have legs above their feet, to leap wihal upon the earth; 22. Even these of them ye may eat; the locust after his kind, and the bald locust after his kind, and the beetle after his kind, and the grasshopper after his kind. 23. But all other flying creeping things, which have four feet, shall be an abomination unto you. 24. And for these ye shall be unclean: whosoever toucheth the carcase of them shall be unclean until the even. 25. And whosoever beareth ought of the carcase of them shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even. 26. The carcasses of every beast which divideth the hoof, and is not cloven-footed, nor cheweth the cud, are unclean unto you: every one that toucheth them shall be unclean. 27. And whatsoever goeth upon his paws, among all manner of beasts that go on all four, those are unclean unto you: whoso toucheth their carcase shall be unclean until the even. 28. And he that beareth the carcase of them shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even: they are unclean unto you. 29. These also shall be unclean unto you among the creeping things that creep upon the earth; the weasel, and the mouse, and the tortoise after his kind. 30. And the ferret, and the cameleon, and the lizard, and the snail, and the mole. 31. These are unclean to you among all that creep: whosoever doth touch them, when they be dead, shall be unclean until the even. 32. And upon whatsoever any of them, when they are dead, doth fall, it shall be unclean; whether it be any vessel of wood, or raiment, or skin, or sack, whatsoever vessel it be, wherein any work is done, it must be put into water, and it shall be unclean until the even; so it shall be cleansed. 33. And every earthen vessel, whereinto any of them falleth, whatsoever is in it shall be unclean; and ye shall break it. 34. Of all meat which may be eaten, that on which such water cometh shall be unclean:

and all drink that may be drunk in every such vessel shall be unclean. 35. And every thing whereupon any part of their carcase falleth shall be unclean; whether it be oven, or ranges for pots, they shall be broken down; for they are unclean, and shall be unclean unto you. 36. Nevertheless, a fountain or pit, wherein there is plenty of water, shall be clean: but that which toucheth their carcase shall be unclean. 37. And if any part of their carcase fall upon any sowing seed which is to be sown, it shall be clean. 38. But if any water be put upon the seed, and any part of their carcase fall thereon, it shall be unclean unto you. 39. And if any beast, of which ye may eat, die; he that toucheth the carcase thereof shall be unclean until the even. 40. And he that eateth of the carcase of it shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even: he also that beareth the carcase of it shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even. 41. And every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth shall be an abomination; it shall not be eaten. 42. Whatsoever goeth upon the belly, and whatsoever goeth upon all four, or whatsoever hath more feet among all creeping things that creep upon the earth, them ye shall not eat; for they are an abomination.

Here is the law, 1. Concerning flying insects, as flies, wasps, bees, &c. these they might not eat, (v. 20.) nor indeed are they fit to be eaten; but there were several sorts of locusts, which in those countries were very good meat, and much used; John Baptist lived upon them in the desert, and they are here allowed them, v. 21, 22. 2. Concerning the creeping things on the earth, these were all forbidden, (v. 29, 30. and again, v. 41, 42.) for it was the curse of the serpent, that upon his belly he should go; and therefore between him and man there was an enmity put, (Gen. 3. 15.) which was preserved by this law. Dust is the meat of the creeping things, and therefore they are not fit to be man's meat. 3. Concerning the dead carcases of all these unclean animals: (1.) Every one that touched them was to be unclean until the even, v. 24. . 28. This law is often repeated, to possess them with a dread of every thing that was prohibited, though no particular reason for the prohibition did appear, but only the will of the Law-Maker. Not that they were to be looked upon as defiling to the conscience, or that it was a sin against God to touch them, unless done in contempt of the law: in many cases, somebody must, of necessity, touch them, to remove them; but it was a ceremonial uncleanness they contracted, which for the time forbade them to come into the tabernacle, or to eat of any of the holy things, or so much as to converse familiarly with their neighbours. But the uncleanness continued only till the even, to signify that all ceremonial pollutions were to come to an end, by the death of Christ, in the evening of the world. And we must learn, by daily renewing our repentance every night for the sins of the day, to cleanse ourselves from the pollution we contracted by them, that we may not lie down in our uncleanness. Even unclean animals they might touch while they were alive, without contracting any ceremonial uncleanness by it, as horses and dogs, because they were allowed to use them for service; but they might not touch them when they were dead, because they might not eat their flesh: and what must not be eaten must not be touched, Gen. 3. 3. (2.) Even the vessels, or other things, they fell upon, were thereby made unclean until the even, (v. 32.) and, if it was an earthen vessel, it must be broken, v. 33.

This taught them carefully to avoid every thing that was polluting, even in their common actions. Not only the vessels of the sanctuary, but every pot in Jerusalem and Judah, must be Holiness to the Lord, Zech. 14. 20, 21. The laws in these cases are very critical, and the observance of them would be difficult, we should think, if every thing that a dead mouse or rat, for instance, falls upon, must be unclean; if it were an oven, or ranges for pots, they must all be broken down, v. 35. The exceptions also are very nice, v. 36, &c. All which was designed to exercise them to a constant care and exactness in their obedience; and to teach us, who, by Christ, are delivered from these burthensome observances, not to be less circumspect in the more weighty matters of the law. We ought as industriously to preserve our precious souls from the pollutions of sin, and as speedily to cleanse them when they are polluted, as they were to preserve and cleanse their bodies and household goods from those ceremonial pollutions.

43. Ye shall not make yourselves abominable with any creeping thing that creepeth, neither shall ye make yourselves unclean with them, that ye should be defiled thereby. 44. For I am the LORD your God: ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy; for I am holy: neither shall ye defile yourselves with any manner of creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. 45. For I am the LORD that bringeth you up out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: ye shall therefore be holy; for I am holy. 46. This is the law of the beasts, and of the fowl, and of every living creature that moveth in the waters, and of every creature that creepeth upon the earth: 47. To make a difference between the unclean and the clean, and between the beast that may be eaten and the beast that may not be eaten.

Here is,

1. The exposition of this law, or a key to let us into the meaning of it. It was not intended merely for a bill of fare, or as the directions of a physician about their diet, but God would hereby teach them to sanctify themselves, and to be holy, v. 44. That is, (1.) They must hereby learn to put a difference between good and evil, and to reckon it could not be all alike what they did, when it was not all alike what they ate. (2.) To maintain a constant observance of the divine law, and to govern themselves by that in all their actions, even those that are common, which ought to be performed after a godly sort, 3 John, 6. Even eating and drinking must be by rule, and to the glory of God, 1 Cor. 10. 31. (3.) To distinguish themselves from all their neighbours, as a people set apart for God, and obliged not to walk as other Gentiles: and all this is holiness. Thus these rudiments of the world were their tutors and governors, (Gal. 4. 2, 3.) to bring them to that which is the revival of our first state in Adam, and the earnest of our best state with Christ, that is holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord. This is indeed the great design of all the ordinances, that by them we may sanctify ourselves, and learn to be holy. Even this law concerning their food, which seemed to stoop so very low, aimed thus high, for it was the statute-law of heaven under the Old Testament as well as the New, that without holiness no man shall see the Lord. The caution therefore, (v. 43.) is, Ye shall not make yourselves abominable. Note, By having fellowship with sin, which is abominable, we make ourselves abominable. That man is truly miserable who is in the sight of God abominable; and none are so but those that make themselves so. The Jewish writers themselves suggest, that the intention of this law was to forbid them all communion by marriage, or otherwise, with the heathen, Deut. 7. 2, 3. And thus the moral of it is obligatory on us, forbidding us to have fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness; and, without this real holiness of the heart and life, he that offereth an oblation is as if he offered swine's blood; (Isa. 66. 3.) and, if it were such a provocation for a man to eat swine's flesh himself, much more it must be so to offer swine's blood at God's altar: see Prov. 15. 3.

2. The reasons of this law; and they are all taken from the Law-Maker himself, to whom we must have respect in all acts of obedience. (1.) I am the Lord your God, (v. 44.) "Therefore you are bound to do thus, in pure obedience." God's sovereignty over us, and propriety in us, oblige us to do whatever he commands us, how much soever it crosses our inclinations. (2.) I am holy, (v. 44.) and again, v. 45. If God be holy, we must be so, else we cannot expect to be accepted of him. His holiness is his glory, (Exod. 15. 11.) and therefore it becomes his house for ever, Ps. 93. 5. This great precept, thus enforced, though it comes in here in the midst of abrogated laws, is quoted and stamped for a gospel-precept, (1Pet. 1. 16.) where it is intimated that all these ceremonial restraints were designed to teach us that we must not fashion ourselves according to our former lusts in our ignorance, v. 14. (3.) I am the Lord that bringeth you out of the land of Egypt, v. 45. This was a reason why they should cheerfully submit to distinguishing laws, who had of late been so wonderfully dignified with distinguishing favours. He that had done more for them than for any other people, might justly expect more from them.

3. The conclusion of this statute, (v. 46, 47.) This is the law of the beasts, and of the fowl, &c. This law was to them a statute for ever, that is, as long as that economy lasted; but under the gospel we find it expressly repealed by a voice from heaven to Peter, (Acts, 10. 15.) as it had before been virtually set aside by the death of Christ, with the other ordinances that perished in the rising; Touch not, taste not, handle not, Col. 2. 21, 22. And now we are sure that meat commends us not to God, (1 Cor. 8. 8.) and that nothing is unclean of itself, (Rom. 14. 14.) nor does that defile a man which goes into his mouth, but that which comes out from the heart, Matth. 15. 11.

Let us therefore, (1.) Give thanks to God that we are not under this yoke, but that to us every creature of God is allowed as good, and nothing to be refused. (2.) Stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, and take heed of those doctrines which command to abstain from meats, and so would revive Moses again, 1 Tim. 4. 3, 4. (3.) Be strictly and conscientiously temperate in the use of the good creatures God has allowed us. If God's law has given us liberty, let us lay restraints upon ourselves, and never feed ourselves without fear, lest our table be a snare. Set a knife to thy throat, if thou be a man given to appetite; and be not desirous of dainties or varieties, Prov. 23. 2, 3. Nature is content with a little, grace with less, but lust with nothing.

CHAP. XII.

After the laws concerning clean and unclean food, come the laws concerning clean and unclean persons; and the first is in this chapter concerning the ceremonial uncleanness of women in child-birth, v. 1. .5. And concerning their purification from that uncleanness, v. 6. .8.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a woman have conceived seed, and born a man-child: then she shall be unclean seven days; according to the days of the separation for her infirmity shall she be unclean. 3. And in the eighth day the flesh of his foreskin shall be circumcised. 4. And she shall then continue in the blood of her purifying three and thirty days; she shall touch no hallowed thing, nor come into the sanctuary, until the days of her purifying be fulfilled. 5. But if she bear a maid-child, then she shall be unclean two weeks, as in her separation: and she shall continue in the blood of her purifying threescore and six days.

The law here pronounces women lying-in ceremonially unclean. The Jews say, "The law extended even to an abortion, if the child was so formed as that the sex was distinguishable." 1. There was some time of strict separation immediately after the birth, which continued seven days for a son, and fourteen days for a daughter, v. 2, 5. During these days she was separated from her husband and friends, and those that necessarily attended her were ceremonially unclean; which was one reason why the males were not circumcised till the eighth day, because they participated of the mother's pollution, during the days of her separation. 2. There was also a longer time appointed for their purifying; thirty-three days more, (forty in all,) if the birth were a male, and double that time if a female, v. 4, 5. During this time, they were only separated from the sanctuary, and forbidden to eat of the passover, or peace-offerings, or, if a priest's wife, to eat of any thing that was holy to the Lord. Why the time of both those was double for a female to what it was for a male, I can assign no reason but the will of the Law-Maker; in Christ Jesus no difference is made of male and female, Gal. 3. 28. Col. 3. 11. But this ceremonial uncleanness, which the law laid women in child-bed under, was to signify the pollution of sin, which we are all conceived and born in, Ps. 51. 5. For if the root be impure, so is the branch, Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? If sin had not entered, nothing but purity and honour had attended all the productions of that great blessing, Be fruitful and multiply; but now that the nature of man is degenerated, the propagation of that nature is laid under these marks of disgrace, because of the sin and corruption that are propagated with it, and in remembrance of the curse upon the woman that was first in the transgression, That in sorrow (to which it is here further added, in shame) she should bring forth children. And the exclusion of the woman for so many days from the sanctuary, and all participation of the holy things, signified that our original corruption (that sinning sin which we brought into the world with us) would have excluded us for ever from the enjoyment of God and his favours, if he had not graciously provided for our purifying.

6. And when the days of her purifying are fulfilled, for a son, or for a daughter; she shall bring a lamb of the first year for a burnt-offering, and a young pigeon, or a turtle-dove, for a sin-offering, unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, unto the priest: 7. Who shall offer it before the LORD, and make an atonement for her; and she shall be cleansed from the issue of her blood. This is the law for her that hath born a male or a female. 8. And if she be not able to bring a lamb, then she shall bring two turtles, or two young pigeons; the one for the burnt-offering, and the other for a sin-offering; and the priest shall make an atonement for her, and she shall be clean.

A woman that had lain-in, when the time set for her return to the sanctuary was come, was not to attend there empty, but must bring her offerings, v. 6. 1. A burnt-offering; a lamb, if she was able; if poor, a pigeon. This she was to offer in thankfulness to God for his mercy to her, in bringing her safely through the pains of child-bearing, and all the perils of child-bed; and in desire and hopes of God's further favour both to her and to the child. When a child is born, there is joy and there is hope, and therefore it was proper to bring this offering, which was of a general nature; for what we rejoice in we must give thanks for, and what we are in hopes of we must pray for. But beside this, 2. She must offer a sin-offering, which must be the same for poor and rich, a turtle-dove, or a young pigeon; for whatever difference there may be between rich and poor in the sacrifices of acknowledgment, that of atonement is the same for both. This sin-offering was intended, either, (1.) To complete her purification from that ceremonial uncleanness, which, though it was not in itself sinful, yet was typical of moral pollution: or, (2.) To make atonement for that which was really sin, either an inordinate desire of the blessing of children, or discontent or impatience under the pains of child-bearing. It is only by Christ, the great Sin-Offering, that the corruption of our nature is done away, and to that it is owing that we are not for ever excluded by it from the sanctuary, and from eating the holy things.

According to this law, we find that the mother of our blessed Lord, though he was not conceived in sin as others, yet accomplished the days of purification, and then presented her son to the Lord, being a first-born, and brought her own offering, a pair of turtle-doves, Luke, 2.22..24. So poor were Christ's parents, that they were not able to bring a lamb for a burnt-offering; and so early was Christ made under the law to redeem them that were under it. The morality of this law obliges those women that have received mercy from God in child-bearing, with all thankfulness to own God's goodness to them, acknowledging themselves unworthy of it, and (which is the best purification of women that have been saved in child-bearing, 1Tim. 2.15.) to continue in faith, and charity, and holiness, with sobriety; for this shall please the Lord better than the turtle-doves, or the young pigeons.

CHAP. XIII.

The next ceremonial uncleanness is that of the leprosy; concerning which the law was very large and particular; the discovery of it in this chapter, and the cleansing of the leper in the next. Scarcely any one thing in all the levitical law takes up so much room as this: I. Rules are here given, by which the priest must judge whether a man had the leprosy or no, according as the symptom was that appeared. 1. If it was a swelling, a scab, or a bright spot, v. 1..17. 2. If it was a bile, v. 18..23. 3. If it was an inflammation, v. 24..28. 4. If it was in the head or beard, v. 29..37. 5. If it was a bright spot, v. 38,39. 6. If it was a bald head, v. 40..41. II. Direction is given how the leper must be disposed of, v. 45,46. III. Concerning the leprosy in garments, v. 47..59.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses and Aaron, saying, 2. When a man shall have in the skin of his flesh a rising, a scab, or bright spot, and it be in the skin of his flesh like the plague of leprosy; then he shall be brought unto Aaron the priest, or unto one of his sons the priests: 3. And the priest shall look on the plague in the skin of the flesh: and when the hair in the plague is turned white, and the plague in sight be deeper than the skin of his flesh, it is a plague of leprosy: and the priest shall look on him, and pronounce him unclean. 4. If the bright spot be white in the skin of his flesh, and in sight be not deeper than the skin, and the hair thereof be not turned white; then the priest shall shut up him that hath the plague seven days: 5. And the priest shall look on him the seventh day: and, behold, if the plague in his sight be at a stay, and the plague spread not in the skin; then the priest shall shut him up seven days more: 6. And the priest shall look on him again the seventh day: and, behold, if the plague be somewhat dark, and the plague spread not in the skin, the priest shall pronounce him clean: it is but a scab: and he shall wash his clothes, and be clean. 7. But if the scab spread much abroad in the skin, after that he hath been seen of the priest for his cleansing, he shall be seen of the priest again: 8. And if the priest see that, behold, the scab spreadeth in the skin, then the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is a leprosy. 9. When the plague of leprosy is in a man, then he shall be brought unto the priest; 10. And the priest shall see him: and, behold, if the rising be white in the skin, and it have turned the hair white, and there be quick raw flesh in the rising; 11. It is an old leprosy in the skin of his flesh, and the priest shall pronounce him unclean, and shall not shut him up: for he is unclean. 12. And if a leprosy break out abroad in the skin, and the leprosy cover all the skin of him that hath the plague from his head even to his foot, where-soever the priest looketh; 13. Then the priest shall consider: and, behold, if the leprosy have covered all his flesh, he shall pronounce him clean that hath the plague: it is all turned white: he is clean. 14. But when raw flesh appeareth in him, he shall be unclean. 15. And the priest shall see the raw flesh, and pronounce him to be unclean: for the raw flesh is unclean: it is a leprosy. 16. Or if the raw flesh turn again, and be changed unto white, he shall come unto the priest; 17. And the priest shall see him: and, behold, if the plague be turned into white; then the priest shall pronounce him clean that hath the plague: he is clean.

Concerning the plague of leprosy we may observe in general,

1. That it was rather an uncleanness than a disease; or, at least, so the law considered it; and therefore employed not the physicians but the priests about it. Christ is said to cleanse lepers, not to cure them. We do not read of any that died of the leprosy, but it rather buried them alive, by rendering them unfit for conversation with any but such as were infected like themselves. Yet there is a tradition, that Pharaoh, who sought to kill Moses, was the first that ever was struck with this disease, and that he died of it. It is said to have begun first in Egypt, from whence it spread into Syria. It was very well known to Moses, when he put his own hand into his bosom, and took it out leprous.

2. That it was a plague inflicted immediately by the hand of God, and came not from natural causes, as other diseases; and therefore must be managed according to a divine law. Miriam's leprosy, and Gehazi's, and king Uzziah's, were all the punishments of particular sins: and if generally it was so, no marvel there was so much care taken to distinguish it from a common distemper, that none might be looked upon as lying under this extraordinary token of divine displeasure, but those that really were so.

3. That it is a plague now not known in the world; what is commonly called the leprosy is of a quite different nature; this seems reserved as a particular scourge for the sinners of those times and places; the Jews retained the idolatrous customs they had learnt in Egypt, and therefore God justly caused this with some other of the diseases of Egypt to follow them. Yet we read of Naaman the Syrian, who was a leper, 2 Kings, 5. 1.

4. That there were other breakings-out in the body, which did very much resemble the leprosy, but were not it; which might make a man sore and loathsome, and yet not ceremonially unclean. Justly are our bodies called vile bodies, which have in them the seeds of so many diseases, by which the lives of so many are made bitter to them.

5. That the judgment of it was referred to the priests. Lepers were looked upon as stigmatized by the justice of God, and therefore it was left to his servants the priests, who might be presumed to know his mark best, to pronounce who were lepers, and who were not. And the Jews say, "Any priest, though disabled by a blemish to attend the sanctuary, might be judge of the leprosy, provided the blemish were not in his eye. And he might" (they say) "take a common person to assist him in the search, but the priest only must pronounce the judgment."

6. That it was a figure of the moral pollutions of men's minds by sin, which is the leprosy of the soul, defiling to the conscience, and from which Christ alone can cleanse us; for herein the power of his grace infinitely transcends that of the legal priesthood, that the priest could only convict the leper, (for by the law is the knowledge of sin,) but Christ can cure the leper, he can take away sin; Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean; which was more than the priests could do, Matth. 8. 2. Some think that the leprosy signified, not so much sin in general, as a state of sin, by which men are separated from God, their spot not being the spot of God's children; and scandalous sin, for which men are to be shut out from the communion of the faithful. It is a work of great importance, but of great difficulty, to judge of our spiritual state: we have all cause to suspect ourselves, being conscious to ourselves of sores and spots, but whether clean or unclean, is the question. A man might have a scab, (v. 6.) and yet be clean; the best have their infirmities; but as there were certain marks by which to know that it was a leprosy, so there are characters of such as are in the gall of bitterness; and the work of ministers is to declare the judgment of leprosy, and to assist those that suspect themselves, in the trial of their spiritual state, remitting or retaining sin. And hence the keys of the kingdom of heaven are said to be given them, because they are to separate between the precious and the vile, and to judge who are fit, as clean, to partake of the holy things, and who, as unclean, to be debarred them.

Now, (1.) Several rules are here laid down, by which the priest must go, in making his judgment. [1.] If the sore were but skin-deep, it was to be hoped it was not the leprosy, v. 4. But if it was deeper than the skin, the man must be pronounced unclean, v. 3. The infirmities that consist with grace, do not sink deep into the soul, but the mind still serves the law of God, and the inward man delights in it, Rom. 7. 22, 25. But if the matter be really worse than it shews, and the inwards be infected, the case is dangerous. [2.] If the sore be at a stay, and do not spread, it is no leprosy, v. 5, 6. But if it spread much abroad, and continue to do so after several inspections, the case is bad, v. 7, 8. If men do not grow worse, but a stop be put to the course of their sins, and their corruptions be checked, it is to be hoped they will grow better; but if sin get ground, and they become worse every day, they are going down-hill. [3.] If there were proud raw flesh in the rising, the priest needed not to wait any longer, it was certainly a leprosy, v. 10, 11. Nor is there any surer indication of the badness of a man's spiritual state, than the heart's rising in self-conceit, confidence in the flesh, and resistance of the reproofs of the word, and strivings of the Spirit. [4.] If the eruption, whatever it was, covered all the skin from head to foot, it was no leprosy, (v. 12, 13.) for it was an evidence that the vitals were sound and strong, and nature hereby helped itself, throwing out what was burthensome and pernicious. There is hope in the small-pox when they come out well; so if men freely confess their sins, and hide them not; there is no danger comparable to theirs that cover their sins. Some gather this from it, that there is more hope of the profane than the hypocrites. The Publicans and Harlots went into the kingdom of heaven before Scribes and Pharisees. In one respect, the sudden breakings-out of passion, though bad enough, are not so dangerous as malice concealed. Others gather this, That if we judge ourselves, we shall not be judged; if we see and own that there is no health in us, no soundness in our flesh, by reason of sin, we shall find grace in the eyes of the Lord.

(2.) The priest must take time in making his judgment, and not give it rashly. If the matter looked suspicious, he must shut up the patient seven days, and then seven days more, that his judgment might be according to truth. This teaches all, both ministers and people, not to be hasty in their censures, nor to judge any thing before the time. If some men's sins go before unto judgment, the sins of others follow after, and so men's good works; therefore let nothing be done suddenly, 1 Tim. 5. 22, 24, 25.

(3.) If the person suspected were found to be clean, yet he must wash his clothes, (v. 6.) because he had been under the suspicion, and there had been in him that which gave ground for the suspicion. Even the prisoner that is acquitted must go down on his knees. We have need to be washed in the blood of Christ from our spots, though they be not leprosy spots; for who can say, I am pure from sin; though there are those who through grace are innocent from the great transgression.

18. The flesh also, in which, even in the skin thereof, was a bile, and is healed, 19. And in the place of the bile there be a white rising, or a bright spot, white, and somewhat reddish, and it be shewed to the priest; 20. And if, when the priest seeth it, behold, it be in sight lower than the skin, and the hair thereof be turned white; the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is a plague of leprosy broken out of the bile. 21. But if the priest look on it, and, behold, there be no white hairs therein, and if it be not lower than the skin, but be somewhat dark; then the priest shall shut him up seven days: 22. And if it spread much abroad in the skin, then the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is a plague. 23. But if the bright spot stay in his place, and spread not, it is a burning bile; and the priest shall pronounce him clean. 24. Or if there be any flesh, in the skin whereof there is a hot burning, and the quick flesh that burneth have a white bright spot, somewhat reddish, or white; 25. Then the priest shall look upon it: and, behold, if the hair in the bright spot be turned white, and it be in sight deeper than the skin; it is a leprosy broken out of the burning; wherefore the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is the plague of leprosy. 26. But if the priest look on it, and, behold, there be no white hair on the bright spot, and it be no lower than the other skin, but be somewhat dark; then the priest shall shut him up seven days: 27. And the priest shall look upon him the seventh day: and if it be spread much abroad in the skin, then the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is the plague of leprosy. 28. And if the bright spot stay in his place, and spread not in the skin, but it be somewhat dark: it is a rising of the burning, and the priest shall pronounce him clean: for it is an inflammation of the burning. 29. If a man or woman hath a plague upon the head or the beard; 30. Then the priest shall see the plague: and, behold, if it be in sight deeper than the skin; and there be in it a yellow thin hair; then the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is a dry scall, even a leprosy upon the head or beard. 31. And if the priest look on the plague of the scall, and, behold, it be not in sight deeper than the skin, and that there is no black hair in it; then the priest shall shut up him that hath the plague of the scall seven days: 32. And in the seventh day the priest shall look on the plague: and, behold, if the scall spread not, and there be in it no yellow hair, and the scall be not in sight deeper than the skin; 33. He shall be shaven, but the scall shall he not shave; and the priest shall shut up him that hath the scall seven days more: 34. And in the seventh day the priest shall look on the scall: and, behold, if the scall be not spread in the skin, nor be in sight deeper than the skin; then the priest shall pronounce him clean: and he shall wash his clothes, and be clean. 35. But if the scall spread much in the skin after his cleansing; 36. Then the priest shall look on him: and, behold, if the scall be spread in the skin, the priest shall not seek for yellow hair; he is unclean. 37. But if the scall be in his sight at a stay, and that there is black hair grown up therein; the scall is healed, he is clean: and the priest shall pronounce him clean.

The priest is here instructed what judgment to make if there were any appearance of a leprosy, either, 1. In an old ulcer, or bile, that has been healed, v. 18, &c. When old sores, that seemed to have been cured, break out again, it is to be feared there is a leprosy in them; such is the danger of those who, having escaped the pollutions of the world, are again entangled therein, and overcome. Or, 2. In a burn by accident, for that seems to be meant, v. 24, &c. The burning of strife and contention often proves the occasion of the rising up and breaking out of that corruption, which witnesses to men's faces that they are unclean. 3. In a scall-head. And in this commonly the judgment turned upon a very small matter. If the hair in the scall was black, it was a sign of soundness; if yellow, it was an indication of a leprosy, v. 30..37. The other rules in these cases are the same with those mentioned before.

In reading these several sorts of ailments, it will be good for us, (1.) To lament the calamitous state of human life, which lies exposed to so many grievances. What troops of diseases are we beset with on every side; and they all entered by sin. (2.) To give thanks to God, if he has never afflicted us with any of these sores; if the constitution is healthful, and the body lively and easy, we are bound to glorify God with our bodies.

38. If a man also or a woman have in the skin of their flesh bright spots, even white bright spots; 39. Then the priest shall look; and, behold, if the bright spots in the skin of their flesh be darkish white; it is a freckled spot that groweth in the skin: he is clean. 40. And the man whose hair is fallen off his head, he is bald; yet is he clean. 41. And he that hath his hair fallen off from the part of his head toward his face, he is forehead-bald; yet is he clean. 42. And if there be in the bald head, or bald forehead, a white reddish sore; it is a leprosy sprung up in his bald head, or his bald forehead. 43. Then the priest shall look upon it: and, behold, if the rising of the sore be white reddish in his bald head, or in his bald forehead, as the leprosy appeareth in the skin of the flesh; 44. He is a leprous man, he is unclean: the priest shall pronounce him utterly unclean; his plague is in his head. 45. And the leper in whom the plague is, his clothes shall be rent, and his head bare, and he shall put a covering upon his upper lip, and shall cry, Unclean, unclean. 46. All the days wherein the plague shall be in him he shall be defiled; he is unclean: he shall dwell alone, without the camp shall his habitation be.

We have,

1. Provisos, that neither a freckled skin nor a bald head should be mistaken for a leprosy, v. 38..41. Every deformity must not forthwith be made a ceremonial defilement. Elisha was jeered for his bald head, (2 Kings, 2. 23.) but they were the children of Bethel who turned it to his reproach, that knew not the judgments of their God.

2. A particular brand set upon the leprosy, if at any time it did appear in a bald head, v. 44. The plague is in his head, he is utterly unclean. If the leprosy of sin have seized the head, if the judgment be corrupted, and wicked principles, which countenance and support wicked practices, be embraced, it is an utter uncleanness, from which few are ever cleansed. Soundness in the faith keeps the leprosy from the head, and saves conscience from being shipwrecked.

3. Directions what must be done with the convicted leper. When the priest, upon mature deliberation, had solemnly pronounced him unclean, (1.) He must pronounce himself so, v. 45. He must put himself into the posture of a mourner, and cry, Unclean, unclean. The leprosy was not itself a sin, but it was a sad token of God's displeasure, and a sore affliction to him that was under it. It was a reproach to his name, put a full stop to his business in the world, cut him off from conversation with his friends and relations, condemned him to banishment till he was cleansed, shut him out from the sanctuary, and was, in effect, the ruin of all the comfort he could have in this world. Heman, it would seem, either was a leper, or alludes to the melancholy condition of a leper, Ps. 88. 8, &c. He must therefore, [1.] Humble himself under the mighty hand of God, not insisting upon his cleanness, when the priest had pronounced him unclean, but justifying God, and accepting the punishment of his iniquity. He must signify this, by rending his clothes, uncovering his head, and covering his upper lip; all tokens of shame and confusion of face, and very significant of that self-loathing and self-abasement which should fill the hearts of penitents, the language of which is self-judging. Thus must we take to ourselves the shame that belongs to us, and with broken hearts call ourselves by our own name, unclean, unclean; heart unclean, life unclean; unclean by original corruption, unclean by actual transgression; unclean, and therefore worthy to be for ever excluded from communion with God, and all hope of happiness in him. We are all as an unclean thing; (Isa. 64. 6.) unclean, and therefore undone, if infinite mercy do not interpose. [2.] He must give warning to others to take heed of coming near him. Whichever he went, he must cry to those he saw at a distance, "I am unclean, unclean, take heed of touching me." Not that the leprosy was catching, but by the touch of a leper ceremonial un-cleanness was contracted. Every one therefore was concerned to avoid it; and the leper himself must give notice of the danger. And this was all that the law could do, in that it was weak through the flesh; it taught the leper to cry, Unclean, unclean, but the gospel has put another cry into the lepers' mouths, (Luke, 17. 12, 13.) where we find ten lepers crying with a loud voice, Jesus, Master, have mercy on us. The law only shews us our disease, the gospel shews us our help in Christ. (2.) He must then be shut out of the camp, and afterward, when they came to Canaan, out of the city, town, or village, where he lived, and dwell alone, (v. 46.) associating with none but those that were lepers like himself. When king Uzziah became a leper, he was banished his palace, and dwelt in a several house, 2 Chron. 26. 21. And see 2 Kings, 7. 3. This typified the purity which ought to be preserved in the gospel-church, by the solemn and authoritative exclusion of scandalous sinners, that hate to be reformed, from the communion of the faithful; Put away from among yourselves that wicked person, 1 Cor. 5. 13.

47. The garment also that the plague of leprosy is in, whether it be a woollen garment, or a linen garment; 48. Whether it be in the warp, or woof; of linen, or of woollen; whether in a skin, or in any thing made of skin; 49. And if the plague be greenish or reddish in the garment, or in the skin, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in any thing of skin; it is a plague of leprosy, and shall be shewed unto the priest: 50. And the priest shall look upon the plague, and shut up it that hath the plague seven days: 51. And he shall look on the plague on the seventh day: if the plague be spread in the garment, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in a skin, or in any work that is made of skin; the plague is a fretting leprosy; it is unclean. 52. He shall therefore burn that garment, whether warp or woof, in woollen or in linen, or any thing of skin, wherein the plague is: for it is a fretting leprosy; it shall be burnt in the fire. 53. And if the priest shall look, and, behold, the plague be not spread in the garment, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in any thing of skin; 54. Then the priest shall command that they wash the thing wherein the plague is, and he shall shut it up seven days more. 55. And the priest shall look on the plague, after that it is washed: and, behold, if the plague have not changed his colour, and the plague be not spread; it is unclean; thou shalt burn it in the fire; it is fret inward, whether it be bare within or without. 56. And if the priest look, and, behold, the plague be somewhat dark after the washing of it; then he shall rend it out of the garment, or out of the skin, or out of the warp, or out of the woof: 57. And if it appear still in the garment, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in any thing of skin; it is a spreading plague: thou shalt burn that wherein the plague is with fire. 58. And the garment, either warp, or woof, or whatsoever thing of skin it be, which thou shalt wash, if the plague be departed from them, then it shall be washed the second time, and shall be clean. 59. This is the law of the plague of leprosy in a garment of woollen or linen, either in the warp, or woof, or any thing of skins, to pronounce it clean, or to pronounce it unclean.

This is the law concerning the plague of leprosy in a garment, whether linen or woollen. A leprosy in a garment, with discernible indications of it, the colour changed by it, the garment fretted, the nap worn off, and this in some one particular part of the garment, and increasing when it was shut up, and not to be got out by washing, is a thing which to us now is altogether unaccountable. The learned confess that it was a sign and a miracle in Israel, an extraordinary punishment inflicted by the divine power, as a token of great displeasure against a person or family. 1. The process was much the same with that concerning a leprous person. The garment suspected to be tainted was not to be burnt immediately, though, it may be, there would have been no great loss of it; for in no case must sentence be given merely upon a surmise, but it must be shewed to the priest. If, upon search, it was found that there was a leprous spot, (the Jews say, no bigger than a bean,) it must be burnt, or, at least, that part of the garment in which the spot was, v. 52, 57. If the cause of the suspicion was gone, it must be washed, and then might be used, v. 53. 2. The signification also was much the same, to intimate the great malignity there is in sin: it not only defiles the sinner's conscience, but it brings a stain upon all his employments and enjoyments, all he has, and all he does. To them that are defiled and unbelieving is nothing pure, Tit. 1. 15. And we are taught hereby to hate even the garments spotted with the flesh, Jude, v. 23. Those that make their clothes servants to their pride and lust, may see them thereby tainted with a leprosy, and doomed to the fire, Isa. 3. 18.. 24. But the ornament of the hidden man of the heart is incorruptible, 1 Pet. 3. 4. The robes of righteousness never fret, nor are moth-eaten.

CHAP. XIV.

The former chapter directed the priests now to convict a leper of ceremonial uncleanness; no prescriptions are given for his cure; but, when God had cured him, the priests are in this chapter directed how to cleanse him. The remedy here is only adapted to the ceremonial part of his disease; but the authority Christ gave to his ministers, was, to cure the lepers, and so to cleanse them. We have here, I. The solemn declaration of the leper's being clean, with the significant ceremony attending it, v. 1..9. II. The sacrifices which he was to offer to God eight days after, v. 10..32. III. The management of a house in which appeared signs of a leprosy, v. 33..53. And the conclusion and summary of this whole matter, v. 54..57.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. This shall be the law of the leper in the day of his cleansing: He shall be brought unto the priest: 3. And the priest shall go forth out of the camp; and the priest shall look, and, behold, if the plague of leprosy be healed in the leper; 4. Then shall the priest command to take for him that is to be cleansed, two birds alive, and clean, and cedar-wood, and scarlet, and hyssop: 5. And the priest shall command that one of the birds be killed in an earthen vessel over running water: 6. As for the living bird, he shall take it, and the cedar-wood, and the scarlet, and the hyssop, and shall dip them and the living bird in the blood of the bird that was killed over the running water: 7. And he shall sprinkle upon him that is to be cleansed from the leprosy seven times, and shall pronounce him clean, and shall let the living bird loose into the open field. 8. And he that is to be cleansed shall wash his clothes, and shave off all his hair, and wash himself in water, that he may be clean: and after that he shall come into the camp, and shall tarry abroad out of his tent seven days. 9. But it shall be on the seventh day, that he shall shave all his hair off his head, and his beard, and his eye-brows, even all his hair he shall shave off: and he shall wash his clothes, also he shall wash his flesh in water, and he shall be clean.

Here,

I. It is supposed that the plague of the leprosy was not an incurable disease. Uzziah's indeed continued to the day of his death, and Gehazi's was entailed upon his seed; but Miriam's lasted only seven days: we may suppose that it often wore off in process of time; though God contend long, he will not contend for ever.

II. The judgment of the cure, as well as that of the disease, was referred to the priest. He must go out of the camp to the leper, to see whether his leprosy was healed, v. 3. And we may suppose the priest did not contract any ceremonial uncleanness by coming near the leper, as another person would. It was in mercy to the poor lepers that the priests particularly had orders to attend them, for the priests' lips should keep knowledge; and those in affliction had need to be instructed, both how to bear their afflictions, and how to reap benefit by them; had need of the word in concurrence with the rod to bring them to repentance: therefore it is well for those that are sick, if they have these messengers of the Lord of Hosts with them, these interpreters, to shew unto them God's uprightness, Job, 33. 23. When the leper was shut out, and could not go to the priests, it was well that the priests might come to him. Is any sick? Let him send for the elders, the ministers, Jam. 5. 14. If we apply it to the spiritual leprosy of sin, it intimates, that, when we withdraw from those who walk disorderly, that they may be ashamed, we must not count them as enemies, but admonish them as brethren, 2 Thess. 3. 15; and also that when God by his grace has brought those to repentance who were shut out of communion for scandal, they ought with tenderness, and joy, and sincere affection, to be received in again. Thus Paul orders concerning the excommunicated Corinthian, that, when he had given evidences of his repentance, they should forgive him, and comfort him, and confirm their love towards him, 2 Cor. 2. 7, 8. And ministers are intrusted by our Master with the declarative power of loosing as well as binding; both must be done with great caution and deliberation, impartially and without respect of persons, with earnest prayer to God for direction, and a sincere regard to the edification of the Body of Christ; due care being always taken that sinners may not be encouraged by an excess of lenity, nor penitents discouraged by an excess of severity. Wisdom and sincerity are profitable to direct in this case.

III. If it were found that the leprosy was healed, the priest must declare it with a particular solemnity. The leper or his friends were to get ready two birds caught for this purpose, (any sort of wild birds that were clean,) and cedar-wood, and scarlet, and hyssop; for all these were to be used in the ceremony.

1. A preparation was to be made of blood and water, with which the leper must be sprinkled. One of the birds (and the Jews say, if there was any difference, it must be the larger and better of the two) was to be killed over an earthen cup of spring water, so that the blood of the bird might discolour the water. This (as some other types) had its accomplishment in the death of Christ, when out of his pierced side there came water and blood, John, 19. 34. Thus Christ comes into the soul for its cure and cleansing, not by water only, but by water and blood, 1 John, 5. 6.

2. The living bird, with a little scarlet wool, and a bunch of hyssop, must be fastened to a cedar-stick, dipped in the water and blood, which must be so sprinkled upon him that was to be cleansed, v. 6, 7. The cedar-wood signified the restoring of the leper to his strength and soundness, for that is a sort of wood not apt to putrefy. The scarlet wool signified his recovering a florid colour again, for the leprosy made him white as snow. And the hyssop intimated the removing of the disagreeable scent which commonly attended the leprosy. The cedar the stateliest plant, and hyssop the meanest, are here used together in this service: (see 1 Kings, 4. 33.) for those of the lowest rank in the church may be of use in their place, as well as those that are most eminent, 1 Cor. 12. 21. Some make the slain bird to typify Christ dying for our sins, and the living bird Christ rising again for our justification. The dipping of the living bird in the blood of the slain bird intimated that the merit of Christ's death was that which made his resurrection effectual for our justification. He took his blood with him into the holy place, and there appeared a lamb as it had been slain. The cedar, scarlet, and hyssop, must all be dipped in the blood; for the word and ordinances, and all the operations of the Spirit, receive their efficacy for our cleansing from the blood of Christ. The leper must be sprinkled seven times, to signify a complete purification; in allusion to which David prays, Wash me thoroughly, Ps. 51. 2. Naaman was bid to wash seven times, 2 Kings, 5. 10.

3. The living bird was then to be let loose in the open field, to signify that the leper, being cleansed, was now no longer under restraint and confinement, but might take his liberty to go where he pleased. But this being signified by the flight of a bird toward heaven, was an intimation to him henceforward to seek the things that are above, and not to spend this new life, to which God had restored him, merely in the pursuit of earthly things. This typified that glorious liberty of the children of God, which they are advanced to who through grace are sprinkled from an evil conscience. They whose souls before bowed down to the dust, (Ps. 44. 25.) in grief and fear, now fly in the open firmament of heaven, and soar upward upon the wings of faith and hope, and holy love and joy.

4. The priest must, upon this, pronounce him clean. It was requisite that this should be done with solemnity, that the leper might himself be the more affected with the mercy of God to him in his recovery, and that others might be satisfied to converse with him. Christ is our Priest, to whom the Father has committed all judgment, and particularly the judgment of the leprosy. By his definitive sentence impenitent sinners will have their everlasting portion assigned them with the unclean, (Job, 36. 14.) out of the holy city; and all that by his grace are cured and cleansed, shall be received into the camp of his saints, into which no unclean thing shall enter. Those are clean indeed whom Christ pronounces so, and they need not regard what men say of them. But though Christ was the End of this law for righteousness, yet being in the days of his flesh made under the law, which as yet stood unrepealed, he ordered those lepers whom he had cured miraculously, to go and shew themselves to the priest, and offer for their cleansing according to the law, Matth. 8. 4. Luke, 17. 14. The type must be kept up till it was answered by its antitype.

Lastly, When the leper was pronounced clean, he must wash his body and his clothes, and shave off all his hair, (v. 8.) must still tarry seven days out of the camp, and on the seventh day must do it again, v. 9. The priest having pronounced him clean from the disease, he must make himself as clean as ever he could from all the remains of it, and from all other defilements, and he must take time to do this. Thus they who have the comfort of the remission of their sins, by the sprinkling of the blood of Christ upon their consciences, must with the utmost care and caution cleanse themselves from all filthiness both of flesh and spirit, and thoroughly purge themselves from their old sins: for every one that hath this hope in him will be concerned to purify himself.

10. And on the eighth day he shall take two he-lambs without blemish, and one ewe-lamb of the first year without blemish, and three tenth-deals of fine flour for a meat-offering, mingled with oil, and one log of oil. 11. And the priest that maketh him clean shall present the man that is to be made clean, and those things, before the LORD, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: 12. And the priest shall take one he-lamb, and offer him for a trespass-offering, and the log of oil, and wave them for a wave-offering before the LORD: 13. And he shall slay the lamb in the place where he shall kill the sin-offering and the burnt-offering, in the holy place: for as the sin-offering is the priest's, so is the trespass-offering: it is most holy. 14. And the priest shall take some of the blood of the trespass-offering, and the priest shall put it upon the tip of the right ear of him that is to be cleansed, and upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of his right foot: 15. And the priest shall take some of the log of oil, and pour it into the palm of his own left hand: 16. And the priest shall dip his right finger in the oil that is in his left hand, and shall sprinkle of the oil with his finger seven times before the LORD. 17. And of the rest of the oil that is in his hand shall the priest put upon the tip of the right ear of him that is to be cleansed, and upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of his right foot, upon the blood of the trespass-offering: 18. And the remnant of the oil that is in the priest's hand he shall pour upon the head of him that is to be cleansed: and the priest shall make an atonement for him before the LORD. 19. And the priest shall offer the sin-offering, and make an atonement for him that is to be cleansed from his uncleanness; and afterward he shall kill the burnt-offering: 20. And the priest shall offer the burnt-offering and the meat-offering upon the altar: and the priest shall make an atonement for him, and he shall be clean.

To complete the purification of the leper, on the eighth day, after the former solemnity performed without the camp, and, as it should seem, before he returned to his own habitation, he was to attend at the door of the tabernacle, and was there to be presented to the Lord, with his offerings, v. 11. Observe here, 1. That the mercies of God oblige us to present ourselves to him, Rom. 12. 1. 2. When God has restored us to the liberty of ordinances again, after restraint by sickness, distance, or otherwise, we should take the first opportunity of testifying our respect to God, and our affection to his sanctuary, by a diligent improvement of the liberty we are restored to. When Christ had healed the impotent man, he soon after found him in the temple, John, 5. 14. When Hezekiah asks, What is the sign that I shall go up to the house of the Lord? He means, "What is the sign that I shall recover?" Intimating, that, if God restored him his health, so that he should be able to go abroad, the house of the Lord should be the first place he would go to. 3. When we present ourselves before the Lord, we must present our offerings, devoting to God with ourselves all we have and can do. 4. Both we and our offerings must be presented before the Lord, by the Priest that made us clean, even our Lord Jesus, else neither we nor they can be accepted.

Three lambs the cleansed leper was to bring, with a meat-offering, and a log of oil, which was about half a pint.

Now,

(1.) Most of the ceremony peculiar to this case was about the trespass-offering, the lamb for which was offered first, v. 12. And, beside the usual rites with which the trespass-offering was offered, some of the blood was to be put upon the ear, and thumb, and great toe of the leper that was to be cleansed, v. 14. The very same ceremony that was used in the consecration of the priests, ch. 8. 23, 24. It was a mortification to them to see the same purification necessary for them that was for a leper. The Jews say, that the leper stood without the gate of the tabernacle, and the priest within, and thus the ceremony was performed through the gate, signifying that now he was admitted with other Israelites to attend in the courts of the Lord's house again, and was as welcome as ever; though he had been a leper, and though perhaps the name might stick by him as long as he lived, (as we read of one who, probably, was cleansed by our Lord Jesus, who yet afterward is called Simon the leper, Matth. 26. 6.) yet he was as freely admitted as ever to communion with God and man. After the blood of the offering had been put with the priest's finger upon the extremities of the body, to include the whole, some of the oil that he brought, which was first waved, and then sprinkled before the Lord, was in like manner put in the same places upon the blood. "The blood" (says the learned Bishop Patrick) "seems to have been a token of forgiveness; the oil, of healing;" for God first forgiveth our iniquities, and then healeth our diseases, Ps. 103. 3. See Isa. 38. 17. Wherever the blood of Christ is applied for justification, the oil of the Spirit is applied for sanctification; for these two are inseparable, and both necessary to our acceptance with God. Nor shall our former leprosy, if it be healed by repentance, be any bar to these glorious privileges. Cleansed lepers are as welcome to the blood and the oil as consecrated priests. Such were some of you, but ye are washed. When the leper was sprinkled, the water must have blood in it; (v. 5.) when he was anointed, the oil must have blood under it, to signify that all the graces and comforts of the Spirit, all his purifying dignifying influences, are owing to the death of Christ: it is by his blood alone that we are sanctified.

(2.) Beside this, there must be a sin-offering and a burnt-offering, a lamb for each, v. 19, 20. By each of these offerings, it is said, the priests shall make an atonement for him. [1.] His moral guilt shall be removed; the sin for which the leprosy was sent shall be pardoned, and all the sins he had been guilty of in his afflicted state. Note, The removal of any outward trouble is then doubly comfortable to us, when at the same time God gives us some assurance of the forgiveness of our sins. If we receive the atonement, we have reason to rejoice, Rom. 5. 11. [2.] His ceremonial pollution shall be removed, which had kept him from the participation of the holy things. And this is called making an atonement for him, because our restoration to the privileges of God's children, typified hereby, is owing purely to the great Propitiation. When the atonement is made for him, he shall be clean, both to his own satisfaction, and to his reputation among his neighbours; he shall retrieve both his credit and his comfort; and both these true penitents become entitled to, both ease and honour, by their interest in the atonement. The burnt-offering, beside the atonement that was made by it, was a thankful acknowledgment of God's mercy to him: and the more immediate the hand of God was both in the sickness and in the cure, the more reason he had thus to give glory to him; and thus, as our Saviour speaks, (Mark, 1. 44.) to offer for his cleansing all those things which Moses commanded for a testimony unto them.

21. And if he be poor, and cannot get so much; then he shall take one lamb for a trespass-offering to be waved, to make an atonement for him, and one tenth-deal of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering, and a log of oil; 22. And two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, such as he is able to get; and the one shall be a sin-offering, and the other a burnt-offering. 23. And he shall bring them on the eighth day for his cleansing unto the priest, unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, before the LORD. 24. And the priest shall take the lamb of the trespass-offering, and the log of oil, and the priest shall wave them for a wave-offering before the LORD: 25. And he shall kill the lamb of the trespass-offering, and the priest shall take some of the blood of the trespass-offering, and put it upon the tip of the right ear of him that is to be cleansed, and upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of his right foot: 26. And the priest shall pour of the oil into the palm of his own left hand; 27. And the priest shall sprinkle with his right finger some of the oil that is in his left hand seven times before the LORD: 28. And the priest shall put of the oil that is in his hand upon the tip of the right ear of him that is to be cleansed, and upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of his right foot, upon the place of the blood of the trespass-offering: 29. And the rest of the oil that is in the priest's hand he shall put upon the head of him that is to be cleansed, to make an atonement for him before the LORD. 30. And he shall offer the one of the turtle-doves, or of the young pigeons, such as he can get; 31. Even such as he is able to get, the one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering, with the meat-offering: And the priest shall make an atonement for him that is to be cleansed before the LORD. 32. This is the law of him in whom is the plague of leprosy, whose hand is not able to get that which pertaineth to his cleansing.

We have here the gracious provision which the law made for the cleansing of poor lepers. If they were not able to bring three lambs, and three tenth-deals of flour, they must bring one lamb, and one-tenth deal of flour; and, instead of the other two lambs, two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, v. 21, 22. Here see, 1. That the poverty of the person concerned would not excuse him, if he brought no offering at all. Let none think, that, because they are poor, God requires no service from them, since he has considered them, and demands that which it is in the power of the poorest to give. "My son, give me thy heart, and with that the calves of thy lips shall be accepted instead of the calves of the stall." 2. That God expected from those who were poor only according to their ability; his commandments are not grievous, nor does he make us to serve with an offering. The poor are as welcome to God's altar as the rich; and if there be first a willing mind, and an honest heart, two pigeons, when they are the utmost a man is able to get, are as acceptable to God as two lambs; for he requires according to what a man has, and not according to what he has not. But it is observable, that though a meaner sacrifice was accepted from the poor, yet the very same ceremony was used for them as was for the rich; for their souls are as precious, and Christ and his gospel are the same to both. Let not us therefore have the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ with respect of persons, Jam. 2. 1.

33. And the LORD spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, 34. When ye be come into the land of Canaan, which I give to you for a possession, and I put the plague of leprosy in a house of the land of your possession; 35. And he that owneth the house shall come and tell the priest, saying, It seemeth to me there is as it were a plague in the house: 36. Then the priest shall command that they empty the house, before the priest go into it to see the plague, that all that is in the house be not made unclean: and afterward the priest shall go in to see the house: 37. And he shall look on the plague, and, behold, if the plague be in the walls of the house with hollow strakes, greenish or reddish, which in sight are lower than the wall; 38. Then the priest shall go out of the house to the door of the house, and shut up the house seven days: 39. And the priest shall come again the seventh day, and shall look: and, behold, if the plague be spread in the walls of the house; 40. Then the priest shall command that they take away the stones in which the plague is, and they shall cast them into an unclean place without the city: 41. And he shall cause the house to be scraped within round about, and they shall pour out the dust that they scrape off without the city into an unclean place: 42. And they shall take other stones, and put them in the place of those stones; and he shall take other mortar, and shall plaster the house. 43. And if the plague come again, and break out in the house, after that he hath taken away the stones, and after he hath scraped the house, and after it is plastered; 44. Then the priest shall come and look, and, behold, if the plague be spread in the house, it is a fretting leprosy in the house: it is unclean. 45. And he shall break down the house, the stones of it, and the timber thereof, and all the mortar of the house; and he shall carry them forth out of the city into an unclean place. 46. Moreover, he that goeth into the house all the while that it is shut up shall be unclean until the even. 47. And he that lieth in the house shall wash his clothes; and he that eateth in the house shall wash his clothes. 48. And if the priest shall come in, and look upon it, and, behold, the plague hath not spread in the house, after the house was plastered: then the priest shall pronounce the house clean, because the plague is healed. 49. And he shall take to cleanse the house two birds, and cedar-wood, and scarlet, and hyssop: 50. And he shall kill the one of the birds in an earthen vessel over running water: 51. And he shall take the cedar-wood, and the hyssop, and the scarlet, and the living bird, and dip them in the blood of the slain bird, and in the running water, and sprinkle the house seven times: 52. And he shall cleanse the house with the blood of the bird, and with the running water, and with the living bird, and with the cedar-wood, and with the hyssop, and with the scarlet: 53. But he shall let go the living bird out of the city into the open fields, and make an atonement for the house; and it shall be clean.

This is the law concerning the leprosy in a house. Now that they were in the wilderness, they dwelt in tents, and had no houses; and therefore this law is made only an appendix to the former laws concerning the leprosy, because it related, not to their present state, but to their future settlement.

The leprosy in a house is as unaccountable as the leprosy in a garment; but, if we see not what natural causes of it can be assigned, we may resolve it into the power of the God of nature, who here says, I put the leprosy in a house, (v. 34.) as his curse is said to enter into a house, and consume it with the timber and stones thereof, Zech. 5. 4.

Now, 1. It is supposed, that, even in Canaan itself, the land of promise, their houses might be infected with a leprosy. Though it was a holy land, that would not secure them from this plague, while the inhabitants were many of them so unholy. Thus, a place and a nation in the visible church will not secure wicked people from God's judgments.

2. It is likewise taken for granted that the owner of the house will make the priest acquainted with it, as soon as he sees the least cause to suspect the leprosy in his house; (v. 35.) It seemeth to me there is as it were a plague in the house. Sin, where that reigns in a house, is a plague there as it is in a heart. And masters of families should be aware and afraid of the first appearance of gross sin in their families, and put away the iniquity, whatever it is, far from their tabernacles, Job, 22. 23. They should be jealous with a godly jealousy concerning those under their charge, lest they be drawn into sin, and take early advice, if it but seem that there is a plague in the house, lest the contagion spread, and many be by it defiled and destroyed.

3. If the priest, upon search, find that the leprosy is got into the house, he must try to cure it, by taking out that part of the building that was infected, v. 40, 41. This was like cutting off a gangrened limb, for the preservation of the rest of the body. Corruption should be purged out in time, before it spread; for a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off.

4. If yet it remained in the house, the whole house must be pulled down, and all the materials carried to the dunghill, v. 44, 45. The owner had better be without a dwelling, than live in one that was infected. Note, The leprosy of sin, if it be obstinate under the methods of cure, will at last be the ruin of families and churches. If Babylon will not be healed, she shall be forsaken and abandoned, and (according to the law respecting the leprous house) they shall not take of her a stone for a corner, nor a stone for foundations, Jer. 51. 9, 26. The remainders of sin and corruption in our mortal bodies are like this leprosy in the house; after all our pains in scraping and plastering, we shall never be quite clear of it till the earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved and taken down; when we are dead, we shall be free from sin, and not till then, Rom. 6. 7.

5. If the taking out of the infected stones cured the house, and the leprosy did not spread any further, then the house must be cleansed; not only aired, that it might be healthful, but purified from the ceremonial pollution, that it might be fit to be the habitation of an Israelite. The ceremony of its cleansing was much the same with that of cleansing a leprous person, v. 49, &c. This intimated that the house was smitten for the man's sake, (as Bishop Patrick expresses it,) and he was to look upon himself as preserved by divine mercy. The houses of Israelites are said to be dedicated, (Deut. 20. 5.) for they were a holy nation, and therefore they ought to keep their houses pure from all ceremonial pollutions, that they might be fit for the service of that God to whom they were devoted. And the same care should be taken to reform whatever is amiss in our families, that we and our houses may serve the Lord: see Gen. 35. 2.

Some have thought the leprosy in the house was typical of the idolatry of the Jewish church, which did strangely cleave to it; for, though some of the reforming kings took away the infected stones, yet still it broke out again, till, by the captivity of Babylon, God took down the house, and carried it to an unclean land; and that proved an effectual cure of their inclination to idols and idolatrous worships.

54. This is the law for all manner of plague of leprosy, and scall, 55. And for the leprosy of a garment, and of a house, 56. And for a rising, and for a scab, and for a bright spot: 57. To teach when it is unclean, and when it is clean: this is the law of leprosy.

This is the conclusion of this law concerning the leprosy. There is no repetition of it in Deuteronomy, only a general memorandum given, (Deut. 24. 8.) Take heed in the plague of leprosy. We may see in this law, 1. The gracious care God took of his people Israel, for to them only his law pertained, and not to the Gentiles. When Naaman the Syrian was cured of his leprosy, he was not hidden to shew himself to the priest, though he was cured in Jordan, as the Jews that were cured by our Saviour were. Thus they who are intrusted with the key of discipline in the church, judge them only that are within; but them that are without, God judgeth, 1 Cor. 5. 12, 13. 2. The religious care we ought to take of ourselves, to keep our minds from the dominion of all sinful affections and dispositions, which are both their disease and their defilement, that we may be fit for the service of God. We ought also to avoid all bad company, and, as much as may be, to avoid coming within the danger of being infected by it. Touch not the unclean thing, saith the Lord, and I will receive you, 2 Cor. 6. 17.

CHAP. XV.

In this chapter, we have laws concerning other ceremonial uncleanness contracted, either by bodily disease like that of the leper, or some natural incidents; and this either, I. In men, v. 1. 18. Or. II. In women, v. 19. 33. We need not be at all curious in explaining these antiquated laws, it is enough if we observe the general intention; but we have need to be very cautious, lest sin take occasion by the commandment to become more exceeding sinful; and exceeding sinful it is, when lust is kindled by sparks of fire from God's altar. The case is bad with the soul when it is putrefied by that which should purify it.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses and to Aaron, saying, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When any man hath a running issue out of his flesh, because of his issue he is unclean. 3. And this shall be his uncleanness in his issue: whether his flesh run with his issue, or his flesh be stopped from his issue, it is his uncleanness. 4. Every bed whereon he lieth that hath the issue, is unclean: and every thing whereon he sitteth, shall be unclean. 5. And whosoever toucheth his bed shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. 6. And he that sitteth on any thing whereon he sat that hath the issue shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. 7. And he that toucheth the flesh of him that hath the issue shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. 8. And if he that hath the issue spit upon him that is clean; then he shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. 9. And what saddle soever he rideth upon that hath the issue shall be unclean. 10. And whosoever toucheth any thing that was under him shall be unclean until the even: and he that beareth any of those things shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. 11. And whomsoever he toucheth that hath the issue, (and hath not rinsed his hands in water,) he shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. 12. And the vessel of earth, that he toucheth which hath the issue, shall be broken: and every vessel of wood shall be rinsed in water. 13. And when he that hath an issue is cleansed of his issue; then he shall number to himself seven days for his cleansing, and wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh in running water, and shall be clean. 14. And on the eighth day he shall take to him two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, and come before the LORD unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and give them unto the priest: 15. And the priest shall offer them, the one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering; and the priest shall make an atonement for him before the LORD for his issue. 16. And if any man's seed of copulation go out from him, then he shall wash all his flesh in water, and be unclean until the even. 17. And every garment, and every skin, whereon is the seed of copulation, shall be washed with water, and be unclean until the even. 18. The woman also with whom man shall lie with seed of copulation, they shall both bathe themselves in water, and be unclean until the even.

We have here the law concerning the ceremonial uncleanness that was contracted by running issues in men. It is called in the margin, (v. 2.) the running of the reins: a very grievous and loathsome disease, which was, 1. Usually the effect and consequent of wantonness and uncleanness, and a dissolute course of life, filling men's bones with the sins of their youth, and leaving them to mourn at the last, when all the pleasures of their wickedness are vanished and gone, and nothing remains but the pain and anguish of a rotten carcase, and a wounded conscience. And what fruit has the sinner, then, of those things whereof he has so much reason to be ashamed? Rom. 6. 21. As modesty is an ornament of grace to the head and chains about the neck; so chastity is health to the navel and marrow to the bones; but uncleanness is a wound and dishonour, the consumption of the flesh and the body, and a sin which is often its own punishment more than any other. 2. It was sometimes inflicted by the righteous hand of God for other sins, as appears by David's imprecation of a curse upon the family of Joab, for the murder of Abner, (2 Sam. 3. 29.) Let there not fail from the house of Joab one that hath an issue or is a leper: a vile disease for vile deserts.

Now, whoever had this disease upon him, (1.) He was himself unclean, v. 2. He must not dare to come near the sanctuary, it was at his peril if he did, nor might he eat of the holy things. This signified the filthiness of sin, and of all the productions of our corrupt nature, which renders us odious to God's holiness, and utterly unfit for communion with him. Out of a pure heart well kept are the issues of life, (Prov. 4. 23.) but out of an unclean heart comes that which is defiling, Matth. 12. 34, 35. (2.) He made every person and thing unclean that he touched, or that touched him, v. 4. 12. His bed, and his chair, and his saddle, and every thing that belonged to him, could not be touched without a ceremonial uncleanness contracted, which a man must remain conscious to himself of till sun-set, and from which he could not be cleansed without washing his clothes, and bathing his flesh in water. This signified the contagion of sin, and the danger we are in of being polluted by conversing with those that are polluted, and the need we have, with the utmost circumspection, to save ourselves from this untoward generation. (3.) When he was cured of the disease, yet he could not be cleansed from the pollution without a sacrifice, for which he was to prepare himself by seven days' expectation after he was perfectly clear from his distemper, and by bathing him in spring waters, v. 13. 15. This signified the great gospel-duties of faith and repentance, and the great gospel-privileges of the application of Christ's blood to our souls for our justification, and his grace for our sanctification. God has promised to sprinkle clean water upon us, and to cleanse us from all our filthiness, and has appointed us by repentance to wash us, and make us clean: he has also provided a sacrifice of atonement, and requires us by faith to interest ourselves in that sacrifice, for it is the blood of Christ his Son that cleanses us from all sin, and by which atonement is made for us, that we may have admission into God's presence, and may partake of his favour.

19. And if a woman have an issue, and her issue in her flesh be blood, she shall be put apart seven days: and whosoever toucheth her shall be unclean until the even. 20. And every thing that she lieth upon in her separation shall be unclean: every thing also that she sitteth upon shall be unclean. 21. And whosoever toucheth her bed shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. 22. And whosoever toucheth any thing that she sat upon shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. 23. And if it be on her bed, or on any thing whereon she sitteth, when he toucheth it, he shall be unclean until the even. 24. And if any man lie with her at all, and her flowers be upon him, he shall be unclean seven days; and all the bed whereon he lieth shall be unclean. 25. And if a woman have an issue of her blood many days out of the time of her separation, or if it run beyond the time of her separation; all the days of the issue of her uncleanness shall be as the days of her separation: she shall be unclean. 26. Every bed whereon she lieth all the days of her issue shall be unto her as the bed of her separation: and whatsoever she sitteth upon shall be unclean, as the uncleanness of her separation. 27. And whosoever toucheth those things shall be unclean, and shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. 28. But if she be cleansed of her issue, then she shall number to herself seven days, and after that she shall be clean. 29. And on the eighth day she shall take unto her two turtles, or two young pigeons, and bring them unto the priest, to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 30. And the priest shall offer the one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering; and the priest shall make an atonement for her before the LORD, for the issue of her uncleanness. 31. Thus shall ye separate the children of Israel from their uncleanness; that they die not in their uncleanness, when they defile my tabernacle that is among them. 32. This is the law of him that hath an issue, and of him whose seed goeth from him, and is defiled therewith; 33. And of her that is sick of her flowers, and of him that hath an issue, of the man, and of the woman, and of him that lieth with her which is unclean.

This is concerning the ceremonial uncleanness which women lay under from their issues, both those that were regular and healthful, and according to the course of nature, (v. 19. . 24.) and those that were unseasonable, excessive, and the disease of the body; such was the bloody issue of that poor woman who was suddenly cured by touching the hem of Christ's garment, after she had lain twelve years under her distemper, and had spent her estate upon physicians and physic in vain. This made the woman that was afflicted with it unclean, (v. 25.) and every thing she touched unclean, v. 26, 27. And if she was cured, and found, by seven days' trial, that she was perfectly free from her issue of blood, she was to be cleansed by the offering of two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, to make an atonement for her, v. 23, 29. All wicked courses, particularly idolatries, are compared to the uncleanness of a removed woman, (Ezek. 36. 17.) and, in allusion to this, it is said of Jerusalem, (Lam. 1. 9.) Her filthiness is in her skirts, so that (as it follows, v. 17.) she was shunned as a menstruous woman.

The reasons given for all these laws (which, we are ready to think, might very well have been spared) we have, v. 31.

1. Thus shall ye separate the children of Israel (for to them only, and their servants and proselytes, these laws pertained) from their uncleanness: that is, (1.) By these laws they were taught their privilege and honour, that they were purified unto God a peculiar people, and were intended by the holy God for a kingdom of priests, a holy nation; for that was a defilement to them which was not so to others. (2.) They were also taught their duty, which was to preserve the honour of their purity, and to keep themselves from all sinful pollutions. It was easy for them to argue, that, if those pollutions which were natural, unavoidable, involuntary, their affliction and not their sin, rendered them for the time so odious, that they were not fit for communion either with God or man, much more abominable and filthy were they, if they sinned against the light and law of nature, by drunkenness, adultery, fraud, and the like sins, which defile the very mind and conscience. And if these ceremonial pollutions could not be done away but by sacrifice and offering, something greater and much more valuable must be expected and depended upon for the purifying of the soul from the uncleanness of sin.

2. Thus shall ye prevent their dying in their uncleanness by the hand of God's justice, if, while they were under any of these defilements, they should come near the sanctuary. Note, It is a dangerous thing to die in our uncleanness; and it is our fault if we do, since we have not only fair warning given us, by God's law, against those things that will defile us, but also such gracious provision made by his gospel for our cleansing, if at any time we be defiled.

3. In all these laws there seems to be a special regard had to the honour of the tabernacle, which none must approach to in their uncleanness, that they defile not my tabernacle. Infinite Wisdom took this course to preserve in the minds of that careless people a continual dread of, and veneration for, the manifestations of God's glory and presence among them in his sanctuary. Now that the tabernacle of God was with men, familiarity would be apt to breed contempt, and therefore the law made so many things of frequent incidence to be ceremonial pollutions, and to involve an incapacity of drawing near to the sanctuary, (making death the penalty,) that so they might approach with great caution and reverence, and serious preparation, and fear of being found unfit. Thus they were taught never to draw near to God but with an awful humble sense of their distance and danger, and an exact observance of every thing that was required, in order to their safety and acceptance.

And what duty must we learn from all this? (1.) Let us bless God that we are not under the yoke of these carnal ordinances; that, as nothing can destroy us, so nothing can defile us, but sin. They may now partake of the Lord's supper who durst not then eat of the peace-offerings. And the defilement we contract by our sins of daily infirmity, we may be cleansed from in secret by the renewed acts of repentance and faith, without bathing in water, or bringing an offering to the door of the tabernacle. (2.) Let us carefully abstain from all sin, as defiling to the conscience, and particularly from all fleshly lusts; possessing our vessel in sanctification and honour, and not in the lusts of uncleanness, which not only pollute the soul, but war against it, and threaten its ruin. (3.) Let us all see how indispensably necessary real holiness is to our future happiness, and get our hearts purified by faith, that we may see God. Perhaps it is in allusion to these laws, which forbade the unclean to approach the sanctuary, that, when it is asked, Who shall stand in God's holy place? it is answered, He that hath clean hands and a pure heart; (Ps. 24. 3, 4.) for without holiness no man shall see the Lord.

CHAP. XVI.

In this chapter, we have the institution of the annual solemnity of the day of atonement, or expiation, which had as much gospel in it as perhaps any of the appointments of the ceremonial law, as appears by the reference the apostle makes to it, Heb. 9. 7, &c. We had, before, divers laws concerning sin-offerings for particular persons, and to be offered upon particular occasions; but this is concerning the stated sacrifice, in which the whole nation was interested. The whole service of the day is committed to the high priest. I. He must never come into the most holy place but upon this day, v. 1, 2. II. He must come dressed in linen garments, v. 4. III. He must bring a sin-offering and a burnt-offering for himself, (v. 3.) offer his sin-offering, (v. 6. . 11.) then go within the veil with some of the blood of his sin-offering, burn incense, and sprinkle the blood before the mercy-seat, v. 12. . 14. IV. Two goats must be provided for the people, lots cast upon them, and, 1. One of them must be a sin-offering for the people, (v. 5, 7. . 9.) and the blood of it must be sprinkled before the mercy-seat; (v. 15. . 17.) and then some of the blood of both the sin-offerings must be sprinkled upon the altar, v. 18, 19. 2. The other must be a scape-goat, (v. 10.) the sins of Israel must be confessed over him, and then he must be sent away into the wilderness, (v. 20. . 22.) and he that brought him away must be ceremonially unclean, v. 26. V. The burnt-offerings were then to be offered, the fat of the sin-offerings burnt on the altar, and their flesh burnt without the camp, v. 23. . 25, 27, 28. VI. The people were to observe the day religiously by a holy rest, and holy mourning for sin; and this was to be a statute for ever, v. 29. . 31.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses after the death of the two sons of Aaron, when they offered before the LORD, and died; 2. And the LORD said unto Moses, Speak unto Aaron thy brother, that he come not at all times into the holy place within the vail before the mercy-seat, which is upon the ark; that he die not: for I will appear in the cloud upon the mercy-seat. 3. Thus shall Aaron come into the holy place: with a young bullock for a sin-offering, and a ram for a burnt-offering. 4. He shall put on the holy linen-coat, and he shall have the linen breeches upon his flesh, and shall be girded with a linen girdle, and with the linen mitre shall he be attired: these are holy garments: therefore shall he wash his flesh in water, and so put them on.

Here is,

1. The date of this law concerning the day of atonement: it was after the death of the two sons of Aaron, (v. 1.) which we read, ch. 10. 1. (1.) Lest Aaron should fear that any remaining guilt of that sin should cleave to his family, or (seeing the priests were so apt to offend) that some after-sin of his other sons should be the ruin of his family, he is directed how to make atonement for his house, that it might keep in with God; for the atonement for it would be the establishment of it, and preserve the entail of the blessing upon it. (2.) The priests being warned, by the death of Nadab and Abihu, to approach to God with reverence and godly fear, (without which they came at their peril,) directions are here given how the nearest approach might be made, not only without peril, but to unspeakable advantage and comfort, if the directions were observed. When they were cut off for an undue approach, the rest must not say, "Then we will not draw near at all," but, "Then we will do it by rule." They died for their sin, therefore God graciously provides for the rest, that they die not. Thus God's judgments on some should be instructions to others.

2. The design of this law. One intention of it was to preserve a veneration for the most holy place, within the vail, where the Shechinah, or divine glory, was pleased to dwell between the cherubims; (v. 2.) Speak unto Aaron, that he come not at all times into the holy place. Before the vail some of the priests came every day to burn incense upon the golden altar, but within the vail none must ever come but the high priest only, and he but on one day in the year, and with great ceremony and caution. That place where God manifested his special presence must not be made common. If none must come into the presence-chamber of an earthly king uncalled, no, not the queen herself, upon pain of death, (Esth. 4. 11.) was it not requisite that the same sacred respect should be paid to the King of kings? But see what a blessed change is made by the gospel of Christ; all good Christians have now boldness to enter into the holiest, through the vail, every day; (Heb. 10. 19, 20.) and we come boldly (not as Aaron must, with fear and trembling) to the throne of grace, or mercy-seat, (Heb. 4. 16.) While the manifestations of God's presence and grace were sensible, it was requisite that they should thus be confined, and upon the reserve, because the objects of sense, the more familiar they are made, the less awful or delightful they become; but now that they are purely spiritual, it is otherwise; for the objects of faith, the more they are conversed with, the more do they manifest of their greatness and goodness: now, therefore, we are welcome to come at all times into the holy place not made with hands, for we are made to sit together with Christ in heavenly places by faith, (Eph. 2. 6.) Then Aaron must not come near at all times, lest he die; we now must come near at all times, that we may live: it is distance only that is our death. Then God appeared in the cloud upon the mercy-seat, but now with open face we behold, not in a dark cloud, but in a clear glass, the glory of the Lord, 2 Cor. 3. 18.

3. The person to whom the work of this day was committed; and that was the high priest only; (v. 3.) Thus shall Aaron come into the holy place. He was to do all himself upon the day of atonement; only there was a second provided to be his substitute or supporter, in case any thing should befall him, either of sickness or ceremonial uncleanness, that he could not perform the service of the day. All Christians are spiritual priests, but Christ only is the High Priest, and he alone it is that makes atonement, nor needed he either assistant or substitute.

4. The attire of the high priest in this service; he was not to be dressed up in his rich garments, that were peculiar to himself: he was not to put on the ephod, with the precious stones in it, but only the linen clothes, which he wore in common with the inferior priests, v. 4. That meaner dress did best become him on this day of humiliation; and, being thinner and lighter, he would in them be more expedite for the work and service of the day, which were all to go through his hands. Christ, our High Priest, made atonement for sin in our nature; not in the robes of his own peculiar glory, but the linen garments of our mortality, clean indeed, but mean.

5. And he shall take of the congregation of the children of Israel two kids of the goats for a sin-offering, and one ram for a burnt-offering. 6. And Aaron shall offer his bullock of the sin-offering, which is for himself, and make an atonement for himself, and for his house. 7. And he shall take the two goats, and present them before the LORD at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 8. And Aaron shall cast lots upon the two goats; one lot for the LORD, and the other lot for the scape-goat. 9. And Aaron shall bring the goat upon which the LORD's lot fell, and offer him for a sin-offering. 10. But the goat, on which the lot fell to be the scape-goat, shall be presented alive before the LORD, to make an atonement with him, and to let him go for a scape-goat into the wilderness. 11. And Aaron shall bring the bullock of the sin-offering, which is for himself, and shall make an atonement for himself, and for his house, and shall kill the bullock of the sin-offering which is for himself: 12. And he shall take a censer full of burning coals of fire from off the altar before the LORD, and his hands full of sweet incense beaten small, and bring it within the vail: 13. And he shall put the incense upon the fire before the LORD, that the cloud of the incense may cover the mercy-seat that is upon the testimony, that he die not: 14. And he shall take of the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle it with his finger upon the mercy-seat eastward; and before the mercy-seat shall he sprinkle of the blood with his finger seven times.

The Jewish writers say, that, for seven days before the day of expiation, the high priest was to retire from his own house, and to dwell in a chamber of the temple, that he might prepare himself for the service of this great day. During those seven days, he himself did the work of the inferior priests about the sacrifices, incense, &c. that he might have his hand in for this day; he must have the institution read to him again and again, that he might be fully apprized of the whole method. 1. He was to begin the service of the day very early with the usual morning sacrifice, after he had first washed his whole body before he dressed him, and his hands and feet again after. He then burned the daily incense, dressed the lamps, and offered the extraordinary sacrifice appointed for this day, (not here, but Numb. 29. 8.) a bullock, a ram, and seven lambs, all for burnt-offerings. This he is supposed to have done in his high priest's garments. 2. He must now put off his rich robes, bathe himself, put on the linen garments, and present unto the Lord his own bullock, which was to be a sin-offering for himself and his house, v. 6. The bullock was set between the temple and the altar, and the offering of him mentioned in this verse was the making of a solemn confession of his sins, and the sins of his house, earnestly praying for the forgiveness of them, and this with his hands on the head of the bullock. 3. He must then cast lots upon the two goats, which were to make (both together) one sin-offering for the congregation. One of these goats must be slain, in token of a satisfaction to be made to God's justice for sin, the other must be sent away, in token of the remission or dismissal of sin by the mercy of God. Both must be presented together to God, (v. 7.) before the lot was cast upon them, and afterward the scape-goat by itself, v. 10. Some think that goats were chosen for the sin-offering, because, by the disagreeableness of their smell, the offensiveness of sin is represented: others think, because it was said that the dæmons which the heathens then worshipped, often appeared to their worshippers in the form of goats, God therefore obliged his people to sacrifice goats, that they might never be tempted to sacrifice to goats. 4. The next thing to be done, was, to kill the bullock for the sin-offering, for himself and his house, v. 11. "Now," say the Jews, "he must again put his hand on the head of the bullock, and repeat the confession and supplication he had before made, and kill the bullock with his own hands, to make atonement for himself first, (for how could he make reconciliation for the sins of the people, till he was himself first reconciled?) and for his house, not only his own family, but all the priests, which are called the house of Aaron," Ps. 135. 19. This charity must begin at home, though it must not end there. The bullock being killed, he left one of the priests to stir the blood, that it might not thicken, and then, 5. He took a censer of burning coals (that would not smoke) in one hand, and a dish full of the sweet incense in the other, and then went into the holy of holies through the vail, went up toward the ark, set the coals down upon the floor, and scattered the incense upon them, so that the room was immediately filled with smoke. The Jews say that he was to go in side-way, that he might not look directly upon the ark where the Divine Glory was, till it was covered with smoke; that then he must come out backward, out of reverence to the Divine Majesty; and, after a short prayer, he was to hasten out of the sanctuary, to shew himself to the people, that they might not suspect that he had misbehaved himself, and died before the Lord. 6. He then fetched the blood of the bullock from the priest whom he had left stirring it, and took that in with him the second time into the holy of holies, which was now filled with the smoke of the incense, and sprinkled with his finger of that blood upon, or rather toward, the mercy-seat, once over against the top of it, and then seven times toward the lower part of it, v. 14. But the drops of blood (as the Jews expound it) all fell upon the ground, and none touched the mercy-seat. Having done this, he came out of the most holy place, set the basin of blood down in the sanctuary, and went out.

15. Then shall he kill the goat of the sin-offering that is for the people, and bring his blood within the vail, and do with that blood as he did with the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle it upon the mercy-seat, and before the mercy-seat: 16. And he shall make an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins: and so shall he do for the tabernacle of the congregation, that remaineth among them, in the midst of their uncleanness. 17. And there shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation when he goeth in to make an atonement in the holy place, until he come out, and have made an atonement for himself, and for his household, and for all the congregation of Israel. 18. And he shall go out unto the altar that is before the LORD, and make an atonement for it; and shall take of the blood of the bullock, and of the blood of the goat, and put it upon the horns of the altar round about. 19. And he shall sprinkle of the blood upon it with his finger seven times, and cleanse it, and hallow it from the uncleanness of the children of Israel.

When the priest was come out from sprinkling the blood of the bullock before the mercy-seat, 1. He must next kill the goat which was the sin-offering for the people, (v. 15.) and go the third time into the holy of holies, to sprinkle the blood of the goat, as he had done that of the bullock; and thus he was to make atonement for the holy place; (v. 16.) that is, whereas the people by their sins had provoked God to take away those tokens of his favourable presence with them, and rendered even that holy place unfit to be the habitation of the holy God, atonement was hereby made for sin, that God, being reconciled to them, might continue with them. 2. He must then do the same for the outward part of the tabernacle, that he had done for the inner room, by sprinkling the blood of the bullock first, and then of the goat, without the vail, there where the table and incense-altar stood, eight times each, as before. The reason intimated is, because the tabernacle remained among them in the midst of their uncleanness, v. 16. God would hereby shew them how much their hearts needed to be purified, when even the tabernacle, only by standing in the midst of such an impure and sinful people, needed this expiation; and also, that even their devotions and religious performances had much amiss in them, for which it was necessary that atonement should be made. During this solemnity, none of the inferior priests must come into the tabernacle, (v. 17.) but, by standing without, must own themselves unworthy and unfit to minister there, because their follies, and defects, and manifold impurities in their ministry, had made this expiation of the tabernacle necessary. 3. He must then put some of the blood, both of the bullock and of the goat, mixed together, upon the horns of the altar that is before the Lord, v. 18, 19. It is certain that the altar of incense had this blood put upon it, for so it is expressly ordered; (Exod. 30. 10.) but some think that this directs the high priest to the altar of burnt-offerings, for that also is here called the altar before the Lord, (v. 12.) because he is said to go out to it, and because it may be presumed, that that also had need of an expiation; for to that the gifts and offerings of the children of Israel were all brought, from whose uncleanness the altar is here said to be hallowed.

20. And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar, he shall bring the live goat. 21. And Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their transgressions in all their sins, putting them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness. 22. And the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities into a land not inhabited: and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness. 23. And Aaron shall come into the tabernacle of the congregation, and shall put off the linen garments, which he put on when he went into the holy place, and shall leave them there: 24. And he shall wash his flesh with water in the holy place, and put on his garments, and come forth, and offer his burnt-offering, and the burnt-offering of the people, and make an atonement for himself, and for the people. 25. And the fat of the sin-offering shall be burnt upon the altar. 26. And he that let go the goat for the scape-goat shall wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh in water, and afterward come into the camp. 27. And the bullock for the sin-offering, and the goat for the sin-offering, whose blood was brought in to make atonement in the holy place, shall one carry forth without the camp; and they shall burn in the fire their skins, and their flesh, and their dung. 28. And he that burneth them shall wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh in water, and afterward he shall come into the camp.

The high priest having presented unto the Lord the expiatory sacrifices, by the sprinkling of their blood, the remainder of which, it is probable, he poured out at the foot of the brazen altar,

1. He is next to confess the sins of Israel, with both his hands upon the head of the scape-goat: (v. 20, 21.) and whenever hands were imposed upon the head of any sacrifice, it was always done with confession, according as the nature of the sacrifice was; and this being a sin-offering, it must be a confession of sin. In the latter and more degenerate ages of the Jewish church, they had a set form of confession prepared for the high priest, but God here prescribed none; for it might be supposed that the high priest was so well acquainted with the state of the people, and had such a tender concern for them, that he needed not any form. The confession must be as particular as he could make it, not only of all the iniquities of the children of Israel, but all their transgressions in all their sins; in one sin there may be many transgressions from the several aggravating circumstances of it: and in our confessions we should take notice of them; and not only say, I have sinned, but, with Achan, "Thus and thus have I done." By this confession, he must put the sins of Israel upon the head of the goat; that is, acting faith upon the divine appointment which constituted such a translation, he must transfer the punishment incurred from the sinners to the sacrifice; which had been but a jest, nay, an affront to God, if he himself had not ordained it.

2. The goat was then to be sent away immediately by the hand of a fit person, pitched upon for the purpose, into a wilderness, a land not inhabited; and God allowed them to make this construction of it, that the sending away of the goat was the sending away of their sins by a free and full remission; (v. 22.) He shall bear upon him all their iniquities. The losing of the goat was a sign to them, that the sins of Israel should be sought for, and not found, Jer. 50. 20. The later Jews had a custom to tie one shred of scarlet cloth to the horns of the goat, and another to the gate of the temple, or to the top of the rock where the goat was lost, and they concluded that if they turned white, as it saw it usually did, the sins of Israel were forgiven, as it is written, Though your sins have been as scarlet, they shall be as wool; and they add, that, for forty years before the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, the scarlet cloth never changed colour at all; which is a fair confession, that, having rejected the substance, the shadow stood them in no stead.

3. The high priest must then put off his linen garments in the tabernacle, and leave them there, the Jews say, never to be worn more by himself or any other, for they made new ones every year; and he must bathe himself in water, put on his rich clothes, and then offer both his own and the people's burnt-offerings, v. 23, 24. When we have the comfort of our pardon, God must have the glory of it. If we have the benefit of the sacrifice of atonement, we must not grudge the sacrifices of acknowledgment. And it should seem the burning of the fat of the sin-offering was deferred till now (v. 25.) that it might be consumed with the burnt-offerings.

4. The flesh of both those sin-offerings, whose blood was taken within the veil, was to be all burnt, not upon the altar, but at a distance without the camp, to signify both our putting away of sin by true repentance, and the spirit of burning, and God's putting it away by a full remission, so that it shall never rise up in judgment against us.

5. He that took the scape-goat into the wilderness, and they that burned the sin-offering, were to be looked upon as ceremonially unclean, and must not come into the camp till they had washed their clothes, and bathed their flesh in water. Which signified the defiling nature of sin; even the sacrifice, which was but made sin, was defiling: also the imperfection of the legal sacrifices; they were so far from taking away sin, that even they left some stain upon those that touched them.

Lastly, When all this was done, the high priest went again into the most holy place to fetch his censer, and so returned to his own house with joy, because he had done his duty, and died not.

29. And this shall be a statute for ever unto you: that in the seventh month, on the tenth day of the month, ye shall afflict your souls, and do no work at all, whether it be one of your own country, or a stranger that sojourneth among you. 30. For on that day shall the priest make an atonement for you, to cleanse you, that ye may be clean from all your sins before the Lord. 31. It shall be a sabbath of rest unto you, and ye shall afflict your souls, by a statute for ever. 32. And the priest, whom he shall anoint, and whom he shall consecrate to minister in the priest's office in his father's stead, shall make the atonement, and shall put on the linen clothes, even the holy garments: 33. And he shall make an atonement for the holy sanctuary, and he shall make an atonement for the tabernacle of the congregation, and for the altar; and he shall make an atonement for the priests, and for all the people of the congregation. 34. And this shall be an everlasting statute unto you, to make an atonement for the children of Israel for all their sins once a year. And he did as the Lord commanded Moses.

Here is, 1. The day appointed for this solemnity. It must be observed yearly on the tenth day of the seventh month, v. 29. The seventh had been reckoned the first month, till God appointed that the month in which the children of Israel came out of Egypt, should from thenceforward be accounted and called the first month. Some have fancied that this tenth day of the seventh month was the day of the year on which our first parents fell, and that it was kept as a fast in remembrance of that. Dr. Lightfoot computes that this was the day on which Moses came the last time down from the mount, when he brought with him the renewed tables, and the assurances of God's being reconciled to Israel, and his face shone: that day must be a day of atonement throughout their generations; for the remembrance of God's forgiving them their sin about the golden calf might encourage them to hope that, upon their repentance, he would forgive them all trespasses. 2. The duty of the people on this day. (1.) They must rest from all their labours; It shall be a sabbath of rest, v. 31. The work of the day was itself enough, and a good day's work if it was done well, therefore they must do no other work at all. The work of humiliation for sin requires such a close application of mind, and such a fixed engagement of the whole man, as will not allow us to turn aside to any other work. The day of atonement seems to be that sabbath spoken of by the prophet, (Isa. 58. 13.) for it is the same with the fast spoken of in the verses before. (2.) They must afflict their souls. They must refrain from all bodily refreshments and delights, in token of inward humiliation and contrition of soul for their sins. They all fasted on this day from food, (except the sick and children,) and laid aside their ornaments, and did anoint themselves, as Daniel, ch. 10. 3, 12. David chastened his soul with fasting, Ps. 35. 13. And it signified the mortifying of sin, and turning from it, loosing the bands of wickedness, Isa. 58. 6, 7. The Jewish Doctors advised that they should not on that day read those portions of scripture which were proper to affect them with delight and joy, because it was a day to afflict their souls. 3. The perpetuity of this institution; It shall be a statute for ever, v. 29, 34. It must not be intermitted any year, nor ever let fall till that constitution should be dissolved, and the type should be superseded by the antitype. As long as we are continually sinning, we must be continually repenting, and receiving the atonement. The law of afflicting our souls for sin, is a statute for ever, which will continue in force till we arrive there where all tears, even those of repentance, will be wiped from our eyes. The apostle observes it as an evidence of the insufficiency of the legal sacrifices to take away sin, and purge the conscience from it, that in them there was a remembrance made of sin every year, upon the day of atonement, Heb. 10. 1. . 3. The annual repetition of the sacrifices shewed that there was in them only a faint and feeble effort toward making atonement, it could be done effectually only by offering up of the body of Christ once for all, and that once was sufficient; that sacrifice needed not to be repeated.

Let us therefore see what there was of gospel in all this.

I. Here are typified the two great gospel-privileges, of the remission of sin, and access to God, both which we owe to the mediation of our Lord Jesus.

Here then let us see, 1. The expiation of guilt which Christ made for us. He is himself both the Maker and the Matter of the atonement; for he is, (1.) The Priest, the High Priest, that makes reconciliation for the sins of the people, Heb. 2. 17. He, and he only, is par negotio—fit for the work, and worthy of the honour: he is appointed by the Father to do it, who sanctified him, and sent him into the world for this purpose, that God might in him reconcile the world to himself. He undertook it, and for our sakes sanctified himself, and set himself apart for it, John, 17. 19. The high priest's frequent bathing himself on this day, and performing the service of it in fine linen clean and white, signified the holiness of the Lord Jesus, his perfect freedom from all sin, and his being beautified and adorned with all grace. No man was to be with the high priest when he made atonement, (v. 17.) for our Lord Jesus was to tread the wine-press alone, and of the people there must be none with him; (Isa. 63. 3.) therefore, when he entered upon his sufferings, all his disciples forsook him and fled; for if any of them had been taken and put to death with him, it would have looked as if they had assisted in making the atonement; none but thieves, concerning whom there could be no such suspicion, must suffer with him. And observe what the extent of the atonement was, which the high priest made; it was for the holy sanctuary, for the tabernacle, for the altar, for the priests, and for all the people, v. 33. Christ's satisfaction is that which atones for the sins both of ministers and people, the iniquities of our holy (and our unholy) things; the title we have to the privileges of ordinances, our comfort in them, and benefit by them, are all owing to the atonement Christ made. But whereas the atonement which the high priest made, pertained only to the congregation of Israel, Christ is the Propitiation, not for our sins only, that are Jews, but for the sins of the whole Gentile world. And in this also Christ infinitely excelled Aaron, that Aaron needed to offer sacrifice for his own sin first, which he was to make confession of upon the head of his sin-offering; but our Lord Jesus had no sin of his own to answer for; such a High Priest became us, Heb. 7. 26. And therefore, when he was baptized in Jordan, whereas others stood in the water confessing their sins, (Matth. 3. 6.) he went up straightway out of the water, (v. 16.) having no sins to confess. (2.) As he is the High Priest, so he is the Sacrifice with which atonement is made; for he is all in all in our reconciliation to God. Thus he was prefigured by the two goats, which both made one offering; the slain goat was a type of Christ dying for our sins; the scape-goat a type of Christ rising again for our justification. It was directed by lot, the disposal whereof was of the Lord, which goat should be slain; for Christ was delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God. [1.] The atonement is said to be completed by putting the sins of Israel upon the head of the goat: they deserved to have been abandoned and sent into a land of forgetfulness, but that punishment was here transferred to the goat that bore their sins; with reference to which God is said to have laid upon our Lord Jesus (the Substance of all these shadows) the iniquity of us all, Isa. 53. 6. And he is said to have borne our sins, even the punishment of them, in his own body upon the tree, 1 Pet. 2. 24. Thus was he made sin for us, that is, a Sacrifice for sin, 2 Cor. 5. 21. He suffered and died, not only for our good, but in our stead, and was forsaken, and seemed to be forgotten for a time, that we might not be forsaken and forgotten for ever. Some learned men have computed that our Lord Jesus was baptized of John in Jordan upon the tenth day of the seventh month, which was the very day of atonement; then he entered upon his office as Mediator, and was immediately driven of the Spirit into the wilderness, a land not inhabited. [2.] The consequence of this was, that all the iniquities of Israel were carried into a land of forgetfulness. Thus Christ, the Lamb of God, takes away the sin of the world, by taking it upon himself, John, 1. 29. And when God forgives sin, he is said to remember it no more, (Heb. 8. 12.) to cast it behind his back, (Isa. 38. 17.) into the depths of the sea, (Mic. 7. 19.) and to separate it as far as the east is from the west, Ps. 103. 12.

2. The entrance into heaven, which Christ made for us, is here typified by the high priest's entrance into the most holy place. This the apostle has expounded, (Heb. 9. 7, &c.) and he shews, (1.) That heaven is the holiest of all, but not of that building, and that the way into it by faith, hope, and prayer, through a Mediator, was not then so clearly manifested as it is to us now by the gospel. (2.) That Christ our High Priest entered into heaven at his ascension once for all, and as a public Person in the name of all his spiritual Israel, and through the vail of his flesh, which was rent for that purpose, Heb. 10. 20. (3.) That he entered by his own blood, (Heb. 9. 12.) taking with him to heaven the virtues of the sacrifice he offered on earth, and so sprinkling his blood, as it were, before the mercy-seat, where it speaks better things than the blood of bulls and goats could do. Hence he is said to appear in the midst of the throne as a lamb that had been slain, Rev. 5. 6. And though he had no sin of his own to expiate, yet it was by his own merit that he obtained for himself a restoration to his own ancient glory, (John, 17. 4, 5.) as well as an eternal redemption for us, Heb. 9. 12. (4.) The high priest in the holy place burned incense, which typified the intercession that Christ ever lives to make for us within the vail, in the virtue of his satisfaction. And we could not expect to live, no, not before the mercy-seat, if it were not covered with the cloud of this incense. Mere mercy itself will not save us, without the interposal of a Mediator. The intercession of Christ is there set forth before God as incense, as this incense. And as the high priest interceded for himself first, then for his household, and then for all Israel, so our Lord Jesus, in the 17th of St. John, (which was a specimen of the intercession he makes in heaven,) recommended himself first to his father, then his disciples who were his household, and then all that should believe on him through their word, as all Israel; and having thus adverted to the uses and intentions of his offering, he was immediately seized and crucified, pursuant to these intentions. (5.) Herein the entry Christ made far exceeded Aaron's, that Aaron could not gain admission, no not for his own sons, into the most holy place; but our Lord Jesus has consecrated for us also a new and living way into the holiest, so that we also have boldness to enter, Heb. 10. 19, 20. And, lastly, The high priest was to come out again, but our Lord Jesus ever lives, making intercession, and always appears in the presence of God for us, whither as the Forerunner he is for us entered, and where as Agent he continues for us to reside.

II. Here are likewise typified the two great gospel-duties of faith and repentance, by which we are qualified for the atonement, and come to be entitled to the benefit of it. 1. By faith we must put our hands upon the head of the Offering, relying on Christ as the Lord our Righteousness, pleading his satisfaction, as that which was alone able to atone for our sins, and procure us a pardon; "Thou shalt answer, Lord, for me." This is all I have to say for myself, Christ has died, yea, rather has risen again; to his grace and government I entirely submit myself, and in him I receive the atonement," Rom. 5. 11. 2. By repentance we must afflict our souls; not only fasting for a time from the delights of the body, but inwardly sorrowing for our sins, and living a life of self-denial and mortification. We must also make a penitent confession of sin, and this with an eye to Christ, whom we have pierced, and mourning because of him; and with a hand of faith upon the atonement, assuring ourselves, that if we confess our sins, God is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness. Lastly, In the year of jubilee, the trumpet which proclaimed the liberty, was ordered to be sounded in the close of the day of atonement, ch. 25. 9. For, the remission of our debt, release from our bondage, and our return to our inheritance, are all owing to the mediation and intercession of Jesus Christ. By the atonement we obtain rest for our souls, and all the glorious liberties of the children of God.

CHAP. XVII.

After the law concerning the atonement to be made for all Israel by the high priest, at the tabernacle, with the blood of bulls and goats; in this chapter we have two prohibitions necessary for the preservation of the honour of that atonement. I. That no sacrifice should be offered by any other than the priests, nor any where but at the door of the tabernacle, and this upon pain of death, v. 1. .9. II. That no blood should be eaten, and this under the same penalty, v. 10. .16.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto Aaron, and unto his sons, and unto all the children of Israel, and say unto them, This is the thing which the LORD hath commanded, saying, 3. What man soever there be of the house of Israel, that killeth an ox, or lamb, or goat, in the camp, or that killeth it out of the camp, 4. And bringeth it not unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, to offer an offering unto the LORD before the tabernacle of the LORD; blood shall be imputed unto that man; he hath shed blood, and that man shall be cut off from among his people: 5. To the end that the children of Israel may bring their sacrifices, which they offer in the open field, even that they may bring them unto the LORD, unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, unto the priest, and offer them for peace-offerings unto the LORD. 6. And the priest shall sprinkle the blood upon the altar of the LORD at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and burn the fat for a sweet savour unto the LORD. 7. And they shall no more offer their sacrifices unto devils, after whom they have gone a whoring. This shall be a statute for ever unto them throughout their generations. 8. And thou shalt say unto them, Whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers which sojourn among you, that offereth a burnt-offering or sacrifice, 9. And bringeth it not unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, to offer it unto the LORD; even that man shall be cut off from among his people.

This statute obliged all the people of Israel to bring all their sacrifices to God's altar, to be offered there. And as to this matter we must consider,

I. How it stood before. 1. It was allowed to all people to build altars, and offer sacrifices to God, where they pleased. Wherever Abraham had a tent, he built an altar, and every master of a family was a priest to his own family, as Job, ch. 1. 5. 2. This liberty had been an occasion of idolatry. When every man was his own priest, and had an altar of his own, by degrees, as they became vain in their imaginations, they invented gods of their own, and offered their sacrifices unto dæmons, v. 7. The word signifies rough or hairy goats, because it is probable that in that shape the evil spirits often appeared to them, to invite their sacrifices, and to signify their acceptance of them. For the Devil, ever since he became a revolter from God, and a rebel against him, has set up for a rival with him, and coveted to have divine honours paid him; he had the impudence to solicit our blessed Saviour to fall down and worship him. The Israelites themselves had learnt in Egypt to sacrifice to dæmons. And some of them, it should seem, practised it even since the God of Israel had so gloriously appeared for them, and with them. They are said to go a whoring after these dæmons; for it was such a breach of their covenant with God, as adultery is of the marriage covenant: and they were as strongly addicted to their idolatrous worships, and as hardly reclaimed from them, as those that have given themselves over to fornication, to work all uncleanness with greediness; and therefore it is with reference to this that God calls himself a jealous God.

II. How this law settled it. 1. Some think that the children of Israel were by this law forbidden, while they were in the wilderness, to kill any beef, or mutton, or veal, or lamb, or goat, even for their common eating, but at the door of the tabernacle; where the blood and the fat were to be offered to God upon the altar, and the flesh to be returned back to the offerer, to be eaten as a peace-offering, according to the law. And the statute is so worded, (v. 3, 4.) as to favour this opinion, for it speaks generally of killing any ox, or lamb, or goat. The learned Dr. Cudworth puts this sense upon it, and thinks that while they had their tabernacle so near them in the midst of their camp, they ate no flesh but what had first been offered to God; but that, when they were entering Canaan, this constitution was altered, (Deut. 12. 21.) and they were allowed to kill their beasts of the flock and herd at home, as well as the roebuck and the hart; only thrice a year they were to see God at his tabernacle, and to eat and drink before him there. And it is probable that in the wilderness they did not eat much flesh, but that of their peace-offerings, preserving what cattle they had, for breed, against they came to Canaan; therefore they murmured for flesh, being weary of manna; and Moses on that occasion speaks as if they were very sparing of the flocks and the herds, Numb. 11. 4, 22. Yet it is hard to construe this as a temporary law, when it is expressly said to be a statute for ever, v. 7. And therefore, 2. It should seem rather to forbid only the killing of beasts for sacrifice any where but at God's altar. They must not offer sacrifice, as they had done, in the open fields, (v. 5.) no not to the true God, but it must be brought to the priest, to be offered on the altar of the Lord: and the solemnity they had lately witnessed of consecrating both the priests and the altar, would serve for a good reason why they should confine themselves to both these, that God had so signally appointed and owned. This law obliged not only the Israelites themselves, but the proselytes, or strangers that were circumcised and sojourned among them, who were in danger of retaining an affection to their old ways of worship. If any should transgress this law, and offer sacrifice any where but at the tabernacle, (1.) The guilt was great; blood shall be imputed to that man, he hath shed blood, v. 4. Though it was but a beast he had killed, yet, killing it otherwise than God had appointed, he was looked upon as a murderer. It is by the divine grant that we have liberty to kill the inferior creatures, which we are not entitled to the benefit of, unless we submit to the limitations of it, which are, that it be not done either with cruelty or with superstition, Gen. 9. 3, 4. Nor was there ever any greater abuse done to the inferior creatures, than when they were made either false gods, or sacrifices to false gods, which the apostle perhaps has special reference to, when he speaks of the vanity and bondage of corruption which the creature was made subject to, Rom. 8. 20, 21. compare ch. 1. 23, 25. Idolatrous sacrifices were looked upon, not only as adultery, but as murder; he that offereth them is as if he slew a man, Isa. 66. 3. (2.) The punishment should be severe, That man shall be cut off from among his people. Either the magistrate must do it, if it were manifest and notorious, or, if not, God would take the work into his own hands, and the offerer should be cut off by some immediate stroke of divine justice. The reasons why God thus strictly ordered all their sacrifices to be offered at one place were, [1.] For the preventing of idolatry and superstition: that sacrifices might be offered to God, and according to the rule, and without innovations, they must always be offered by the hands of the priests, who were servants in God's house, and under the eye of the high priest, who was ruler of the house, and took care to see every thing done according to God's ordinance. [2.] For the securing of the honour of God's temple and altar; the peculiar dignity of which would be endangered, if they might offer their sacrifices any where else as well as there. [3.] For the preserving of unity and brotherly love among the Israelites; that, meeting all at one altar, as all the children of the family meet daily at one table, they might live and love as brethren, and be as one man, of one mind in the Lord.

III. How this law was observed. 1. While the Israelites kept their integrity, they had a tender and very jealous regard to this law, as appears by their zeal against the altar which was erected by the two tribes and a half, which they would by no means have left standing, if they had not been satisfied that it was never designed, nor should ever be used, for sacrifice or offering, Josh. 22. 12, &c. 2. The breach of this law was for many ages the scandalous and incurable corruption of the Jewish church; witness that complaint which so often occurs in the history even of the good kings, Howbeit the high places were not taken away; and it was an inlet to the grossest idolatries. 3. Yet this law was, in extraordinary cases, dispensed with. Gideon's sacrifice, (Judg. 6. 26.) Manoah's, (Judg. 13. 19.) Samuel's, (1 Sam. 7. 9.—9. 13.—11. 15.) David's, (2 Sam. 24. 18.) and Elijah's, (1 Kings, 18. 23.) were accepted, though not offered at the usual place: but these were all either ordered by angels, or offered by prophets; and some think, that, after the desolation of Shiloh, and before the building of the temple, while the ark and altar were unsettled, it was more allowable to offer sacrifice elsewhere.

IV. How this matter stands now, and what use we are to make of this law. 1. It is certain that the spiritual sacrifices we are now to offer, are not confined to any one place. Our Saviour has made this clear, (John, 4. 21.) and the apostle, (1 Tim. 2. 8.) according to the prophecy, that in every place incense should be offered, Mal. 1. 11. We have now no temple or altar that sanctifies the gift, nor does the gospel-unity lie in one place, but in one heart, and the unity of the spirit. 2. Christ is our Altar, and the true Tabernacle; (Heb. 3. 2.—13. 10.) in him God dwells among us, and it is in him that our sacrifices are acceptable to God, and in him only, 1 Pet. 2. 5. To set up other mediators, or other altars, or other expiatory sacrifices, is, in effect, to set up other gods. He is the Centre of unity, in whom all God's Israel meet. 3. Yet we are to have respect to the public worship of God, not forsaking the assemblies of his people, Heb. 10. 25. The Lord loves the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob, and so should we; see Ezek. 20. 40. Though God will graciously accept our family-offerings, we must not therefore neglect the door of the tabernacle.

10. And whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, that eateth any manner of blood; I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood, and will cut him off from among his people. 11. For the life of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar, to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul. 12. Therefore I said unto the children of Israel, No soul of you shall eat blood, neither shall any stranger that sojourneth among you eat blood. 13. And whatsoever man there be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, which hunteth and catcheth any beast or fowl that may be eaten; he shall even pour out the blood thereof, and cover it with dust. 14. For it is the life of all flesh; the blood of it is for the life thereof: therefore I said unto the children of Israel, Ye shall eat the blood of no manner of flesh: for the life of all flesh is the blood thereof: whosoever eateth it shall be cut off. 15. And every soul that eateth that which died of itself, or that which was torn with beasts, whether it be one of your own country, or a stranger, he shall both wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even: then shall he be clean. 16. But if he wash them not, nor bathe his flesh, then he shall bear his iniquity.

We have here,

A repetition and confirmation of the law against eating blood. We have met with this prohibition twice before here in the levitical law, (ch. 3. 17.—7. 26.) beside the place it had in the precepts of Noah, Gen. 9. 4. But here,

1. The prohibition is repeated again and again, and reference had to the former laws to this purport; (v. 12.) I said to the children of Israel, No soul of you shall eat blood; and again, (v. 14.) Ye shall eat the blood of no manner of flesh. A great stress is laid upon it, as a law which has more in it than, at first view, one would think.

2. It is made binding, not only on the house of Israel, but on the strangers that sojourned among them, (v. 10.) which perhaps was one reason why it was thought advisable, for a time, to forbid blood to the Gentile converts, Acts, 15. 29.

3. The penalty annexed to this law is very severe, (v. 10.) I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood, if he do it presumptuously, and will cut him off; and again, (v. 14.) He shall be cut off. Note, God's wrath will be the sinner's ruin. Write that man undone, for ever undone, against whom God sets his face; for what creature is able to confront the Creator?

4. A reason is given for this law, (v. 11.) because it is the blood that makes atonement for the soul; and therefore it was appointed to make atonement with, because the life of the flesh is the blood: the sinner deserved to die, therefore the sacrifice must die; now the blood being so the life, that ordinarily beasts were killed for man's use by the drawing out of all their blood, God appointed the sprinkling or pouring out of the blood of the sacrifice upon the altar, to signify that the life of the sacrifice was given to God instead of the sinner's life, and as a ransom or counter-price for it; therefore without shedding of blood there was no remission, Heb. 9. 22. For this reason they must eat no blood, and, 1. It was then a very good reason; for God would by this means preserve the honour of that way of atonement which he had instituted, and keep up in the minds of the people a reverent regard to it. The blood of the covenant being then a sensible object, no blood must be either eaten, or trodden under foot as a common thing; as they must have no ointment or perfume like that which God ordered them to make for himself. But, (2.) This reason is now superseded, which intimates that the law itself was ceremonial, and is now no longer in force: the blood of Christ, who is come, (and we are to look for no other,) is that alone which makes atonement for the soul, and of which the blood of the sacrifices was an imperfect type: the coming of the substance does away the shadow. The blood of beasts is no longer the ransom, but Christ's blood only; and therefore there is not now that reason for abstaining from blood that was then; and we cannot suppose it was the will of God, that the law should survive the reason of it. The blood, provided it be so prepared as not to be unwholesome, is now allowed for the nourishment of our bodies, because it is no longer appointed to make an atonement for the soul. (3.) Yet it has still a useful significance: the life is in the blood; it is the vehicle of the animal spirits, and God would have his people to regard the life even of their beasts, and not to be cruel and hard-hearted, nor to take delight in anything that is barbarous. They must not be a blood-thirsty people. The blood then made atonement figuratively, now, the blood of Christ makes atonement really and effectually: to that therefore we must have a reverent regard, and not use it as a common thing; for he will set his face against those that do so, and they shall be cut off, Heb. 10. 29.

5. Some other precepts are here given as appendages to this law, and hedges about it. (1.) They must cover the blood of that which they took in hunting, v. 13. They must not only not eat it, but give it a decent burial, in token of some mystery which they must believe lay hid in this constitution. The Jews look upon this as a very weighty precept, and appoint that the blood should be covered with these words, Blessed be he that hath sanctified us by his precepts, and commanded us to cover blood. (2.) They must not eat that which died of itself, or was torn of beasts, (v. 15.) for the blood was either not at all, or not regularly drawn out of them. God would have them to be curious in their diet, not with the curiosity that gratifies the sensual appetite, but with that which checks and restrains it. God would not allow his children to eat every thing that came in their way with greediness, but to consider diligently what was before them, that they might learn in other things to ask questions for conscience-sake. They that flew upon the spoil, sinned, 1 Sam. 14. 32, 33. If a man did, through ignorance or inconsideration, eat the flesh of any beast not duly slain, he must wash himself and his clothes, else he bore his iniquity, v. 15, 16. The pollution was ceremonial, so was the purification from it; but if a man slighted the prescribed method of cleansing, or would not submit to it, he thereby contracted moral guilt. See the nature of a remedial law; he that obeys it, has the benefit of it; he that does not, not only remains under his former guilt, but adds to that the guilt of contemning the provisions made by divine grace for his relief, and sins against the remedy.

CHAP. XVIII.

Here is, I. A general law against all conformity to the corrupt usages of the heathen, v. 1. .5. II. Particular laws, 1. Against incest, v. 6. .18. 2. Against beastly lusts, and barbarous idolatries, v. 19. .23. III. The enforcement of these laws from the ruin of the Canaanites, v. 24. .30.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, I am the LORD your God. 3. After the doings of the land of Egypt, wherein ye dwell, shall ye not do: and after the doings of the land of Canaan, whither I bring you, shall ye not do: neither shall ye walk in their ordinances. 4. Ye shall do my judgments, and keep mine ordinances, to walk therein: I am the LORD your God. 5. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments: which if a man do, he shall live in them: I am the LORD.

After divers ceremonial institutions, God here returns to give them moral precepts. The former are still of use to us as types, the latter still binding as laws. We have here,

1. The sacred authority by which these laws are enacted; I am the Lord your God, (v. 1, 4, 30.) and I am the Lord, v. 5, 6, 21. The Lord who has a right to rule all, your God who has a peculiar right to rule you. Jehovah is the Fountain of being, and therefore the Fountain of power, whose we are, whom we are bound to serve, and who is able to punish all disobedience. Your God, to whom you have consented, in whom you are happy, to whom you lie under the highest obligations imaginable, and to whom you are accountable.

2. A strict caution to take heed of retaining the relics of the idolatries of Egypt, where they had dwelt, and of receiving the infection of the idolatries of Canaan, whither they were now going, v. 3. Now that God was by Moses teaching them his ordinances, there was aliquid dediscendum—something to be unlearned, which they had sucked in with their milk in Egypt, a country noted for idolatry; Ye shall not do after the doings of the land of Egypt. It would be the greatest absurdity in itself, to retain such an affection for their house of bondage, as to be governed in their devotions by the usages of it; and the greatest ingratitude to God, who had so wonderfully and graciously delivered them. Nay, being governed by a spirit of contradiction, even after they had received these ordinances of God, they would be in danger of admitting the wicked usages of the Canaanites, and of inheriting their vices with their land. Of this danger they are here warned, Ye shall not walk in their ordinances. Such a tyrant is custom, that their practices are called ordinances, and they became rivals even with God's ordinances, and God's professing people were in danger of receiving law from them.

3. A solemn charge to them to keep God's judgments, statutes, and ordinances, v. 4, 5. To this charge, and many similar ones, David seems to refer, in the many prayers and professions he makes relating to God's laws in the 119th Psalm. Observe here, (1.) The great rule of our obedience; God's statutes and judgments. Those we must keep to walk therein. We must keep them in our books, and keep them in our hands, that we may practise them in our hearts and lives. Remember God's commandments to do them; (Ps. 103. 18.) we must keep in them, as our way to travel in; keep to them, as our rule to work by; keep them as our treasure, as the apple of our eye, with the utmost care and value. (2.) The great advantage of our obedience; Which if a man do, he shall live in them, that is, "he shall be happy here and hereafter." We have reason to thank God, [1.] That this is still in force as a promise, with a very favourable construction of the condition. If we keep God's commandments in sincerity, though we come short of a sinless perfection, we shall find that the way of duty is the way of comfort, and will be the way to happiness. Godliness has the promise of life, 1 Tim. 4. 8. Wisdom has said, Keep my commandments, and live; and if through the Spirit we mortify the deeds of the body, (which are to us as the usages of Egypt were to Israel,) we shall live. [2.] That it is not so in force in the nature of a covenant, as that the least transgression shall for ever exclude us from this life. The apostle quotes this twice, as opposite to the faith which the gospel reveals. It is the description of the righteousness which is by the law, the man that doeth them shall live év avrois—in them, (Rom. 10. 5.) and is urged to prove, that the law is not of faith, Gal. 3. 12. The alteration which the gospel has made, is in the last word; still the man that doeth them shall live, but not live in them: for the law could not give life, because we could not perfectly keep it: it was weak through the flesh, not in itself; but now the man that doeth them shall live by the faith of the Son of God. He shall owe his life to the grace of Christ, and not to the merit of his own works; see Gal. 3. 21, 22. The just shall live, but they shall live by faith, by virtue of their union with Christ, who is their Life.

6. None of you shall approach to any that is near of kin to him, to uncover their nakedness: I am the LORD. 7. The nakedness of thy father, or the nakedness of thy mother, shalt thou not uncover; she is thy mother; thou shalt not uncover her nakedness. 8. The nakedness of thy father's wife shalt thou not uncover: it is thy father's nakedness. 9. The nakedness of thy sister, the daughter of thy father, or daughter of thy mother, whether she be born at home, or born abroad, even their nakedness thou shalt not uncover. 10. The nakedness of thy son's daughter, or of thy daughter's daughter, even their nakedness thou shalt not uncover: for their's is thine own nakedness. 11. The nakedness of thy father's wife's daughter, begotten of thy father, (she is thy sister,) thou shalt not uncover her nakedness. 12. Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy father's sister: she is thy father's near kinswoman. 13. Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy mother's sister: for she is thy mother's near kinswoman. 14. Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy father's brother, thou shalt not approach to his wife: she is thine aunt. 15. Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy daughter-in-law: she is thy son's wife; thou shalt not uncover her nakedness. 16. Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy brother's wife: it is thy brother's nakedness. 17. Thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of a woman and her daughter, neither shalt thou take her son's daughter, or her daughter's daughter, to uncover her nakedness; for they are her near kinswomen: it is wickedness. 18. Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister, to vex her, to uncover her nakedness, beside the other in her life-time.

These laws relate to the seventh commandment, and, no doubt, are obligatory on us under the gospel, for they are consonant to the very light and law of nature: one of the articles, that of a man's having his father's wife, the apostle speaks of as a sin not so much as named among the Gentiles, 1 Cor. 5. 1. Though some of the incests here forbidden were practised by some particular persons among the heathen, yet they were disallowed and detested, unless among those nations who were become barbarous, and were quite given up to vile affections.

Observe, 1. That which is forbidden as to the relations here specified, is approaching to them to uncover their nakedness, v. 6. (1.) It is chiefly intended to forbid the marrying of any of these relations. Marriage is a divine institution; that, and the sabbath, the eldest of all others, of equal standing with man upon the earth: it is intended for the comfort of human life, and the decent and honourable propagation of the human race, such as became the dignity of man's nature, above that of the beasts. It is honourable in all, and these laws are for the support of the honour of it. It was requisite that a divine ordinance should be subject to divine rules and restraints, especially because it concerns a thing wherein the corrupt nature of man is as apt as in any thing to be wilful and impetuous in its desires, and impatient of check. Yet these prohibitions, beside their being enacted by an incontestable authority, are in themselves highly reasonable and equitable. [1.] By marriage two were to become one flesh, therefore those that before were in a sense one flesh by nature, could not, without the greatest absurdity, become one flesh by institution; for the institution was designed to unite those who before were not united. [2.] Marriage puts an equality between husband and wife; "Is she not thy companion taken out of thy side?" Therefore if those who before were superior and inferior, should intermarry, (which is the case in most of the instances here laid down,) the order of nature would be taken away by a positive institution, which must by no means be allowed. The inequality between master and servant, noble and ignoble, is founded in consent and custom, and there is no harm done if that be taken away by the equality of marriage; but the inequality between parents and children, uncles and nieces, aunts and nephews, either by blood or marriage, is founded in nature, and is therefore perpetual, and cannot without confusion be taken away by the equality of marriage, the institution of which, though ancient, is subsequent to the order of nature. [3.] No relations that are equals are forbidden, except brothers and sisters, either by the whole blood, or half blood, or by marriage; and in this there is not the same natural absurdity as in the former, for Adam's sons must of necessity have married their own sisters; but it was requisite that it should be made by a positive law unlawful and detestable, for the preventing of sinful familiarities between those that in the days of their youth are supposed to live in a house together, and yet cannot intermarry without defeating one of the intentions of marriage, which is the enlargement of friendship and interest. If every man married his own sister, (as they would be apt to do from generation to generation, if it were lawful,) each family would be a world to itself, and it would be forgotten that we are members one of another. It is certain that this has always been looked upon by the more sober heathen as a most infamous and abominable thing; and they who had not this law, yet were herein a law to themselves. The making use of the ordinance of marriage for the patronising of incestuous mixtures, is so far from justifying them or extenuating their guilt, that it adds the guilt of profaning an ordinance of God, and prostituting that to the vilest purposes, which was instituted for the noblest ends. But, (2.) Uncleanness, committed with any of these relations out of marriage, is likewise, without doubt, forbidden here, and no less intended than the former: as also, all lascivious carriage, wanton dalliance, and every thing that has the appearance of this evil. Relations must love one another, and are to have free and familiar converse with each other, but it must be with all purity; and the less it is suspected of evil by others, the more care ought the persons themselves to take, that Satan do not get advantage against them, for he is a very subtle enemy, and seeks all occasions against us.

2. The relations forbidden are most of them plainly described; and it is generally laid down as a rule, that what relations of a man's own he is bound up from marrying with, the same relations of his wife he is likewise forbidden to marry with, for they two are one. That law which forbids marrying a brother's wife, (v.16.) had an exception peculiar to the Jewish state, that if a man died without issue, his brother, or next of kin, should marry the widow, and raise up seed to the deceased, (Deut.25.5.) for reasons which held good only in that commonwealth; and therefore now that those reasons have ceased, the exception ceases, and the law is in force, that a man must in no case marry his brother's widow. That article, (v.18.) which forbids a man to take a wife to her sister, supposes a connivance at polygamy, as some other laws then did, (Exod.21.10. Deut.21.15.) but forbids a man's marrying two sisters, as Jacob did, because between them who had before been equal, there would be apt to arise greater jealousies and animosities than between wives that were not so nearly related. If the sister of the wife be taken for the concubine, or secondary wife, nothing can be more vexing in her life, or as long as she lives.

19. Also thou shalt not approach unto a woman to uncover her nakedness, as long as she is put apart for her uncleanness. 20. Moreover, thou shalt not lie carnally with thy neighbour's wife, to defile thyself with her. 21. And thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through the fire to Moloch, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the LORD. 22. Thou shalt not lie with mankind, as with womankind; it is abomination. 23. Neither shalt thou lie with any beast to defile thyself therewith: neither shall any woman stand before a beast to lie down thereto: it is confusion. 24. Defile not ye yourselves in any of these things: for in all these the nations are defiled which I cast out before you: 25. And the land is defiled: therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants. 26. Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments, and shall not commit any of these abominations; neither any of your own nation, nor any stranger that sojourneth among you; 27. (For all these abominations have the men of the land done, which were before you, and the land is defiled;) 28. That the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you. 29. For whosoever shall commit any of these abominations, even the souls that commit them shall be cut off from among their people. 30. Therefore shall ye keep mine ordinance, that ye commit not any one of these abominable customs, which were committed before you, and that ye defile not yourselves therein: I am the LORD your God.

Here is,

I. A law to preserve the honour of the marriage-bed, that it should not be unseasonably used, (v.19.) nor invaded by an adulterer, v.20.

II. A law against that which was the most unnatural idolatry, causing their children to pass through the fire to Moloch, v.21.

Moloch (as some think) was the idol in and by which they worshipped the sun, that great fire of the world; and therefore, in the worship of it, they made their own children either sacrifices to this idol, burning them to death before it; or devotees to it, causing them to pass between two fires, as some think, or to be thrown through one, to the honour of this pretended deity; imagining that the consecrating of but one of their children in this manner to Moloch would procure good fortune for all the rest of their children. Did idolaters thus give their own children to false gods, and shall we think any thing too dear to be dedicated to, or to be parted with for, the true God? See how this sin of Israel (which they were afterward guilty of, notwithstanding this law) is aggravated by the relation which they and their children stood in to God; (Ezek.16.20.) Thou hast taken thy sons and thy daughters, whom thou hast born unto me, and these thou hast sacrificed. Therefore it is here called profaning the name of their God; for it looked as if they thought they were under greater obligations to Moloch than to Jehovah; for to him they offered their cattle only, but to Moloch their children.

III. A law against unnatural lusts, sodomy, and bestiality, sins not to be named or thought of without the utmost abhorrence imaginable, v.22,23. Other sins level men with the beasts, but these sink them much lower. That ever there should have been occasion for the making of these laws, and that, since they are published, they should ever have been broken, is the perpetual reproach and scandal of the human nature: the giving of men up to these vile affections was frequently the punishment of their idolatries; so the apostle shews, Rom.1.24.

IV. Arguments against these and the like abominable wickednesses. He that has an indisputable right to command us, yet because he will deal with us as men, and draw with the cords of a man, condescends to reason with us. 1. Sinners defile themselves with these abominations; (v.24.) Defile not yourselves in any of these things. All sin is defiling to the conscience, but these are sins that have a particular turpitude in them. Our heavenly Father, in kindness to us, requires of us that we keep ourselves clean, and do not wallow in the dirt. 2. The souls that commit them shall be cut off, v.29. And justly; for, If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy, 1 Cor.3.17. Fleshly lusts war against the soul, and will certainly be the ruin of it, if God's mercy and grace prevent not. 3. The land is defiled, v.25. If such wickednesses as these be practised and connived at, the land is thereby made unfit to have God's tabernacle in it, and the pure and holy God will withdraw the tokens of his gracious presence from it. It is also rendered unwholesome to the inhabitants, who are hereby infected with sin, and exposed to plagues; and it is really nauseous and loathsome to all good men in it, as the wickedness of Sodom was to the soul of righteous Lot. 4. These have been the abominations of the former inhabitants, v.24,27. Therefore it was necessary that these laws should be made, as antidotes and preservatives from the plague are then necessary, when we go into an infected place. And therefore they should not practise any such things; because the nations that had practised them now lay under the curse of God, and were shortly to fall by the sword of Israel. They could not but be sensible how odious these people had made themselves, who wallowed in this mire, and how they stank in the nostrils of all good men; and shall a people, sanctified and dignified as Israel was, make themselves thus vile? When we observe how ill sin looks in others, we should use that as an argument with ourselves, with the utmost care and caution to preserve our purity. 5. For these and the like sins, the Canaanites were to be destroyed: these filled the measure of the Amorites' iniquity, (Gen.15.16.) and brought down that destruction of so many populous kingdoms, which the Israelites were now shortly to be not only the spectators, but the instruments of; Therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, v.25. Note, The tremendous judgments of God, executed on those that are daringly profane and atheistical, are intended as warnings to those who profess religion, to take heed of every thing that has the least appearance of, or tendency toward, profaneness or atheism. Even the ruin of the Canaanites is an admonition to the Israelites, not to do like them. Nay, to shew that not only the Creator it provoked, but the creation burthened, by such abominations as these, it is added, (v. 25.) The land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants. The very ground they went upon did, as it were, groan under them, and was sick of them, and not easy till it had discharged itself of these enemies of the Lord, Isa. 1. 24. This bespeaks the extreme loathsomeness of sin; sinful man indeed drinks in iniquity like water, but the harmless part of the creation even heaves at it, and rises against it. Many a house and many a town have spued out the wicked inhabitants, as it were, with abhorrence, Rev. 3. 16. Therefore take heed, saith God, that the land spue not you out also, v. 28. It was secured to them, and entailed upon them, and yet they must expect that if they made the vices of the Canaanites their own, with their land their fate would be the same. Note, Wicked Israelites are as abominable to God as wicked Canaanites, and more so, and will be as soon spued out, or sooner. Such a warning as this here given to the Israelites, is given by the apostle to the Gentile converts, with reference to the converted Jews, in whose room they were substituted, (Rom. 11. 19, &c.) they must take heed of falling by the same example of unbelief, Heb. 4. 11. Apply it more generally; and let it deter us effectually from all sinful courses, to consider how many they have been the ruin of. Lay the ear of faith to the gates of the bottomless pit, and hear the doleful shrieks and outcries of damned sinners, whom earth has spued out, and hell has swallowed, that find themselves undone, for ever undone, by sin; and tremble lest this be your portion at last. God's threatenings and judgments should frighten us from sin.

Lastly, The chapter concludes with a sovereign antidote against this infection, (v. 30.) Therefore ye shall keep mine ordinance, that ye commit not any one of these abominable customs. This is the remedy prescribed. Note, 1. Sinful customs are abominable customs, and their being common and fashionable does not make them at all the less abominable, nor should we the less abominate them, but the more; because the more customary they are, the more dangerous they are. 2. It is of pernicious consequence to admit and allow of any one sinful custom, because one will make way for many. Uno absurdo dato, mille sequuntur—Admit but a single absurdity, you invite a thousand. The way of sin is downhill. 3. A close and constant adherence to God's ordinances is the most effectual preservative from the infection of gross sin. The more we taste of the sweetness, and feel of the power, of holy ordinances, the less attachment we shall have to the forbidden pleasures of sinners' abominable customs. It is the grace of God only that will secure us, and that grace is to be expected only in the use of the means of grace. Nor does God ever leave any to their own hearts' lusts, till they have first left him and his institutions.

CHAP. XIX.

Some ceremonial precepts there are in this chapter, but most of them are moral. One would wonder, that, when some of the lighter matters of the law are greatly enlarged upon, (witness two long chapters concerning the leprosy,) many of the weightier matters are put into a little compass: divers of the single verses of this chapter contain whole laws concerning judgment and mercy; for these are things which are manifest in every man's conscience; men's own thoughts are able to explain these, and to comment upon them.

I. The laws of this chapter, which were peculiar to the Jews, are, 1. Concerning their peace-offerings, v. 5..8. 2. Concerning the gleanings of their fields, v. 9, 10. 3. Against mixtures of their cattle, seed, and cloth, v. 19. 4. Concerning their trees, v. 23..25. 5. Against some superstitious usages, v. 26..28. But, II. Most of these precepts are obligatory on us, for they are expositions of most of the ten commandments. 1. Here is the preface to the ten commandments, I am the Lord, repeated here fifteen times. 2. A sum of the ten commandments. All the first table in that, Be ye holy, v. 2. All the second table in that, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, (v. 18.) and an answer to that question, Who is my neighbour? v. 33, 34. 3. Something of each commandment. (1.) The first commandment implied in that which is often repeated here, I am your God. And here is a prohibition of enchantment, (v. 26.) and witchcraft, (v. 31.) which make a god of the Devil. (2.) Idolatry, against the second commandment, is forbidden, v. 4. (3.) Prophanation of God's name, against the third, v. 12. (4.) Sabbath sanctification is pressed, v. 3, 30. (5.) Children are required to honour their parents, (v. 3.) and the aged, v. 32. (6.) Hatred and revenge are here forbidden, against the sixth commandment, v. 17, 18. (7.) Adultery, (v. 20..22.) and whoredom, v. 29. (8.) Justice is here required in judgment, (v. 15.) theft forbidden, (v. 11.) fraud, and withholding dues, (v. 13.) and false weights, v. 35, 36. (9.) Lying, v. 11. Stoudering, v. 14. Tale-bearing, and false-witness bearing, v. 16. 10. The tenth commandment laying a restraint upon the heart, so does that, (v. 17.) Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart. And here is a solemn charge to observe all these statutes, v. 37. Now these are things which need not much help for the understanding of them, but require constant care and watchfulness for the observing of them. A good understanding have all they that do these commandments.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, and say unto them, Ye shall be holy: for I the LORD your God am holy. 3. Ye shall fear every man his mother and his father, and keep my sabbaths: I am the LORD your God. 4. Turn ye not unto idols, nor make to yourselves molten gods: I am the LORD your God. 5. And if ye offer a sacrifice of peace-offerings unto the LORD, ye shall offer it at your own will. 6. It shall be eaten the same day ye offer it, and on the morrow: and if aught remain until the third day, it shall be burnt in the fire. 7. And if it be eaten at all on the third day, it is abominable; it shall not be accepted. 8. Therefore every one that eateth it shall bear his iniquity, because he hath profaned the hallowed thing of the LORD: and that soul shall be cut off from among his people. 9. And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field, neither shalt thou gather the gleanings of thy harvest. 10. And thou shalt not glean thy vineyard, neither shalt thou gather every grape of thy vineyard; thou shalt leave them for the poor and stranger; I am the LORD your God.

Moses is ordered to deliver the summary of the laws to all the congregation of the children of Israel; (v. 2.) not to Aaron and his sons only, but to all the people, for they were all concerned to know their duty. Even in the darker ages of the law, that religion could not be of God which boasted of ignorance as its mother. Moses must make known God's statutes to all the congregation, and proclaim them through the camp. These laws, it is probable, he delivered himself to as many of the people as could be within hearing at once, and so by degrees at several times to them all. Many of the precepts here given they had received before, but it was requisite that they should be repeated, that they might be remembered; precept must be upon precept, and line upon line, and all little enough.

In these verses,

1. It is required that Israel be a holy people, because the God of Israel is a holy God, v. 2. Their being distinguished from all other people by peculiar laws and customs, was intended to teach them a real separation from the world and the flesh, and an entire devotedness to God. And this is now the law of Christ, (The Lord bring every thought within us into obedience to it!) Ye shall be holy, for I am holy, 1 Pet. 1. 15, 16. We are the followers of the holy Jesus, and therefore must be, according to our capacity, consecrated to God's honour, and conformed to his nature and will. Israel was sanctified by the types and shadows, (ch. 20. 8.) but we are sanctified by the truth, or substance of all those shadows, John, 17. 17. Tit. 2. 14.

II. That children be obedient to their parents, (v. 3.) Ye shall fear every man his mother and his father. 1. The fear here required is the same with the honour commanded by the fifth commandment; see Mal. 1. 6. It includes inward reverence and esteem, outward expressions of respect, obedience to the lawful commands of parents, care and endeavour to please them and make them easy, and to avoid every thing that may offend and grieve them, and incur their displeasure. The Jewish doctors ask, "What is this fear that is owing to a father?" And they answer, "It is not to stand in his way, nor to sit in his place, nor to contradict what he says, or to carp at it, nor to call him by his name, either living or dead, but "My Father," or "Sir;" it is to provide for him if he be poor, and the like." 2. Children, when they grow up to be men, must not think themselves discharged from this duty: every man, though he is a wise man, and a great man, yet must reverence his parents, because they are his parents. 3. The mother is put first, which is not usual, to shew that the duty is equally owing to both; if the mother survive the father, still she must be revered and obeyed. 4. It is added, and keep my sabbaths. If God provides by his law for the preserving of the honour of parents, parents must use their authority over their children for the preserving of the honour of God, particularly the honour of his sabbaths, the custody of which is very much committed to parents by the fourth commandment, Thou, and thy son, and thy daughter. The ruin of young people has often been observed to begin in the contempt of their parents, and the profanation of the sabbath-day. Fittingly therefore are these two precepts here put together in the beginning of this abridgment of the statutes, Ye shall fear every man his mother and his father, and keep my sabbaths. Those are hopeful children, and likely to do well, that make conscience of honouring their parents, and keeping holy the sabbath-day. 5. The reason added to both these precepts is, "I am the Lord your God; the Lord of the sabbath, and the God of your parents."

III. That God only be worshipped, and not by images, (v. 4.) "Turn ye not to idols; to Elilim, to vanities, things of no power, no value, gods that are no gods." Turn not from the true God to false ones, from the mighty God to impotent ones, from the God that will make you holy and happy to those that will deceive you, debauch you, ruin you, and make you for ever miserable. Turn not your eye to them, much less your heart. Make not to yourselves gods, the creatures of your own fancy, nor think to worship the Creator by molten gods. You are the work of God's hands, be not so absurd as to worship gods the work of your own hands. Molten gods are specified for the sake of the molten calf.

IV. That the sacrifices of their peace-offerings should always be offered, and taken, according to the law, v. 5. . 8. There was some particular reason, it is likely, for the repetition of this law, rather than any other relating to the sacrifices. The eating of the peace-offerings was the people's part, and was done from under the eye of the priests, and perhaps some of them had kept the cold meat of their peace-offerings, as they had done the manna, (Exod. 16. 20.) longer than was appointed, which occasioned this caution; see the law itself before, ch. 7. 16. . 18. God will have his own work done in his own time. Though the sacrifice was offered according to the law, if it was not eaten according to the law, it was not accepted. Though ministers do their part, what the better, if people do not theirs? There is work to be done after our spiritual sacrifices, in a due improvement of them; if this be neglected, all is in vain.

V. That they should leave the gleanings of their harvest and vintage for the poor, v. 9, 10. Note, Works of piety must be always attended with works of charity, according as our ability is. When they gathered in their corn, they must leave some standing in the corner of the field; the Jewish doctors say, "It should be a sixtieth part of the field;" and they must also leave the gleanings and the small clusters of their grapes, which at first were overlooked. This law, though not binding now in the letter of it, yet teaches us, 1. That we must not be covetous and griping, and greedy of every thing we can lay any claim to; nor insist upon our right in things small and trivial. 2. That we must be well-pleased to see the poor supplied and refreshed with the fruit of our labours. We must not think every thing lost that goes beside ourselves, nor any thing wasted that goes to the poor. 3. That times of joy, such as harvest-time is, are proper times for charity, that when we rejoice, the poor may rejoice with us, and when our hearts are blessing God, their loins may bless us.

11. Ye shall not steal, neither deal falsely, neither lie one to another. 12. And ye shall not swear by my name falsely, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the LORD. 13. Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour, neither rob him: the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee all night until the morning. 14. Thou shalt not curse the deaf, nor put a stumbling-block before the blind, but shalt fear thy God: I am the LORD. 15. Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment: thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty; but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour. 16. Thou shalt not go up and down as a tale-bearer among thy people: neither shalt thou stand against the blood of thy neighbour: I am the LORD. 17. Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart: thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbour, and not suffer sin upon him. 18. Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people, but thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself: I am the LORD.

We are taught here,

I. To be honest and true in all our dealings, v. 11. God, who has appointed every man's property by his providence, forbids by his law the invading of that appointment, either by downright theft, Ye shall not steal, or by fraudulent dealing, "Ye shall not cheat, or deal falsely." Whatever we have in the world, we must see to it that it be honestly come by, for we cannot be truly rich, nor long rich, with that which is not. The God of truth, who requires truth in the heart, (Ps. 51. 6.) requires it also in the tongue, Neither lie one to another, either in bargaining or common converse. This is one of the laws of Christianity, (Col. 3. 9.) Lie not one to another. They that do not speak truth, do not deserve to be told truth; they that sin by lying, justly suffer by it; therefore we are forbid to lie one to another; for if we lie to others, we teach them to lie to us.

II. To maintain a very reverent regard to the sacred name of God, (v. 12.) and not to call him to be witness either, 1. To a lie, Ye shall not swear falsely. It is bad to tell a lie, but it is much worse to swear it. Or, 2. To a trifle, and every impertinence, Neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God, by alienating it to any other purpose than that for which it is to be religiously used.

III. Neither to take nor keep any one's right from them, v. 13. We must not take that which is none of our own, either by fraud or robbery; nor detain that which belongs to another, particularly the wages of the hireling, let it not abide with thee all night. Let the day-labourer have his wages, as soon as he has done his day's work, if he desires it. It is a great sin to deny the payment of it, nay, to defer it to his damage, a sin that cries to heaven for vengeance, Jam. 5. 4.

IV. To be particularly tender of the credit and safety of those that cannot help themselves, v. 14. 1. The credit of the deaf; Thou shalt not curse the deaf; neither those that are naturally deaf, that cannot hear at all; nor those that are absent, and at present out of hearing of the curse, and so that cannot shew their resentment, return the affront, or right themselves; nor those that are patient, that seem as if they heard not, and are not willing to take notice of it, as David, Ps. 33. 13. Do not therefore injure any, because they are unwilling, or unable, to avenge themselves, for God sees and hears, though they do not. 2. The safety of the blind we must likewise be tender of, and not put a stumbling-block before them; for this is to add affliction to the afflicted, and to make God's providence a servant to our malice. This prohibition implies a precept to help the blind, and remove stumbling-blocks out of their way. The Jewish writers, thinking it impossible that any should be so barbarous as to put a stumbling-block in the way of the blind, understood it figuratively, that it forbids giving bad counsel to those that are simple and easily imposed upon, by which they may be led to do something to their own prejudice. We ought to take heed of doing any thing which may occasion our weak brother to fall, Rom. 14. 13. 1 Cor. 8. 9. It is added, as a preservative from these sins, but fear thou God. "Thou dost not fear the deaf and blind, they cannot right themselves; but remember it is the glory of God to help the helpless, and he will plead their cause." Note, The fear of God will restrain us from doing that which will not expose us to men's resentments.

V. Judges and all in authority are here commanded to give verdict and judgment without partiality; (v. 15.) whether they were constituted judges by commission, or made so in a particular case, by the consent of both parties, as referees or arbitrators, they must do no wrong to either side, but, to the utmost of their skill, must go according to the rules of equity, having respect purely to the merits of the cause, and not to the characters of the person. Justice must never be perverted, either, 1. In pity to the poor, Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, Exod. 23. 3. What ever may be given to a poor man as an alms, yet let nothing be awarded him as his right, but what he is legally entitled to, nor let his poverty excuse him from any just punishment for a fault. Or, 2. In veneration or fear of the mighty, in whose favour judges would be most frequently biassed. The Jews say, "Judges were obliged by this law to be so impartial, as not to let one of the contending parties sit while the other stood; nor permit one to say what he pleased, and bid the other be short;" see James, 2. 1. . 3.

VI. We are all forbidden to do any thing injurious to our neighbour's good name, (v. 16.) either, 1. In common conversation; Thou shalt not go up and down as a tale-bearer. It is as bad an office as a man can put himself into, to be the publisher of every man's faults, divulging what was secret, aggravating crimes, and making the worst of every thing that was amiss, with design to blast and ruin men's reputation, and to sow discord among neighbours. The word used for a tale-bearer signifies a pedlar or petty chapman, the interlopers of trade: for tale-bearers pick up ill-natured stories at one house, and utter them at another, and commonly barter slanders by way of exchange. See this sin condemned, Prov. 11. 13.—20. 19. Jer. 9. 4, 5. Ezek. 22. 9. Or, 2. In witness-bearing; "Neither shalt thou stand as a witness against the blood of thy neighbour, if his blood be innocent, nor join in confederacy with such bloody men as those described," Prov. 1. 11, 12. The Jewish doctors put this further sense upon it, "Thou shalt not stand by and see thy brother in danger, but thou shalt come in to his relief and succour, though it be with the peril of thy own life and limb;" they add, "He that can by his testimony clear one that is accused, is obliged by this law to do it;" see Prov. 24. 11, 12.

VII. We are commanded to rebuke our neighbour in love, (v. 17.) Thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbour. 1. Rather rebuke him than hate him, for an injury done to thyself. If we apprehend that our neighbour has any way wronged us, we must not conceive a secret grudge against him, and estrange ourselves from him, speaking to him neither bad nor good, as the manner of some is, who have the art of concealing their displeasure till they have an opportunity of a full revenge; (2 Sam. 13. 22.) but we must rather give vent to our resentments with the meekness of wisdom, endeavour to convince our brother of the injury, reason the case fairly with him, and so put an end to the disgust conceived: thus is the rule our Saviour gives in this case, Luke, 17. 3. 2. Therefore rebuke him for his sin against God, because thou lovest him; endeavour to bring him to repentance, that his sin may be pardoned, and he may turn from it, and it may not be suffered to lie upon him. Note, Friendly reproof is a duty we owe to one another, and we ought both to give it and take it in love. Let the righteous smite me, and it shall be a kindness, Ps. 141. 5. Faithful and useful are those wounds of a friend, Prov. 27. 5, 6. It is here strictly commanded, "Thou shalt in any wise do it, and not omit it under any pretence." Consider, (1.) The guilt we incur by not reproving: it is construed here into a hating of our brother. We are ready to argue thus, "Such a one is a friend I love, therefore I will not make him uneasy by telling him of his faults;" but we should rather say, "therefore I will do him the kindness to tell him of them." Love covers sin from others, but not from the sinner himself. (2.) The mischief we do by not reproving; we suffer sin upon him; and must we help the ass of an enemy that is fallen under his burthen, and shall we not help the soul of a friend? Exod. 23. 5. And by suffering sin upon him, we are in danger of bearing sin for him, as the margin reads it. If we reprove not the unfruitful works of darkness, we have fellows ip with them, and become accessaries ex post facto—after the fact, Eph. 5. 11. It is thy brother, thy neighbour, that is concerned; and he was a Cain that said, Am I my brother's keeper?

VIII. We are here required to put off all malice, and to put on brotherly love, v. 18. 1. We must be ill-affected to none; Thou shalt not avenge nor bear any grudge; to the same purport with that, (v. 17.) Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart; for malice is murder begun. If our brother has done us an injury, we must not return it upon him, that is avenging; we must not upon every occasion upbraid him with it, that is bearing a grudge; but we must both forgive it and forget it, for thus we are forgiven of God. It is a most ill-natured thing, and the bane of friendship, to retain the resentment of affronts and injuries, and to let that sword devour for ever. 2. We must be well-affected to all; Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. We often wrong ourselves, but we soon forgive ourselves those wrongs, and they do not at all lessen our love to ourselves; and in like manner we should love our neighbour. Our Saviour has made this the second great commandment of the law, (Matth. 22. 39.) and the apostle shews how it is the summary of all the laws of the second table, Rom. 13. 9, 10. Gal. 5. 14. We must love our neighbour as truly as we love ourselves, and without dissimulation; we must evidence our love to our neighbour in the same way as that by which we evidence our love to ourselves, preventing his hurt, and procuring his good, to the utmost of our power. We must do to our neighbour as we would be done to ourselves, (Matth. 7. 12.) putting our souls into his soul's stead, Job, 16. 4, 5. Nay, we must in many cases deny ourselves for the good of our neighbour, as St. Paul, 1 Cor. 9. 19, &c. Herein the gospel goes beyond even that excellent precept of the law; for Christ, by laying down his life for us, has taught us even to lay down our lives for the brethren, in some cases, (1 John, 3. 16.) and so to love our neighbour better than ourselves.

19. Ye shall keep my statutes. Thou shalt not let thy cattle gender with a diverse kind: Thou shalt not sow thy field with mingled seed: neither shall a garment mingled of linen and woollen come upon thee. 20. And whosoever lieth carnally with a woman, that is a bondmaid betrothed to an husband, and not at all redeemed, nor freedom given her, she shall be scourged; they shall not be put to death, because she was not free. 21. And he shall bring his trespass-offering unto the Lord, unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, even a ram for a trespass-offering. 22. And the priest shall make an atonement for him with the ram of the trespass-offering, before the LORD, for his sin which he hath done: and the sin which he hath done shall be forgiven him. 23. And when ye shall come into the land, and shall have planted all manner of trees for food, then ye shall count the fruit thereof as uncircumcised: three years shall it be as uncircumcised unto you: it shall not be eaten of. 24. But in the fourth year all the fruit thereof shall be holy to praise the LORD withal. 25. And in the fifth year shall ye eat of the fruit thereof, that it may yield unto you the increase thereof: I am the LORD your God. 26. Ye shall not eat any thing with the blood: neither shall ye use enchantment, nor observe times. 27. Ye shall not round the corners of your heads, neither shalt thou mar the corners of thy beard. 28. Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you: I am the LORD. 29. Do not prostitute thy daughter, to cause her to be a whore; lest the land fall to whoredom, and the land become full of wickedness.

Here is,

I. A law against mixtures, v.19. God in the beginning made the cattle after their kind, (Gen. 1.25.) and we must acquiesce in the order of nature God hath established, believing that is best and sufficient, and not covet monsters. Add thou not unto his works, lest he reprove thee; for it is the excellency of the work of God, that nothing can, without making it worse, be either put to it or taken from it, Eccl. 3.14. As what God has joined, we must not separate; so what he has separated, we must not join. The sowing of mingled corn and the wearing of linsy-woolsey garments are forbidden, either as superstitious customs of the heathen, or to intimate how careful they should be not to mingle themselves with the heathen, nor to weave any of the usages of the Gentiles into God's ordinances. Ainsworth suggests, that it was to lead Israel to the simplicity and sincerity of religion, and to all the parts and doctrines of the law and gospel in their distinct kinds. As faith is necessary, good works are necessary; but to mingle these together in the cause of our justification before God, is forbidden, Gal. 2.16.

II. A law for punishing adultery committed with one that was a bondmaid that was espoused, v.20. 22. If she had not been espoused, the law appointed no punishment at all; being espoused, if she had not been a bondmaid, the punishment had been no less than death; but being as yet a bondmaid, (though before the completing of her espousals she must have been made free,) the capital punishment is remitted, and they shall both be scourged; or, as some think, the woman only, and the man was to bring a sacrifice. It was for the honour of marriage, though but begun by betrothing, that the crime should be punished; but it was for the honour of freedom, that it should not be punished so as the debauching of a free woman was; so great was the difference then made between bond and free, (Gal. 4.30.) but the gospel of Christ knows no such distinction, Col. 3.11.

III. A law concerning fruit trees, that for the three first years after they were planted, if they should happen to be so forward as to bear in that time, yet no use should be made of the fruit, v.23. 25. It was therefore the practice of the Jews to pluck off the fruit, as soon as they perceived it knit, from their young trees, as gardeners do sometimes, because their early bearing hinders their growing. If any did come to perfection, it was not to be used in the service either of God or man; but what they bore the fourth year, was to be holy to the Lord, either given to the priests, or eaten before the Lord with joy, as their second title was, and from thenceforward it was all their own. Now, 1. Some think this taught them not to follow the custom of the heathen, who, they say, consecrated the very first productions of their fruit-trees to their idols, saying, that otherwise all the fruits would be blasted. 2. This law in the case of fruit-trees seems to be parallel with that in the case of animals, that no creature should be accepted as an offering till it was past eight days old, nor till that day were children to be circumcised; see ch. 22.27. God would have the first-fruits of their trees, but because for the three first years they were as inconsiderable as a lamb or a calf under eight days old, therefore God would not have them, for it is fit he should have every thing at its best; and yet he would not allow them to use them, because his first-fruits were not as yet offered; they must therefore be accounted as uncircumcised, that is, as an animal under eight days old, not fit for any use. 3. We are hereby taught not to be over-hasty in catching at any comfort, but to be willing with patience to wait the time for the enjoyment of it, and particularly to acknowledge ourselves unworthy of the increase of the earth, our right to the fruits of which was forfeited by our first parents eating forbidden fruit, and we are restored to it only by the word of God and prayer, 1 Tim. 4.5.

IV. A law against the superstitious usages of the heathen, v.26. 28. 1. Eating upon the blood, as the Gentiles did, who gathered the blood of their sacrifices into a vessel for their demons (as they fancied) to drink, and then sat about it, eating the flesh themselves, signifying their communion with devils by their feasting with them. Let not this custom be used, for the blood of God's sacrifices was to be sprinkled on the altar, and then poured at the foot of it, and conveyed away. 2. Enchantment and divination, and a superstitious observation of the times, some days and hours lucky, and others unlucky. Curious arts of this kind, it is likely, had been of late invented by the Egyptian priests, to amuse the people, and support their own credit. The Israelites had seen them practised, but must by no means imitate them. It would be unpardonable in them, to whom were committed the oracles of God, to ask counsel of the Devil; and yet worse in Christians, to whom the Son of God is manifested, who has destroyed the works of the Devil. For Christians to have their nativities cast, and their fortunes told them, to use spells and charms for the cure of diseases and the driving away of evil spirits, to be affected with the falling of the salt, a hare crossing the way, cross days, or the like, is an intolerable affront to the Lord Jesus, a support of paganism and idolatry, and a reproach both to themselves, and to that worthy name by which they are called: and they must be grossly ignorant, both of the law and the gospel, that ask, "What harm is there in these things?" Is it no harm for those that have fellowship with Christ, to have fellowship with devils, or to learn the ways of those that have? Surely we have not so learned Christ. 3. There was a superstition even in trimming themselves, used by the heathen, which must not be imitated by the people of God. Ye shall not round the corners of your heads. They that worshipped the hosts of heaven, in honour of them, cut their hair, so as that their heads might resemble the celestial globe; but as the custom was foolish in itself, so, being done with respect to their false gods, it was idolatrous. 4. The rites and ceremonies by which they expressed their sorrow at their funerals must not be imitated, v.28. They must not make cuts or prints in their flesh for the dead; for the heathen did so to pacify the infernal deities they dreamt of, and to make them propitious to their deceased friends. Christ by his sufferings has altered the property of death, and made it a true friend to every true Israelite; and now, as there needs nothing to make death propitious to us, (for if God be so, death is so of course,) so we sorrow not as those that have no hope. Those whom the God of Israel had set apart for himself, must not receive the image and superscription of these dunghill deities. Lastly, The prostituting of their daughters to uncleanness, which is here forbidden, (v.29.) seems to have been practised by the heathen in their idolatrous worships, for with such abominations those unclean spirits which they worshipped, were well-pleased. And when lewdness obtained as a religious rite, and was committed in their temples, no marvel that the land became full of that wickedness; which, when it entered at the temple-doors, overspread the land like a mighty torrent, and bore down all the fences of virtue and modesty. The Devil himself could not have brought such abominations into their lives, if he had not first brought them into their worship. And justly were they given up to vile affections, who forsook the holy God, and gave divine honours to impure spirits. Those that dishonour God are thus suffered to dishonour themselves and their families.

30. Ye shall keep my sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary: I am the LORD. 31. Regard not them that have familiar spirits, neither seek after wizards, to be defiled by them: I am the LORD your God. 32. Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honour the face of the old man, and fear thy God: I am the LORD. 33. And if a stranger sojourn with thee in your land, ye shall not vex him. 34. But the stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself; for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt: I am the LORD your God. 35. Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. 36. Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have: I am the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt. 37. Therefore shall ye observe all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them: I am the LORD.

Here is,

I. A law for the preserving of the honour of the time and place appropriated to the service of God, v. 30. This would be a means to secure them both from the idolatries and superstitions of the heathen, and from all immoralities in conversation. 1. Sabbaths must be religiously observed, and not those times mentioned, (v. 26.) which the heathen had a superstitious regard to. 2. The sanctuary must be revered; great care must be taken to approach the tabernacle with that purity and preparation which the law required, and to attend there with that humility, decency, and closeness of application, which became them in the immediate presence of such an awful majesty. Though now there is no place holy by divine institution, as the tabernacle and temple then were, yet this law obliges us to respect the solemn assemblies of Christians for religious worship, as being held under a promise of Christ's special presence in them, and to carry ourselves with a due decorum, while in those assemblies we attend the administration of holy ordinances, Eccl. 5. 1.

II. A caution against all communion with witches, and those that were in league with familiar spirits; "Regard them not, seek not after them, be not in fear of any evil from them, or in hopes of any good from them. Regard not their threatenings or promises, or predictions; seek not to them for discovery or advice, for if you do, you are defiled by it, and rendered abominable both to God and your own consciences." This was the sin that completed Saul's wickedness, for which he was rejected of God, 1 Chron. 10. 13.

III. A charge to young people to shew respect to the aged, (v. 32.) Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head. Age is honourable, and he that is the Ancient of days, requires that honour be paid to it. The hoary head is a crown of glory. Those whom God has honoured with the common blessing of long life, we ought to honour with the distinguishing expressions of civility; and those who in age are wise and good, are worthy of double honour: more respect is owing to such old men than merely to rise up before them; their credit and comfort must be carefully consulted, their experience and observations improved, and their counsels asked and hearkened to, Job, 32. 6, 7. Some, by the old man, whose face or presence is to be honoured, understand the elder in office, as by the hoary head, the elder in age; both ought to be respected as fathers, and in the fear of God, who has put some of his honour upon both. Note, Religion teaches good manners, and obliges us to give honour to those to whom honour is due. It is an instance of great degeneracy and disorder in a land, what the child behaves himself proudly against the ancient, and the base against the honourable, Isa. 3. 5. Job, 30. 1, 12. It becomes the aged to receive this honour, and the younger to give it; for it is the ornament as well as duty of their youth, to order themselves lowly and reverently to all their betters.

IV. A charge to the Israelites to be very tender of strangers, v. 33, 34. Both the law of God and his providence had vastly dignified Israel above any other people, yet they must not therefore think themselves authorized to trample upon all mankind, but those of their own nation, and to insult them at their pleasure; no, "Thou shalt not vex a stranger, but love him as thyself, and as one of thine own people." It is supposed that this stranger was not an idolater, but a worshipper of the God of Israel, though not circumcised; a proselyte of the gate at least, though not a proselyte of righteousness: if such a one sojourn among them, they must not vex him, nor oppress, nor over-reach him in a bargain, taking advantage of his ignorance of their laws and customs; they must reckon it as great a sin to cheat a stranger as to cheat an Israelite; "Nay," (say the Jewish doctors,) "they must not so much as upbraid him with his being a stranger, and his having been formerly an idolater." Strangers are God's particular care, as widows and fatherless are, because it is his honour to help the helpless, Ps. 146. 9. It is therefore at our peril if we do them any wrong, or put any hardships upon them. Strangers shall be welcome to God's grace, and therefore we should do what we can to invite them to it, and to recommend religion to their good opinion. It argues a generous disposition, and a pious regard to God, as a common Father, to be kind to strangers; for those of different countries, customs, and languages, are all made of one blood. But here is a reason added peculiar to the Jews, "For ye were strangers in the land of Egypt." God then favoured you, therefore do you now favour the strangers; and do to them as you then wished to be done to. You were strangers, and yet are now thus highly advanced; therefore you know not what these strangers may come to whom you are apt to despise."

V. Justice in weights and measures is here commanded. That there should be no cheat in them, v. 35. That they should be very exact, v. 36. In weighing and measuring, we pretend a design to give all those their own whom we deal with; but if the weights and measures be false, it is like a corruption in judgment, it cheats under colour of justice; and thus to deceive a man to his damage, is worse than picking his pocket, or robbing him on the highway. He that sells, is bound to give the full of the commodity, and he that buys, the full of the price agreed upon, which cannot be done without just balances, weights, and measures. Let no man go beyond or defraud his brother, for though it be hid from man, it will be found that God is the Avenger of all such.

Lastly, The chapter concludes with a general command, (v. 37.) Ye shall observe all my statutes, and do them. Note, 1. We are not likely to do God's statutes, unless we observe them with great care and consideration. 2. Yet it is not enough barely to observe God's precepts, but we must make conscience of obeying them. What will it avail us to be critical in our notions, if we be not conscientious in our conversations? 3. An upright heart has respect to all God's commandments, Ps. 119. 6. Though in many instances the hand fails in doing what should be done, yet the eye observes all God's statutes. We are not allowed to pick and choose our duty, but must aim at standing complete in all the will of God.

CHAP. XX.

The laws which before were made, are in this chapter repeated, and penalties annexed to them; that they who would not be deterred from sin by the fear of God, might be deterred from it by the fear of punishment. If we will not avoid such and such practices because the law has made them sin, (and it is most acceptable when we go on that principle of religion,) surely we shall avoid them when the law has made them death, from a principle of self-preservation. In this chapter we have, I. Many particular crimes that are made capital; 1. Giving their children to Moloch, v. 1. 5. 2. Consulting witches, v. 6, 27. 3. Cursing parents, v. 9. 4. Adultery, v. 10. 5. Incest, v. 11, 12, 14, 17, 19. 21. 6. Unnatural lusts, v. 13, 15, 16, 18. II. General commands given to be holy, v. 7, 8, 22. .26.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Again, thou shalt say to the children of Israel, Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn in Israel, that giveth any of his seed unto Moloch, he shall surely be put to death: the people of the land shall stone him with stones. 3. And I will set my face against that man, and will cut him off from among his people; because he hath given of his seed unto Moloch, to defile my sanctuary, and to profane my holy name. 4. And if the people of the land do any ways hide their eyes from the man, when he giveth of his seed unto Moloch, and kill him not: 5. Then I will set my face against that man, and against his family, and will cut him off, and all that go a whoring after him, to commit whoredom with Moloch, from among their people. 6. And the soul that turneth after such as have familiar spirits, and after wizards, to go a whoring after them, I will even set my face against that soul, and will cut him off from among his people. 7. Sanctify yourselves therefore, and be ye holy: for I am the LORD your God. 8. And ye shall keep my statutes, and do them: I am the LORD which sanctify you. 9. For every one that curseth his father or his mother shall be surely put to death: he hath cursed his father or his mother; his blood shall be upon him.

Moses is here directed to say that again to the children of Israel, which he had in effect said before, v. 2. We are sure it was no vain repetition, but very necessary, that they might give the more earnest heed to the things that were spoken, and might believe them to be of great consequence, being so often inculcated. God speaketh once, yea, twice, and what he orders to be said again, we must be willing to hear again, because for us it is safe, Phil. 3. 1.

Three sins are in these verses threatened with death.

I. Parents abusing of their children, by sacrificing them to Moloch, v. 2, 3. There is the grossest absurdity that can be in all the rites of idolatry, and they are all a great reproach to men's reason; but none trampled upon all the honours of the human nature so as this did, the burning of children in the fire to the honour of a dunghill-god. It was a plain evidence that their gods were devils, which desired and delighted in the misery and ruin of mankind, and that the worshippers were worse than the beasts that perish, perfectly stripped, not only of reason, but of natural affection. Abraham's offering of Isaac could not give countenance, much less could it give rise, to this barbarous practice; since, though that was commanded, it was immediately countermanded. Yet such was the power of the God of this world over the children of disobedience that this monstrous piece of inhumanity was generally practised; and even the Israelites were in danger of being drawn into it, which made it necessary that this severe law should be made against it. It was not enough to tell them they might spare their children, (the fruit of their body should never be accepted for the sin of their soul,) but they must be told,

1. That the criminal himself should be put to death, as a murderer. The people of the land shall stone him with stones, (v. 2.) which was looked upon as the worst of capital punishments among the Jews. If the children were sacrificed to the malice of the Devil, the parents must be sacrificed to the justice of God. And if either the fact could not be proved, or the magistrates did not do their duty, God would take the work into his own hands, (v. 3.) I will cut him off. Note, Those that escape punishment from men, yet shall not escape the righteous judgments of God; so wretchedly do they deceive themselves that promise themselves impunity in sin. How can they escape, against whom God sets his face, that is, whom he frowns upon, meets as an enemy, and fights against? The heinousness of the crime is here set forth to justify the doom; it defiles the sanctuary, and profanes the holy name of God, for the honour of both which he is jealous. Observe, The malignity of the sin is laid upon that in it which was peculiar to Israel; when the Gentiles sacrificed their children, they were guilty of murder and idolatry; but, if the Israelites did it, they incurred the additional guilt of defiling the sanctuary, which they attended upon even when they lay under this guilt, as if there might be an agreement between the temple of God and idols; they were guilty too of profaning the holy name of God, by which they were called, as if he allowed his worshippers to do such things, Rom. 2. 23, 24.

2. That all his aiders and abettors should be cut off likewise by the righteous hand of God. If his neighbours concealed him, and would not come in as witnesses against him; if the magistrates connived at him, and would not pass sentence upon him, rather pitying his folly than hating his impiety; God himself would reckon with them, v. 4, 5. Misprision of idolatry is a crime cognizable in the court of heaven, and which shall not go unpunished. I will set my face against that man, (that magistrate, Jer. 5. 1.) and against his family. Note, (1.) The wickedness of the master of a family often brings ruin upon a family; and he that should be the house-keeper, proves the house-breaker. (2.) If magistrates will not do justice upon offenders, God will do justice upon them; because there is danger that many will go a whoring after them, who do but countenance sin by winking at it. And if the sins of leaders be leading sins, it is fit that their punishments should be exemplary punishments.

II. Children's abusing of their parents, by cursing them, v. 9. If children either speak ill of their parents, or wish ill to them, or carry it scornfully or spitefully toward them, it was an iniquity to be punished by the judges, who were employed as conservators both of God's honour and of the public peace, which were both attempted by this unnatural insolence; (see Prov. 30. 17.) The eye that mocks at his father, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out; which intimates that such wicked children were in a fair way to be not only hanged, but hanged in chains. This law of Moses, Christ quotes and confirms, (Matth. 15. 4.) for it is as direct a breach of the fifth commandment as wilful murder is of the sixth. The same law which requires parents to be tender of their children, requires children to be respectful to their parents. He that despitefully uses his parents, the instruments of his being, flies in the face of God himself, the Author of his being, who will not see the paternal dignity and authority insulted and trampled upon.

III. Persons abusing of themselves by consulting such as have familiar spirits, v. 6. By this, as much as any thing, a man diminishes, disparages, and deceives himself, and so abuses himself. What greater madness can there be, than for a man to go to a liar for information, and to an enemy for advice? They do so, who turn after them that deal in the black art, and know the depths of Satan. This is spiritual adultery as much as idolatry is, giving that honour to the Devil which is due to God only; and the jealous God will give a bill of divorce to those that thus go a whoring from him, and will cut them off, they having first cut themselves off from him.

In the midst of these particular laws comes in that general charge, (v. 7, 8.) where we have, 1. The duties required; and they are two. (1.) That, in our principles, affections, and aims, we be holy: Sanctify yourselves, and be ye holy. We must cleanse ourselves from all the pollutions of sin, consecrate ourselves to the service and honour of God, and conform ourselves in every thing to his holy will and image: this is to sanctify ourselves. (2.) That, in all our actions, and in the whole course of our conversation, we be obedient to the laws of God; Ye shall keep my statutes. By this only we can make it to appear that we have sanctified ourselves and are holy, even by our keeping God's commandments; The tree is known by its fruit. Nor can we keep God's statutes as we ought, unless we first sanctify ourselves, and be holy. Make the tree good, and the fruit will be good. 2. The reasons to enforce these duties. (1.) "I am the Lord your God. Therefore be holy, that ye may resemble him whose people ye are, and may be pleasing to him. Holiness becomes his house and household." (2.) I am the Lord which sanctify you. God sanctified them by peculiar privileges, laws, and favours, which distinguished them from all other nations, and dignified them as a people set apart for God. He gave them his word and ordinances to be means of their sanctification, and his good Spirit to instruct them: therefore they must be holy, else they received the grace of God herein in vain. Note, [1.] God's people are, and must be, persons of distinction. God has distinguished them by his holy covenant, and therefore they ought to distinguish themselves by their holy conversations. [2.] God's sanctifying us is a good reason why we should sanctify ourselves, that we may comply with the designs of his grace, and not walk contrary to them. If it be the Lord that sanctifies us, we may hope the work shall be done, though it be difficult: the manner of expression is like that, (2 Cor. 5. 5.) He that hath wrought us for the self-same thing, is God. And his grace is so far from superseding our care and endeavour, that it most strongly engages and encourages them. Work out your salvation, for it is God that worketh in you.

10. And the man that committeth adultery with another man's wife, even he that committeth adultery with his neighbour's wife, the adulterer and the adulteress shall surely be put to death. 11. And the man that lieth with his father's wife hath uncovered his father's nakedness: both of them shall surely be put to death; their blood shall be upon them. 12. And if a man lie with his daughter-in-law, both of them shall surely be put to death: they have wrought confusion; their blood shall be upon them. 13. If a man also lie with mankind, as he lieth with a woman, both of them have committed an abomination: they shall surely be put to death; their blood shall be upon them. 14. And if a man take a wife and her mother, it is wickedness: they shall be burnt with fire, both he and they, that there be no wickedness among you. 15. And if a man lie with a beast, he shall surely be put to death: and ye shall slay the beast. 16. And if a woman approach unto any beast, and lie down thereto, thou shalt kill the woman, and the beast: they shall surely be put to death; their blood shall be upon them. 17. And if a man shall take his sister, his father's daughter, or his mother's daughter, and see her nakedness, and she see his nakedness; it is a wicked thing; and they shall be cut off in the sight of their people: he hath uncovered his sister's nakedness; he shall bear his iniquity. 18. And if a man shall lie with a woman having her sickness, and shall uncover her nakedness; he hath discovered her fountain, and she hath uncovered the fountain of her blood: and both of them shall be cut off from among their people. 19. And thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy mother's sister, nor of thy father's sister; for he uncovereth his near kin: they shall bear their iniquity. 20. And if a man shall lie with his uncle's wife, he hath uncovered his uncle's nakedness: they shall bear their sin; they shall die childless. 21. And if a man shall take his brother's wife, it is an unclean thing: he hath uncovered his brother's nakedness; they shall be childless.

Sins against the seventh commandment are here ordered to be severely punished. These are sins, which, of all others, fools are most apt to make a mock at; but God would teach those the heinousness of the guilt by the extremity of the punishment, that would not otherwise be taught it.

I. Lying with another man's wife was made a capital crime; the adulterer and the adulteress that had joined in the sin must fall alike under the sentence, they shall both be put to death, v. 10. Long before this, even in Job's time, this was reputed a heinous crime, and an iniquity to be punished by the judges, Job, 31. 11. It is a presumptuous contempt of an ordinance of God, and a violation of his covenant, Prov. 2. 17. It is an irreparable wrong to the injured husband, and debauches the mind and conscience of both the offenders as much as any thing. It is a sin which headstrong and unbridled lusts hurry men violently to, and therefore it needs such a powerful restraint as this: it is a sin which defiles a land, and brings down God's judgments upon it, which disquiets families, and tends to the ruin of all virtue and religion, and therefore is fit to be animadverted upon by the conservators of the public peace: but see John, 8. 1. . 11.

II. Incestuous connexions, whether by marriage or not.

1. Some of them were to be punished with death, as a man's lying with his father's wife, v. 11. Reuben would have been put to death for his crime, (Gen. 35. 22.) if this law had been then made. It was the sin of the incestuous Corinthian, for which he was to be delivered unto Satan, 1 Cor. 5. 1, 5. A man's debauching his daughter-in-law, or his mother-in-law, or his sister, was likewise to be punished with death, v. 12, 14, 17.

2. Others of them God would punish with the curse of barrenness, as a man's defiling his aunt, or his brother's wife, (v. 19. . 21.) they shall die childless. Those that keep not within the divine rules of marriage, forfeit the blessings of marriage; They shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase, Hos. 4. 10. Nay, it is said, They shall bear their iniquity, that is, though they be not immediately cut off by the hand either of God or man for this sin, yet the guilt of it shall lie upon them, to be reckoned for another day, and not to be purged with sacrifice or offering.

III. The unnatural lusts of sodomy and bestiality (sins not to be mentioned without horror) were to be punished with death, as they are at this day by our law, r. 13, 15, 16. Even the beast that was thus abused was to be killed with the sinner, who was thereby openly put to the greater shame: and the villany was thus represented as in the highest degree execrable and abominable, at occasions of the remembrance or mention of it being to be taken away. Even the unseasonable use of the marriage-bed, if presumptuous, and in contempt of the law, would expose the offenders to the just judgment of God, they shall be cut off, v. 18. For this is the will of God, that every man should possess his vessel

(and the wife is called the weaker vessel) in sanctification and honour, as becomes saints.

22. Ye shall therefore keep all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them: that the land whither I bring you to dwell therein, spue you not out. 23. And ye shall not walk in the manners of the nation, which I cast out before you: for they committed all these things, and therefore I abhorred them. 24. But I have said unto you, Ye shall inherit their land, and I will give it unto you to possess it, a land that floweth with milk and honey; I am the LORD your God, which have separated you from other people. 25. Ye shall therefore put difference between clean beasts and unclean, and between unclean fowls and clean: and ye shall not make your souls abominable by beast or by fowl, or by any manner of living thing that creepeth on the ground, which I have separated from you as unclean. 26. And ye shall be holy unto me: for I the LORD am holy, and have severed you from other people, that ye should be mine. 27. A man also or woman that hath a familiar spirit, or that is a wizard, shall surely be put to death: they shall stone them with stones: their blood shall be upon them.

The last verse is a particular law, which comes in after the general conclusion, as if omitted in its proper place; it is for the putting of those to death that dealt with familiar spirits, v. 27. It would be a great affront to God, and to his lively oracles, a scandal to the country, and a temptation to ignorant, bad people to consult them, if such were known and suffered to live among them. They that are in league with the Devil, have in effect made a covenant with death, and an agreement with hell, and so shall their doom be.

The rest of these verses repeat and inculcate what had been said before, for to that unthinking, forgetful people it was requisite that there should be line upon line, and that general rules, with their reasons, should be frequently insisted on, for the enforcement of particular laws, and making them more effectual. Three things we are here reminded of:

1. Their dignity. (1.) They had the Lord for their God, v. 24. They were his, his care, his choice, his treasure, his jewels, his kingdom of priests; (v. 26.) that ye should be mine. Happy the people, and truly great, that is in such a case. (2.) Their God was a holy God, (v. 26.) infinitely advanced above all others. His holiness is his glory, and it was their honour to be related to him, while their neighbours were the infamous worshippers of impure and filthy spirits. (3.) The great God had separated them from other people, (v. 24.) and again, v. 26. Other nations were the common, they were the enclosure, beautified and enriched with peculiar privileges, and designed for peculiar honours; let them therefore value themselves accordingly, preserve their honour, and not lay it in the dust, by walking in the way of the heathen.

2. Their duty; this is inferred from their dignity. God had done more for them than for others, and therefore expected more from them than from others. And what is it that the Lord their God requires, in consideration of the great things done and designed; (1.) Ye shall keep all my statutes; (v. 22.) and there was all the reason in the world that they should, for the statutes were their honour, and obedience to them would be their lasting comfort. (2.) Ye shall not walk in the manners of the nation, v. 23. Being separated from them, they must not associate with them, nor learn their ways. The manners of the nation were bad enough in them, but would be much worse in God's people. (3.) Ye shall put difference between clean and unclean, v. 25. This is holiness, to discern between things that differ, not to live at large, as if we might say and do any thing, but to speak and act with caution. (4.) Ye shall not make your souls abominable, v. 25. Our constant care must be to preserve the honour, by preserving the purity, of our own souls, and never to do any thing to make them abominable to God and to our own consciences.

3. Their danger. (1.) They were going into an infected place, (v. 24.) Ye shall inherit their land. A land flowing indeed with milk and honey, which they would have the comfort of, if they kept their integrity; but withal, it was a land full of idols, idolatries, and superstitious usages, which they would be apt to fall in love with, having brought from Egypt with them a strange disposition to take that infection. (2.) If they took the infection, it would be of pernicious consequence to them. The Canaanites were to be expelled for these very sins; they committed all these things, and therefore I abhorred them, v. 23. See what an evil thing sin is, it provokes God to abhor his own creatures, whereas otherwise he delights in the work of his hands. And if the Israelites trod in the steps of their impiety, they must expect that the land would spue them out too, (v. 22.) as he had told them before, ch. 18. 28. If God spared not the natural branches, but broke them off, neither would he spare these who were grafted in, if they degenerated. Thus the rejection of the Jews stands for a warning to all christian churches, to take heed lest the kingdom of God be taken from them. Those that sin like others, must expect to smart like them; and their profession of relation to God will be no security to them.

CHAP. XXI.

This chapter might borrow its title from Mal. 2. 1. And now, O ye priests, this commandment is for you. It is a law obliging priests with the utmost care and jealousy to preserve the dignity of their priesthood. I. The inferior priests are here charged both concerning their mourning, and concerning their marriages, and their children, v. 1—9. II. The High-priest is restrained more than any of them, v. 10—15. III. Neither the one nor the other must have any blemish, v. 16—24.

1. AND the LORD said unto Moses, Speak unto the priests the sons of Aaron, and say unto them, There shall none be defiled for the dead among his people. 2. But for his kin, that is near unto him, that is, for his mother, and for his father, and for his son, and for his daughter, and for his brother, 3. And for his sister a virgin, that is nigh unto him, which hath had no husband; for her may he be defiled. 4. But he shall not defile himself, being a chief man among the people, to profane himself. 5. They shall not make baldness upon their head, neither shall they shave off the corner of their beard, nor make any cuttings in their flesh. 6. They shall be holy unto their God, and not profane the name of their God: for the offerings of the LORD made by fire, and the bread of their God, they do offer: therefore they shall be holy. 7. They shall not take a wife that is a whore, or profane; neither shall they take a woman put away from her husband; for he is holy unto his God. 8. Thou shalt sanctify him therefore, for he offereth the bread of thy God; he shall be holy, unto thee; for I the LORD which sanctify you, am holy. 9. And the daughter of any priest, if she profane herself by playing the whore, she shall be burnt with fire.

It was before appointed that the priests should teach the people the statutes God had given concerning the difference between clean and unclean, ch. 10. 10, 11. Now, here it is provided that they should observe themselves what they were to teach the people. Note, They whose office it is to instruct, must do it by example as well as precept, 1 Tim. 4. 12. The priests were to draw nearer to God than any of the people, and to be more intimately conversant with sacred things, and therefore it was required of them that they should keep at a greater distance than others from every thing that was defiling, and might diminish the honour of their priesthood.

I. They must take care not to disparage themselves in their mourning for the dead. All that mourned for the dead were supposed to come near the body, if not to touch it; and, the Jews say, "It made a man ceremonially unclean to come within six feet of a dead corpse;" nay, it is declared, (Numb. 19. 14.) that all who come into the tent where the dead body lies shall be unclean seven days. Therefore all the mourners that attended the funeral could not but defile themselves, so as not to be fit to come into the sanctuary for seven days: for this reason, it is ordered,

1. That the priests should never put themselves under this incapacity of coming into the sanctuary, unless it were for one of their nearest relations, v. 1. . 3. He was permitted to do it for a parent or a child, for a brother or an unmarried sister, and therefore, no doubt, (though this is not mentioned,) for the wife of his bosom; for Ezekiel, a priest, would have mourned for his wife, if he had not been particularly prohibited, Ezek. 24. 17. By this allowance, God put an honour upon natural affection, and favoured it so far as to dispense with the attendance of his servants for seven days, while they indulged themselves in their sorrow for the death of their dear relations; but, beyond this period, weeping must not hinder sowing, nor their affection to their relations take them off from the service of the sanctuary. Nor was it at all allowed for the death of any other, no, not of a chief man among the people, as some read it, v. 4. They must not defile themselves, no, not for the high priest himself, unless thus akin to them. Though there is a friend that is nearer than a brother, yet the priests must not pay this respect to the best friend they had, except he were a relation, lest, if it were allowed for one, others should expect it, and so they should be frequently taken off from their work: and it is hereby intimated that there is a particular affection to be reserved for those that are thus near akin to us; and when any such are removed by death, we ought to be affected with it, and lay it to heart, as the near approach of death to ourselves, and an alarm to us to prepare to follow.

2. That they must not be extravagant in the expressions of their mourning, no, not for their dearest relations, v. 5. Their mourning must not be either, (1.) Superstitious, according to the manner of the heathen, who cut off the hair, and let out their blood, in honour of the imaginary deities which presided (as they thought) in the congregation of the dead, that they might engage them to be propitious to their departed friends. Even the superstitious rites used of old at funerals, are an indication of the ancient belief of the immortality of the soul, and its existence in a separate state: and though the rites themselves were forbidden by the divine law, because they were performed to false gods, yet the decent respect which nature teaches, and the law allows, to be paid to the remains of our deceased friends, shews that we are not to look upon them as lost. Nor, (2.) Must it be passionate or immoderate. Note, God's ministers must be examples to others of patience under affliction, particularly that which touches in a very tender part, the death of their near relations. They are supposed to know more than others of the reasons why we must not sorrow, as those that have no hope, (1 Thess. 4. 13.) and therefore they ought to be eminently calm and composed, that they may be able to comfort others with the same comforts wherewith they are themselves comforted of God. The people were forbidden to mourn for the dead with superstitious rites; (ch. 19. 27, 28.) and what was unlawful to them was much more unlawful to the priest. The reason given for their peculiar care not to defile themselves, we have, (v. 6.) because they offered the bread of their God, even the offerings of the Lord made by fire, which were the provisions of God's house and table. They are highly honoured, and therefore must not stain their honour by making themselves slaves to their passions; they are continually employed in sacred service, and therefore must not be either diverted from, or dis fitted for, the services they were called to. If they pollute themselves, they profane the name of their God on whom they attend: if the servants are rude, and of ill behaviour, it is a reflection upon the master, as if he kept a loose and disorderly house. Note, All that either offer or eat the bread of our God must be holy in all manner of conversation, or else they profane that name which they pretend to sanctify.

II. They must take care not to degrade themselves in their marriage, v. 7. A priest must not marry a woman of ill fame, that either had been guilty, or was suspected to have been guilty, of uncleanness. He must not only not marry a harlot, though never so great a penitent for her former whoredoms, but he must not marry one that was profane, that is, of a light carriage or indecent behaviour. Nay, he must not marry one that was divorced, because there was reason to think it was for some fault she was divorced. The priests were forbidden to undervalue themselves by such marriages as these, which were allowed to others, 1. Lest it should bring a present reproach upon their ministry, harden the profane in their profaneness, and grieve the hearts of a serious people: the New Testament gives laws to ministers' wives, (1 Tim. 3. 11.) that they be grave and sober, that the ministry be not blamed. 2. Lest it should entail a reproach upon their families; for the work and honour of the priesthood were to descend as an inheritance to their children after them. Those do not consult the good of their posterity as they ought who do not take care to marry those that are of good report and character. He that would seek a godly seed, (as the expression is, Mal. 2. 15.) must first seek a godly wife, and take heed of a corruption of blood.

It is added here, (v. 8.) Thou shalt sanctify him, and he shall be holy unto thee. "Not only thou, O Moses, by taking care that these laws be observed, but thou, O Israel, by all endeavours possible to keep up the reputation of the priesthood, which the priests themselves must do nothing to expose or forfeit. He is holy to his God, (v. 7.) therefore he shall be holy unto thee." Note, We must honour those whom our God puts honour upon. Gospel-ministers, by this rule, are to be esteemed very highly in love, for their works' sake, (1 Thess. 5. 13.) and every Christian must look upon himself as concerned to be the guardian of their honour.

III. Their children must be afraid of doing any thing to disparage them: (v. 9.) If the daughter of any priest play the whore, her crime is great; she not only polluteth but profaneth herself: other women have not that honour to lose that she has, who, as one of a priest's family, has eaten of the holy things, and is supposed to have been better educated than others. Nay, she profaneth her father, he is reflected upon, and every body will be ready to ask, "Why did not he teach her better?" And the sinners in Zion will insult, and say, "Here is your priest's daughter:" her punishment therefore must be peculiar, She shall be burnt with fire, for a terror to all priests' daughters. Note, The children of ministers ought, of all others, to take heed of doing any thing that is scandalous, because in them it is doubly scandalous, and will be punished accordingly by him whose name is Jealous.

10. And he that is the high priest among his brethren, upon whose head the anointing oil was poured, and that is consecrated to put on the garments, shall not uncover his head, nor rend his clothes; 11. Neither shall he go in to any dead body, nor defile himself for his father or for his mother; 12. Neither shall he go out of the sanctuary, nor profane the sanctuary of his God; for the crown of the anointing oil of his God is upon him: I am the LORD. 13. And he shall take a wife in her virginity. 14. A widow, or a divorced woman, or profane, or an harlot, these shall he not take: but he shall take a virgin of his own people to wife. 15. Neither shall he profane his seed among his people: for I the LORD do sanctify him.

More was expected from a priest than from other people, but more from the high priest than from other priests, because upon his head the anointing oil was poured, and he was consecrated to put on the garments, (v. 10.) both which were typical of the anointing and adorning of the Lord Jesus, with all the gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, which he received without measure. It is called the crown of the anointing oil of his God, (v. 12.) for the anointing of the Spirit is, to all that have it, a crown of glory, and a diadem of beauty. The high priest being thus dignified,

I. He must not defile himself at all for the dead, no, not for his nearest relations, his father or his mother, much less his child or brother, v. 11. 1. He must not use the common expressions of sorrow on those occasions, such as uncovering his head, and rending his clothes, (v. 10.) so perfectly unconcerned must he shew himself in all the crosses and comforts of this life: even his natural affection must be swallowed up in compassion to the ignorant, and a feeling of their infirmities, and a tender concern for the household of God, which he was made the ruler of. Thus, being the holy one that was intrusted with the Thummim and the Urim, he must not know father or mother, Deut. 33. 8, 9. 2. He must not go in to any dead body, v. 11. If any of the inferior priests were under a ceremonial pollution, there were other priests that might supply their places; but if the high priest were defiled, there would be a greater miss of him. And the forbidding of him to go to any house of mourning, or attend any funeral, would be an indication to the people of the greatness of that dignity to which he was advanced. Our Lord Jesus, the great High Priest of our profession, touched the dead body of Jairus's daughter, the bier of the widow's son, and the grave of Lazarus, to shew that he came to alter the property of death, and to take off the terror of it, by breaking the power of it. Now that it cannot destroy, it does not defile. 3. He must not go out of the sanctuary, (v. 12.) that is, whenever he was attending or officiating in the sanctuary, where usually he tarried in his own apartment all day, he must not go out upon any occasion whatsoever, nor cut short his attendance on the living God, no, not to pay his last respects to a dying relation. It was a profanation of the sanctuary to leave it while his presence was requisite there, upon any such occasion, for thereby he preferred some other business before the service of God and the business of his profession, to which he ought to make every thing else give place. Thus our Lord Jesus would not leave off preaching, to speak with his mother and brethren, Math. 12. 48.

II. He might not marry a widow, (as other priests might,) much less one divorced, or a harlot, v. 13, 14. The reason of this was, to put a difference between him and other priests in this matter, and (as some suggest) that he might be a type of Christ, to whom the church was to be presented a chaste virgin, 2 Cor. 11. 2. see Ezek. 44. 22. Christ must have our first love, our pure love, our entire love; thus the virgins love thee, (Cant. 1. 3.) and such only are fit to follow the Lamb, Rev. 14. 4.

III. He might not profane his seed among his people, v. 15. Some understand it as forbidding him to marry any of an inferior rank, which would be a disparagement to his family. Jehoiada, indeed, married out of his own tribe, but then it was into the royal family, 2 Chron. 22. 11. This was not to teach him to be proud, but to teach him to be pure, and to do nothing unbecoming his office and that worthy name by which he was called. Or it may be a caution to him in disposing of his children: he must not profane his seed, by marrying them unsuitably. Ministers' children are profaned, if they be unequally yoked with unbelievers.

16. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 17. Speak unto Aaron, saying, Whosoever he be of thy seed in their generations, that hath any blemish, let him not approach to offer the bread of his God: 18. For whatsoever man he be that hath a blemish, he shall not approach: a blind man, or a lame, or he that hath a flat nose, or any thing superfluous. 19. Or a man that is broken-footed, or broken-handed, 20. Or crook-backed, or a dwarf, or that hath a blemish in his eye, or is scurvy, or scabbed, or hath his stones broken; 21. No man that hath a blemish, of the seed of Aaron the priest, shall come nigh to offer the offerings of the LORD made by fire; he hath a blemish; he shall not come nigh to offer the bread of his God. 22. He shall eat the bread of his God, both of the most holy, and of the holy. 23. Only he shall not go in unto the vail, nor come nigh unto the altar, because he hath a blemish; that he profane not my sanctuaries: for I the LORD do sanctify them. 24. And Moses told it unto Aaron, and to his sons, and unto all the children of Israel.

The priesthood being confined to one particular family, and entailed upon all the issue-male of that family throughout their generations, it was very likely that some or other in after-ages, that were born to the priesthood, would have natural blemishes and deformities: the honour of the priesthood would not secure them from any of those calamities which are common to men. Divers blemishes are here specified; some that were, ordinarily, for life, as blindness; others that might be for a time, as a scurf or scab, and, when they were gone, the disability ceased.

Now, the law concerning priests that had blemishes was,

1. That they might live upon the altar; (v. 22.) He shall eat of the sacrifices with the other priests, even the most holy things, such as the tithes and first-fruits, and the priests' share of the peace-offerings. The blemishes were such as they could not help, and, therefore, though they might not work, yet they must not starve. Note, None must be abused for their natural infirmities. Even the deformed child in the family must have its child's part.

2. Yet they must not serve at the altar, at either of the altars, nor be admitted to attend or assist the other priests in offering sacrifice or burning incense, v. 17, 21, 23. Great men choose to have such servants about them as are sightly, and it was fit that the great God should have such in his house, then when he was pleased to manifest his glory in external indications of it. But it was especially requisite that comely men should be chosen to minister about holy things, for the sake of the people, who were apt to judge according to outward appearance, and to think meanly of the service, how honourable soever it was made by the divine institution, if those that performed it looked despicably, or went about it awkwardly. This provision God made for the preserving of the reputation of his altar, that it might not at any time fall under contempt. It was for the credit of the sanctuary that none should appear there that were any way disfigured, either by nature or accident.

Now, under the gospel, (1.) Those that labour under any such blemishes as these have reason to thank God that they are not thereby excluded from offering spiritual sacrifices to God, nor, if otherwise qualified for it, from the office of the ministry. There is many a healthful beautiful soul lodged in a crazy deformed body. (2.) We ought to infer from hence how incapable those are to serve God acceptably whose minds are blemished and deformed by any reigning vice. These are unworthy to be called Christians, and unfit to be employed as ministers, that are spiritually blind, and lame, and crooked; whose sins render them scandalous and deformed, so as that the offerings of the Lord are abhorred for their sakes. The deformities of Hophni and Phinehas were worse than any of the blemishes here mentioned. Let such, therefore, as are openly vicious be put out of the priesthood, as polluted persons; and let all that are made to our God spiritual priests, be before him holy and without blemish, and comfort themselves with this, that though, in this imperfect state, they have spots that are the spots of God's children, yet they shall shortly appear before the throne of God without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing.

CHAP. XXII.

In this chapter, we have divers laws concerning the priests and sacrifices, all for the preserving of the honour of the sanctuary. I. That the priests should not eat of the holy things in their uncleanness, v. 1..9. II. That no stranger, who did not belong to some family of the priests, should eat of the holy things, (v. 10..13.) and if he did it unwittingly, he must make restitution, v. 14..16. III. That the sacrifices which were offered must be without blemish, v. 17..25. IV. That they must be more than eight days old, (v. 26..28.) and that the sacrifices of thanksgiving must be eaten the same day they were offered v. 29..33.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto Aaron and to his sons, that they separate themselves from the holy things of the children of Israel, and that they profane not my holy name in those things which they hallow unto me: I am the LORD. 3. Say unto them, Whosoever he be of all your seed among your generations, that goeth unto the holy things, which the children of Israel hallow unto the LORD, having his uncleanness upon him, that soul shall be cut off from my presence: I am the LORD. 4. What man soever of the seed of Aaron is a leper, or hath a running issue, he shall not eat of the holy things, until he be clean. And whoso toucheth any thing that is unclean by the dead, or a man whose seed goeth from him; 5. Or whosoever toucheth any creeping thing, whereby he may be made unclean, or a man of whom he may take uncleanness, whatsoever uncleanness he hath; 6. The soul which hath touched any such shall be unclean until even, and shall not eat of the holy things, unless he wash his flesh with water. 7. And when the sun is down, he shall be clean, and shall afterward eat of the holy things; because it is his food. 8. That which dieth of itself, or is torn with beasts, he shall not eat to defile himself therewith: I am the LORD. 9. They shall therefore keep mine ordinance, lest they bear sin for it, and die therefore, if they profane it: I the LORD do sanctify them.

Those that had a natural blemish, though they were forbidden to do the priests' work, yet they were allowed to eat of the holy things; and the Jewish writers say, that, "to keep them from idleness, they were employed in the wood-room, to pick out that which was worm-eaten, that it might not be used in the fire upon the altar; they might also be employed in the judgment of leprosy;" but those that were under any ceremonial uncleanness, which possibly they contracted by their own fault, might not so much as eat of the holy things while they continued in their pollutions.

1. Some pollutions were permanent, as a leprosy or a running issue, v. 4. These separated the people from the sanctuary, and God would shew that they were so far from being less objectionable, that really they were more so, in a priest.

2. Others were more transient, as the touching of a dead body, or any thing else that was unclean, from which, after a certain time, a man was cleansed by bathing his flesh in water, v. 6. But whoever was thus defiled might not eat of the holy things, under pain of God's highest displeasure, who said it, and ratified the saying, That soul shall be cut off from my presence, v. 3. Our being in the presence of God, and attending upon him, will be so far from securing us, that it will but the more expose us to God's wrath, if we dare to draw nigh to him in our uncleanness. The destruction shall come from the presence of the Lord, (2 Thess. 1. 9.) as the fire by which Nadab and Abihu died came from before the Lord. Thus they who profane the holy word of God will be cut off by that word which they make so light of; it shall condemn them. They are again warned of their danger, if they eat the holy thing in their uncleanness, (v. 9.) lest they bear sin, and die therefore. Note, (1.) Those contract great guilt who profane sacred things, by touching them with unhallowed hands. Eating the holy things signified an interest in the atonement; but if they ate of them in their uncleanness, they were so far from lessening their guilt, that they increased it; they shall bear sin. (2.) Sin is a burthen which, if infinite mercy prevent not, will certainly sink those that bear it; they shall die therefore. Even priests may be ruined by their pollutions and presumptions.

Now, [1.] This obliged the priests carefully to preserve their purity, and to dread every thing that would defile them. The holy things were their livelihood; if they might not eat of them, how must they subsist? The more we have to lose of comfort and honour by our defilement, the more careful we should be to preserve our purity. [2.] This possessed the people with a reverence for the holy things, when they saw the priests themselves separated from them, (as the expression is, v. 2.) so long as they were in their uncleanness. He is, doubtless, a God of infinite purity who kept his immediate attendants under so strict a discipline. [3.] This teaches us carefully to watch against all moral pollutions, because by them we are unfitted to receive the comfort of God's sanctuary. Though we labour not under habitual deformities, yet actual defilements deprive us of the pleasure of communion with God; and therefore he that is washed needeth to wash his feet; (John 13. 10.) to wash his hands, and so to compass the altar, Ps. 26. 6. Herein we have need to be jealous over ourselves, lest (as it is observably expressed here) we profane God's holy name in those things which we hallow unto him, v. 2. If we affront God in those very performances wherein we pretend to honour him, and provoke him instead of pleasing him, we shall make up but a bad account shortly; yet thus we do, if we profane God's name, by doing that in our uncleanness which pretends to be hallowed to him.

10. There shall no stranger eat of the holy thing: a sojourner of the priest, or an hired servant, shall not eat of the holy thing. 11. But if the priest buy any soul with his money, he shall eat of it, and he that is born in his house: they shall eat of his meat. 12. if the priest's daughter also be married unto a stranger, she may not eat of an offering of the holy things. 13. But if the priest's daughter be a widow, or divorced, and have no child, and is returned unto her father's house, as in her youth, she shall eat of her father's meat: but there shall no stranger eat thereof. 14. And if a man eat of the holy thing unwittingly, then he shall put the fifth part thereof unto it, and shall give it unto the priest, with the holy thing. 15. And they shall not profane the holy things of the children of Israel, which they offer unto the LORD: 16. Or suffer them to bear the iniquity of trespass, when they eat their holy things: for I the LORD do sanctify them.

The holy things were to be eaten by the priests and their families. Now,

1. Here is a law that no stranger should eat of them, that is, no person whatsoever but the priests only, and those that pertained to them, v. 10. The priests are charged with this care, not to profane the holy things, by permitting the strangers to eat of them, (v. 15.) or suffer them to bear the iniquity of trespass; (v. 16.) that is, suffer them to bring guilt upon themselves, by meddling with that which they have no right to do. Thus it is commonly understood. Note, We must not only be careful that we do not bear iniquity ourselves, but we must do what we can to prevent others bearing it. We must not only not suffer sin to lie upon our brother, but, if we can help it, we must not suffer it to come upon him. But perhaps there is another meaning of those words: the priests' eating of the sin-offerings is said to signify their bearing the iniquity of the congregation, to make an atonement for them, ch. 10. 17. Let not a stranger, therefore, eat of that holy thing particularly, and so pretend to bear the iniquity of trespass; for it is daring presumption for any to do that but such as are appointed to do it. Those that set up other mediators beside Christ our Priest, to bear the iniquity of trespass, sacrilegiously rob Christ of his honour, and invade his rights. When we warn people not to trust to their own righteousness, nor dare to appear before God in it, but to rely on Christ's righteousness only for peace and pardon, it is because we dare not suffer them to bear the iniquity of trespass, for we know it is too heavy for them.

2. Here is an explanation of the law, shewing who were to be looked upon as belonging to the priest's family, and who not. (1.) Sojourners and hired servants abode not in the house for ever; they were in the family, but not of it; and therefore they might not eat of the holy things; (v. 10.) but the servant that was born in the house, or bought with money, being an heir-loom to the family, though a servant, yet might eat of the holy things, v. 11. Note, Those only are entitled to the comforts of God's house who make it their rest for ever, and resolve to dwell in it all the days of their life. As for those who for a time only believe, to serve a present turn, they are looked upon but as sojourners and mercenaries, and have no part nor lot in the matter. (2.) As to the children of the family, concerning the sons there could be no dispute, they were themselves priests, but concerning the daughters there was a distinction. While they continued in their father's house, they might eat of the holy things; but if they married such as were not priests, they lost their right, (v. 12.) for now they were cut off from the family of the priests. Yet, if a priest's daughter became a widow, and had no children in whom she might preserve a distinct family, and returned to her father's house again, being neither wife nor mother, she shall again be looked upon as a daughter, and shall eat of the holy things. If those whom Providence has made sorrowful widows, and who are dislodged from the rest they had in the house of a husband, yet find it again in a father's house, they have reason to be thankful to the widows' God, who does not leave them comfortless. (3.) Here is a demand of restitution to be made by him that had no right to the holy things, and yet should eat of them unwittingly, v. 14. If he did it presumptuously, and in contempt of the divine institution, he was liable to be cut off by the hand of God, and to be beaten by the magistrate; but if he did it through weakness and inconsideration, he was to restore the value, adding a fifth part to it; beside which, he was to bring an offering to atone for the trespass: see ch. 5. 15, 16.

Now, [1.] This law might be dispensed with in a case of necessity, as it was when David and his men ate of the shew-bread; 1 Sam. 21. 6. And our Saviour justifies them, and gives a reason for it, which furnishes us with a lasting rule in all such cases, that God will have mercy, and not sacrifice, Matth. 12. 3, 4, 7. Rituals must give way to morals.

[2.] It is an instruction to gospel-ministers, who are stewards of the mysteries of God, not to admit all, without distinction, to eat of the holy things, but to take out the precious from the vile. Those that are scandalously ignorant or profane are strangers and aliens to the family of the Lord's priests; and it is not meet to take the children's bread and to cast it to such. Holy things are for holy persons, for those who are holy, at least, in profession, Matth. 7. 6.

17. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 18. Speak unto Aaron, and to his sons, and unto all the children of Israel, and say unto them, Whatsoever he be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers in Israel, that will offer his oblation for all his vows, and for all his free-will offerings, which they will offer unto the LORD for a burnt-offering; 19. Ye shall offer at your own will a male without blemish of the beeves, of the sheep, or of the goats. 20. But whatsoever hath a blemish, that shall ye not offer: for it shall not be acceptable for you. 21. And whosoever offereth a sacrifice of peace-offerings unto the LORD to accomplish his vow, or a free-will offering in beeves or sheep, it shall be perfect to be accepted; there shall be no blemish therein. 22. Blind, or broken, or maimed, or having a wen, or scurvy, or scabbed, ye shall not offer these unto the LORD, nor make an offering by fire of them upon the altar unto the LORD. 23. Either a bullock or a lamb that hath any thing superfluous or lacking in his parts, that mayest thou offer for a free-will offering; but for a vow it shall not be accepted. 24. Ye shall not offer unto the LORD that which is bruised, or crushed, or broken, or cut; neither shall ye make any offering thereof in your land. 25. Neither from a stranger's hand shall ye offer the bread of your God of any of these; because their corruption is in them, and blemishes be in them: they shall not be accepted for you. 26. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 27. When a bullock, or a sheep, or a goat, is brought forth, then it shall be seven days under the dam; and from the eighth day and thenceforth, it shall be accepted for an offering made by fire unto the LORD. 28. And whether it be cow or ewe, ye shall not kill it and her young both in one day. 29. And when ye will offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving unto the LORD, offer it at your own will. 30. On the same day it shall be eaten up, ye shall leave none of it until the morrow: I am the LORD. 31. Therefore shall ye keep my commandments, and do them: I am the LORD. 32. Neither shall ye profane my holy name; but I will be hallowed among the children of Israel: I am the LORD which hallow you, 33. That brought you out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: I am the LORD.

Here are four laws concerning sacrifices,

I. That whatever was offered in sacrifice to God should be without blemish, otherwise it should not be accepted. This had often been mentioned in the particular institutions of the several sorts of offering. Now here, 1. They are told what was to be accounted a blemish which rendered a beast unfit for sacrifice; if it was blind, or lame, had a wen, or the mange; (v. 22.) if it was bruised, or crushed, or broken, or cut; (v. 24.) that is, as the Jewish writers understand it, if it was, any of these ways, castrated; if bulls and rams were made into oxen and wethers, they might not be offered. 2. A difference is made between what was brought as a free-will offering, and what was brought as a vow, v. 23. And though none that had any of the forementioned blemishes might be brought for either, yet if a beast had any thing superfluous or lacking, that is, as the Jews understand it, if there was a disproportion or inequality between those parts that are pairs, when one eye, or ear, or leg, is bigger than it should be, or less than it should be; if there was no other blemish than this, it might be accepted for a free-will offering, which a man had not before laid himself, nor had the divine law laid him, under any particular obligation to; but for a vow it might not be accepted. Thus God would teach us to make conscience of performing our promises to him very exactly, and not afterward to abate in quantity or value of what we had solemnly engaged to devote to him. What was, before the vow, in our own power, as in the case of a free-will offering, afterward is not, Acts, 5. 4. 3. It is again and again declared, that no sacrifice should be accepted, if it was thus blemished, v. 20, 21. According to this law great care was taken to search all the beasts that were brought to be sacrificed, that there might, to a certainty, be no blemish in them. A blemished sacrifice might not be accepted even from the hand of a stranger, though to such all possible encouragement should be given to do honour to the God of Israel, v. 25. By this it appears that strangers were expected to come to the house of God from a far country, (1 Kings, 8. 41, 42.) and that they should be welcome, and their offerings accepted, as those of Darius, Ezra, 6. 9, 10. Isa. 56. 6, 7. The heathen priests were many of them not so strict in this matter, but would receive sacrifices for their gods that were never so scandalous; but let strangers know, that the God of Israel would not be so served.

Now, (1.) This law was then necessary for the preserving of the honour of the sanctuary, and of the God that was there worshipped. It was fit that every thing that was employed for his honour should be the best of the kind; for as he is the greatest and brightest, so he is the best of Beings; and he that is the best, must have the best. See how greatly and justly displeasing the breach of this law was to the holy God, Mal. 1. 8, 13, 14. (2.) This law made all the legal sacrifices the fitter to be types of Christ, the great Sacrifice, from which all those derived their virtue. In allusion to this law, he is said to be a Lamb without blemish, and without spot, 1 Pet. 1. 19. As such a Priest, so such a Sacrifice, became us, who was harmless and undefiled. When Pilate declared, I find no fault in this man, he did thereby in effect pronounce the sacrifice without blemish. The Jews say, it was the work of the sagan, or suffragan high priest, to view the sacrifices, and see whether they were without blemish or no; when Christ suffered, Annas was in that office; but little did they who brought Christ to Annas first, by whom he was sent bound to Caiaphas, as a Sacrifice fit to be offered, (John, 18. 13, 24.) think that they were answering the type of this law. (3.) It is an instruction to us to offer to God the best we have in our spiritual sacrifices. If our devotions are ignorant, and cold, and trifling, and full of distractions, we offer the blind, and the lame, and the sick, for sacrifice; but cursed be the deceiver that does so, for, while he thinks to put a cheat upon God, he puts a damning cheat upon his own soul.

II. That no beast should be offered in sacrifice before it was eight days old, v. 26, 27. It was provided before, that the firstlings of their cattle, which were to be dedicated to God, should not be brought him till after the eighth day, Exod. 22. 30. Here it is provided, that no creature should be offered in sacrifice till it was eight days old complete. Sooner than that, it was not fit to be used at men's tables, and therefore not at God's altar. The Jews say, "It was because the sabbath sanctifies all things, and nothing should be offered to God till at least one sabbath had passed over it." It was in conformity to the law of circumcision, which children were to receive on the eighth day. Christ was sacrificed for us, not in his infancy, though then Herod sought to slay him, but in the prime of his time.

III. That the dam and her young should not both be killed in one day, whether in sacrifice, or for common use, v. 28. There is such a law as this concerning birds, Deut. 22. 6. This was forbidden, not as evil in itself, but because it looked barbarous and cruel to the brute creatures; like the tyranny of the king of Babylon, that slew Zedekiah's sons before his eyes, and then put out his eyes. It looked ill-natured toward the species to kill two generations at once, as if one designed the ruin of the kind.

IV. That the flesh of their thank-offerings should be eaten on the same day that they were sacrificed, v. 29, 30. This is a repetition of what we had before, ch. 7. 15.—19. 6, 7. The chapter concludes with such a general charge as we have often met with, to keep God's commandments, and not to profane his holy name, v. 31. 32. Those that profess God's name, if they do not make conscience of keeping his commandments, do but profane his name. The general reasons are added: God's authority over them, I am the Lord: His interest in them, I am your God: The title he had to them by redemption, "I brought you out of the land of Egypt, on purpose that I might be your God:" The desigus of his grace concerning them, I am the Lord that hallow you: And the resolutions of his justice, if he had not honour from them, to get him honour upon them, I will be hallowed among the children of Israel. God will be a Loser in his glory by no man at last; but sooner or later will recover his right, either in the repentance of sinners, or in their ruin.

CHAP. XXIII.

Hitherto the levitical law has been chiefly conversant about holy persons, holy things, and holy places; in this chapter we have the institution of holy times; many of which had been mentioned occasionally before, but here they are all put together; only the new moons are not mentioned: all the rest of the feasts of the Lord are; 1. The weekly feast of the sabbath, v. 3. II. The yearly feasts. 1. The passover, and the feast of unleavened bread, (v. 4. .8.) to which was annexed the offering of the sheaf of first-fruits, v. 9. .14. 2. Pentecost, v. 15. .22. 3. The solemnities of the seventh month. The feast of trumpets on the first day; (v. 23. .25.) the day of atonement on the tenth day; (v. 26. .32.) and the feast of tabernacles on the fifteenth, v. 33. .44.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, Concerning the feasts of the LORD, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, even these are my feasts. 3. Six days shall work be done: but the seventh day is the sabbath of rest, an holy convocation; ye shall do no work therein: it is the sabbath of the LORD in all your dwellings.

Here is,

1. A general account of the holy times which God appointed, (v. 2.) and it is only his appointment that can make time holy: for he is the Lord of time; and as soon as ever he had set its wheels a-going, it was he that sanctified and blessed one day above the rest, Gen. 2. 3. Man may by his appointment make a good day, (Esth. 9. 19.) but it is God's prerogative to make a holy day; nor is any thing sanctified but by the stamp of his institution. As all inherent holiness comes from his special grace, so all adherent holiness from his special appointment. Now, concerning the holy times here ordained, observe, (1.) They are called feasts. The day of atonement, which was one of them, was a fast; yet, because most of them were appointed for joy and rejoicing, they are in the general called feasts. Some read it, These are my assemblies, but that is co-incident with convocations; I would rather read it, These are my solemnities; so the word here used is translated, (Isa. 33. 20.) where Zion is called the city of our solemnities: and, reading it so here, the day of atonement was as great a solemnity as any of them. (2.) They are the feasts of the Lord; (my feasts;) observed to the honour of his name, and in obedience to his command. (3.) They were proclaimed; for they were not to be observed by the priests only that attended the sanctuary, but by all the people. And this proclamation was the joyful sound, concerning which we read, Blessed are the people that know it, Ps. 89. 15. (4.) They were to be sanctified and solemnized with holy convocations, that the services of these feasts might appear the more honourable and august, and the people more unanimous in the performance of them. It was for the honour of God, and his institutions, which sought not corners, and the purity of which would be best preserved by the public administration of them, it was also for the edification of the people in love, that the feasts were to be observed as holy convocations.

2. A repetition of the law of the sabbath in the first place. Though the annual feasts were made more remarkable by their general attendance at the sanctuary, yet these must not eclipse the brightness of the sabbath, v. 3. They are here told, (1.) That on that day they must withdraw themselves from all the affairs and business of the world. It is a sabbath of rest, typifying our spiritual rest from sin, and in God; Ye shall do no work therein. On other holy days they were forbidden to do any servile work, (v. 7.) but on the sabbath, and the day of atonement, (which is also called a sabbath,) they were to do no work at all, no, not the dressing of meat. (2.) On that day they must employ themselves in the service of God. [1.] It is a holy convocation; that is, "If it lie within your reach, you shall sanctify it in a religious assembly: let as many as can come to the door of the tabernacle, and let others meet elsewhere for prayer, and praise, and the reading of the law;" as in the schools of the prophets, while prophecy continued, and afterward in the synagogues. Christ appointed the New-Testament sabbath to be a holy convocation, by meeting his disciples once and again, (and perhaps oftener,) on the first day of the week. [2.] "Whether you have opportunity of sanctifying it in a holy convocation or not, yet let it be the sabbath of the Lord in all your dwellings. Put a difference between that day and other days in your families. It is the sabbath of the Lord, the day on which he rested from the work of creation, and on which he has appointed us to rest: let it be observed in all your dwellings, even now that you dwell in tents." Note, God's sabbaths are to be religiously observed in every private house, by every family apart, as well as by many families together, in holy convocations. The sabbath of the Lord in our dwellings will be their beauty, strength, and safety; it will sanctify, edify, and glorify them.

4. These are the feasts of the LORD, even holy convocations, which ye shall proclaim in their seasons. 5. In the fourteenth day of the first month at even is the LORD's passover. 6. And on the fifteenth day of the same month is the feast of unleavened bread unto the LORD: seven days ye must eat unleavened bread. 7. In the first day ye shall have an holy convocation: ye shall do no servile work therein. 8. But ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the LORD seven days:

in the seventh day is an holy convocation: ye shall do no servile work therein. 9. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 10. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come into the land which I give unto you, and shall reap the harvest thereof, then ye shall bring a sheaf of the first-fruits of your harvest unto the priest: 11. And he shall wave the sheaf before the LORD, to be accepted for you: on the morrow after the sabbath the priest shall wave it. 12. And ye shall offer that day when ye wave the sheaf an he-lamb without blemish, of the first year, for a burnt-offering unto the LORD. 13. And the meat-offering thereof shall be two tenth-deals of fine flour mingled with oil, an offering made by fire unto the LORD for a sweet savour: and the drink-offering thereof shall be of wine, the fourth part of an hin. 14. And ye shall eat neither bread, nor parched corn, nor green ears, until the self-same day that ye have brought an offering unto your God: It shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations in all your dwellings.

Here again the feasts are called the feasts of the Lord, because he appointed them. Jeroboam's feast, which he devised of his own heart, (1 Kings, 12. 33.) was an affront to God, and a reproach upon the people. These feasts were to be proclaimed in their seasons; (v. 4.) and the seasons God chose for them were in March, May, and September, (according to our present computation,) not in winter, because travelling would then be uncomfortable, when the days were short and the ways foul; not in the middle of summer, because then in those countries they were gathering in their harvest and vintage, and could be ill-spared from their country-business. Thus graciously does God consult our comfort in his appointments, obliging us thereby religiously to regard his glory in our observance of them, and not to complain of them as a burthen. The solemnities appointed them were, 1. Many, and returned frequently; which was intended to preserve in them a deep sense of God and religion, and to prevent their inclining to the superstitions of the heathen. God kept them fully employed in his service, that they might not have time to hearken to the temptations of the idolatrous neighbourhood they lived in. 2. They were most of them times of joy and rejoicing. The weekly sabbath is so, and all their yearly solemnities, except the day of atonement. God would thus teach them that wisdom's ways are pleasantness, and engage them to his service, by encouraging them to be cheerful in it, and to sing at their work. Seven days were days of strict rest and holy convocations: The first day and the seventh of the feast of unleavened bread; the day of Pentecost; the day of the feast of trumpets; the first day and the eighth of the feast of tabernacles; and the day of atonement. Here were six for holy joy, and one only for holy mourning. We are commanded to rejoice evermore, but not to be evermore weeping.

Here is,

(1.) A repetition of the law of the passover, which was to be observed on the fourteenth day of the first month, in remembrance of their deliverance out of Egypt, and the distinguishing preservation of their first-born; mercies never to be forgotten. This feast was to begin with the killing of the paschal lamb, v. 5. It was to continue seven days, during all which time they were to eat and bread, that was unleavened, (v. 6.) and the first and last day of the seven were to be days of holy rest, and holy convocations, v. 7, 8. They were not idle days, spent in sport and recreation, (as many that are called Christians spend their holy days,) but offerings were made by fire unto the Lord at his altar; and we have reason to think that the people were taught to employ their time in prayer, and praise, and godly meditation.

(2.) An order for the offering of a sheaf of the first-fruits, upon the second day of the feast of unleavened bread: the first is called the sabbath, because it was observed as a sabbath, (v. 11.) and on the morrow after, they had this solemnity. A sheaf or handful of new corn was brought to the priest, who was to heave it up, in token of his presenting it to the God of Heaven, and to wave it to and fro before the Lord, as the Lord of the whole earth, and this should be accepted for them as a thankful acknowledgment of God's mercy to them in clothing their fields with corn, and of their dependence upon God, and desire toward him, for the preserving of it to their use. For it was the expression both of prayer and praise, v. 11. A lamb for a burnt-offering was to be offered with it, v. 12. As the sacrifice of animals was generally attended with meat-offerings, so this sacrifice of corn was attended with a burnt-offering, that bread and flesh might be set together on God's table. They are forbidden to eat of their new corn, till this handful was offered to God; for it was fit, if God and Israel feast together, that he should be served first. And the offering of this sheaf of first-fruits in the name of the whole congregation, did, as it were, sanctify to them their whole harvest, and give them a comfortable use of all the rest; for then we may eat our bread with joy, when we have, in some measure, performed our duty to God, and God has accepted our works, for thus all our enjoyments become clean to us.

Now, [1.] This law was given now, though there was no occasion for putting it in execution till they came to Canaan: in the wilderness they sowed no corn; but God's feeding them there with bread from heaven obliged them hereafter not to grudge him his share of their bread out of the earth. We find that when they came into Canaan, the manna ceased upon the very day that the sheaf of first-fruits was offered; they had eaten of the old corn the day before, (Josh. 5. 11.) and then on this day they offered the first-fruits, by which they became entitled to the new corn too, (v. 12.) so that there was no more occasion for manna. [2.] This sheaf of first-fruits was typical of our Lord Jesus, who is risen from the dead as the First-fruits of them that slept, 1 Cor. 15. 20. That branch of the Lord (Isa. 4. 2.) was then presented to him, in the virtue of the sacrifice of himself the Lamb of God, and it was accepted for us. It is very observable, that our Lord Jesus rose from the dead on the very day that the first-fruits were offered, to shew that he was the Substance of this shadow. [3.] We are taught by this law to honour the Lord with our substance, and with the first-fruits of all our increase, Prov. 3. 9. They were not to eat of their new corn, till God's part was offered to him out of it, (v. 14.) for we must always begin with God; begin our lives with him, begin every day with him, begin every meal with him, begin every affair and business with him; seek first the kingdom of God.

15. And ye shall count unto you from the morrow after the sabbath, from the day that ye brought the sheaf of the wave-offering; seven sabbaths shall be complete: 16. Even unto the morrow after the seventh sabbath shall ye number fifty days, and ye shall offer a new meat-offering unto the LORD. 17. Ye shall bring out of your habitations two wave-loaves, of two-tenth deals: they shall be of fine flour; they shall be baked with leaven; they are the first fruits unto the LORD. 18. And ye shall offer with the bread seven lambs without blemish of the first year, and one young bullock, and two rams; they shall be for a burnt-offering unto the LORD, with their meat-offering, and their drink-offerings, even an offering made by fire of sweet savour unto the LORD. 19. Then ye shall sacrifice one kid of the goats for a sin-offering, and two lambs of the first year for a sacrifice of peace-offerings. 20. And the priest shall wave them with the bread of the first-fruits for a wave-offering before the LORD, with the two lambs: they shall be holy to the LORD for the priest. 21. And ye shall proclaim on the self-same day, that it may be an holy convocation unto you: ye shall do no servile work therein: It shall be a statute for ever in all your dwellings throughout your generations. 22. And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not make clean riddance of the corners of thy field when thou reapest, neither shalt thou gather any gleanings of thy harvest: thou shalt leave them unto the poor, and to the stranger: I am the LORD your God.

Here is the institution of the feast of pentecost, or weeks, as it is called, (Dent. 16. 9.) because it was observed fifty days, or seven weeks, after the passover. It is also called the feast of harvest, Exod. 23. 16. For as the presenting of the sheaf of first-fruits was an introduction to the harvest, and gave them liberty to put in the sickle, so they solemnized the finishing of their corn-harvest at this feast. Then they offered a handful of ears of barley, now they offered two loaves of wheaten bread, v. 17. This was leavened. At the passover they ate unleavened bread, because it was in remembrance of the bread they ate when they came out of Egypt, which was unleavened; but now at pentecost it was leavened, because it was an acknowledgment of God's goodness to them in their ordinary food, which was leavened. 2. With that sheaf of first-fruits they only offered one lamb for a burnt-offering, but with these loaves of first-fruits they offered seven lambs, two rams, and one bullock, all for a burnt-offering; so giving glory to God, as the Lord of their land, and the Lord of their harvest, by whose favour they lived, and to whose praise they ought to live. They offered likewise a kid for a sin-offering, so taking shame to themselves, as unworthy of the bread they ate, and imploring pardon for their sins, by which they had forfeited their harvest-mercies, and which they had been guilty of in the receiving of them. And lastly, two lambs for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, to beg a blessing upon the corn they had gathered in, which would be neither sure nor sweet to them without that blessing, Hag. 1. 9. These were the only peace-offerings that were offered on the behalf of the whole congregation, and they were reckoned most holy offerings, whereas other peace-offerings were but holy. All these offerings are here appointed, v. 18. 21. 3. That one day was to be kept with a holy convocation, v. 21. It was one of the days on which all Israel was to meet God and one another, at the place which the Lord should choose. Some suggest, that whereas seven days were to make up the feast of unleavened bread, there was only one day appointed for the feast of pentecost, because this was a busy time of the year with them, and God allowed them speedily to return to their work in the country. This annual feast was instituted in remembrance of the giving of the law upon mount Sinai, the fiftieth day after they came out of Egypt. That was the feast which, they were told in Egypt, must be observed to God in the wilderness, as a memorial of which ever after they kept this feast. But the period and perfection of this feast was the pouring out of the Spirit upon the apostles on the day of this feast, (Acts, 2. 1.) in which the law of faith was given, fifty days after Christ our Passover was sacrificed for us. And on that day (as Bishop Patrick well expresses it) the apostles, having themselves received the first-fruits of the Spirit, begat three thousand souls, through the word of truth, and presented them, a the first-fruits of the Christian church, to God and the Lamb.

To the institution of the feast of Pentecost is annexed a repetition of that law, which we had before, (ch. 19. 9.) by which they were required to leave the gleanings of their fields, and the corn that grew on the ends of the butts, for the poor, v. 22. Probably, it comes in here as a thing which the priests must take occasion to remind the people of, when they brought their first-fruits, intimating to them, That to obey, even in this small matter, was better than sacrifice; and that, unless they were obedient, their offerings should not be accepted. It also taught them that the joy of harvest should express itself in charity to the poor, who must have their due out of what we have, as well as God his. They that are truly sensible of the mercy they receive from God, will without grudging shew mercy to the poor.

23. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 24. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, In the seventh month, in the first day of the month, shall ye have a sabbath, a memorial of blowing of trumpets, an holy convocation. 25. Ye shall do no servile work therein: but ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the LORD. 26. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 27. Also on the tenth day of this seventh month there shall be a day of atonement: it shall be an holy convocation unto you; and ye shall afflict your souls, and offer an offering made by fire unto the LORD. 28. And ye shall do no work in that same day: for it is a day of atonement, to make an atonement for you before the LORD your God. 29. For whatsoever soul it be that shall not be afflicted in that same day, he shall be cut off from among his people. 30. And whatsoever soul it be that doeth any work in that same day, the same soul will I destroy from among his people. 31. Ye shall do no manner of work: It shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations in all your dwellings. 32. It shall be unto you a sabbath of rest, and ye shall afflict your souls: in the ninth day of the month at even, from even unto even, shall ye celebrate your sabbath.

Here is,

1. The institution of the feast of trumpets, on the first day of the seventh month, v. 24, 25. That which was now the seventh month had been reckoned the first month, and the year of jubilee was still to begin with this month, (ch. 25. 8.) so that this was their new-year's day. It was to be as their other yearly sabbaths, a day of holy rest, Ye shall do no servile work therein; and a day of holy work, Ye shall offer an offering to the Lord; concerning which particular directions were afterward given, Numb. 29. 1. That which is here made peculiar to this festival, is, that it was a memorial of blowing of trumpets. They blew the trumpet every new moon, (Ps. 81. 3.) but in the new moon of the seventh month it was to be done with more than ordinary solemnity; for they began to blow at sun-rise, and continued till sun-set. Now, (1.) This is here said to be a memorial, perhaps, of the sound of the trumpet upon mount Sinai when the law was given, which must never be forgotten. Some think that it was a memorial of the creation of the world, which is supposed to have been in autumn; for which reason this was, till now, the first month. The mighty word by which God made the world is called the voice of his thunder; (Ps. 104. 7.) fitly therefore was it commemorated by blowing of trumpets; or a memorial of shouting, as the Chaldee renders it; for when the foundations of the earth were fastened, all the sons of God shouted for joy, Job, 38. 6, 7. (2.) The Jewish writers suppose it to have a spiritual signification. Now, at the beginning of the year, they were called by this sound of trumpet to shake off their spiritual drowsiness; to search and try their ways, and to amend them; the day of atonement was the ninth day after this; and thus they were awakened to prepare for that day, by sincere and serious repentance, that it might be indeed to them a day of atonement. And they say, "The devout Jews exercised themselves more in good works between the feast of trumpets and the day of expiation than at any other time of the year." (3.) It was typical of the preaching of the gospel, by which joyful sound souls were called in to serve God, and keep a spiritual feast to him. The conversion of the nations to the faith of Christ is said to be by the blowing of a great trumpet, Isa. 27. 13.

2. A repetition of the law of the day of atonement, that is, so much of it as concerned the people. (1.) They must on this day rest from all manner of work; and not only from servile works, as on other annual festivals; it must be as strict a rest as that of the weekly sabbath, v. 28, 30, 31. The reason is, For it is a day of atonement. Note, The humbling of our souls for sin, and the making of our peace with God, is work that requires the whole man, and the closest application of mind imaginable, and all little enough. He that would do the work of a day of atonement in its day, as it should be done, had needs lay aside the thoughts of every thing else. On that day, God spake peace unto his people, and unto his saints; and therefore they must lay aside all their worldly business, that they might the more clearly and the more reverently hear that voice of joy and gladness. Fasting days should be days of rest. (2.) They must afflict their souls, and this upon pain of being cut off by the hand of God, v. 27, 29, 32. They must mortify the body, and deny the appetites of it, in token of their sorrow for the sins they had committed, and the mortifying of their in-dwelling corruptions. Every soul must be afflicted, because every soul was polluted, and guilty before God: while none have fulfilled the laws of innocency, none are exempt from the law of repentance. Beside that, every man must sigh and cry for the abominations of the land. (3.) This day must be observed from even to even; (v. 32.) ye shall afflict your souls, that is, "Ye shall begin your fast, and the expressions of your humiliation, in the ninth day of the month at even." They were to leave off all their worldly labour, and compose themselves to the work of the day approaching, some time before sun-set on the ninth day, and not to take any food, (except children and sick people,) till after sun-set on the tenth day. Note, The eves of solemn days ought to be employed in solemn preparation. When work for God and our souls is to be done, we should not straiten ourselves in time for the doing of it; for how can we spend our time better? Of this sabbath the rule here is to be understood, From even unto even shall ye celebrate your sabbath.

33. And the LORD, spake unto Moses, saying, 34. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, The fifteenth day of this seventh month shall be the feast of tabernacles for seven days unto the LORD. 35. On the first day shall be an holy convocation: ye shall do no servile work therein. 36. Seven days ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the LORD: on the eighth day shall be an holy convocation unto you; and ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the LORD: it is a solemn assembly; and ye shall do no servile work therein. 37. These are the feasts of the LORD, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, to offer an offering made by fire unto the LORD, a burnt-offering, and a meat-offering, a sacrifice, and drink-offerings, every thing upon his day: 38. Beside the sabbaths of the LORD, and beside your gifts, and beside all your vows, and beside all your free-will offerings, which ye give unto the LORD. 39. Also in the fifteenth day of the seventh month, when ye have gathered in the fruit of the land, ye shall keep a feast unto the LORD seven days: on the first day shall be a sabbath, and on the eighth day shall be a sabbath. 40. And ye shall take you on the first day the boughs of goodly trees, branches of palm-trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook; and ye shall rejoice before the LORD your God seven days. 41. And ye shall keep it a feast unto the LORD seven days in the year: It shall be a statute for ever in your generations: ye shall celebrate it in the seventh month. 42. Ye shall dwell in booths seven days; all that are Israelites born shall dwell in booths: 43. That your generations may know that I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths, when I brought them out of the land of Egypt: I am the LORD your God. 44. And Moses declared unto the children of Israel the feasts of the LORD.

We have here the institution of the feast of tabernacles, which was one of the three great feasts at which all the males were bound to attend, and celebrated with more expressions of joy than any of them.

I. It was to be observed on the fifteenth day of the seventh month, (v. 34.) but five days after the day of atonement. We may suppose, though they were not all bound to attend on the day of atonement, as on the three great festivals, yet that many of the devout Jews came up so many days before the feast of tabernacles, as to enjoy the opportunity of attending on the day of atonement. Now, 1. The afflicting of their souls on the day of atonement prepared them for the joy of the feast of tabernacles. The more we are grieved and humbled for sin, the better qualified we are for the comforts of the Holy Ghost. 2. The joy of this feast recompensed them for the sorrow of that fast; for they that sow in tears shall reap in joy.

II. It was to continue eight days, the first and last of which were to be observed as sabbaths, days of holy rest, and holy convocations, v. 35, 36, 39. The sacrifices to be offered on these eight days, we have a very large appointment of, Numb. 29, 12, &c.

III. During the first seven days of this feast, all the people were to leave their houses, and the women and children in them, and to dwell in booths made of the boughs of thick trees, particularly palm-trees, v. 40, 42. The Jews make the taking of the branches to be a distinct ceremony from the making of the booths. It is said, indeed, (Neh. 8. 15.) that they made their booths of the branches of trees, which they might do, and yet use that further expression of joy, the carrying of palm branches in their hands, which appears to have been a token of triumph upon other occasions, (John, 12. 13.) and is alluded to, Rev. 7. 9. The eighth day some make a distinct feast of itself, but it is called (John, 7. 37.) that great day of the feast; it was the day on which they returned from their booths, to settle again in their own houses.

IV. They were to rejoice before the Lord God during all the time of this feast, v. 40. The tradition of the Jews is, that they were to express their joy by dancing, and singing hymns of praise to God, with musical instruments: and not the common people only, but the wise men of Israel, and their elders, were to do it in the court of the sanctuary; for (say they) the joy with which a man rejoices in doing a commandment, is really a great service.

Now, 1. This feast was to be kept in remembrance of their dwelling in tents in the wilderness. Thus is it expounded here, (v. 43.) That your generations may know, not only by the written history, but by this ocular tradition, that I made the children of Israel to dwell in booths. Thus it kept in perpetual remembrance, (1.) The meanness of their beginning, and the low and desolate state out of which God advanced that people. Note, Those that are comfortably fixed, ought often to call to mind their former unsettled state, when they were but little in their own eyes. (2.) The mercy of God to them, that, when they dwelt in tabernacles, God not only set up a tabernacle for himself among them, but, with the utmost care and tenderness imaginable, hung a canopy over them, even the cloud that sheltered them from the heat of the sun. God's former mercies to us and our fathers ought to be kept in everlasting remembrance. The eighth day was the great day of this feast, because then they were returned to their own houses again; and remembered how, after they had long dwelt in tents in the wilderness, at length they came to a happy settlement in the land of promise, where they dwelt in goodly houses. And they would the more sensibly value and be thankful for the comforts and conveniencies of their houses, when they had been seven days dwelling in booths. It is good for those that have ease and plenty, sometimes to learn what it is to endure hardness.

2. It was a feast of in-gathering, so it is called, Exod. 23. 16. When they had gathered in the fruit of their land, (v. 39.) the vintage as well as the harvest, then they were to keep this feast in thankfulness to God for all the increase of the year; and some think that the eighth day of the feast had special reference to this ground of the institution. Note, The joy of harvest ought to be improved for the furtherance of our joy in God. The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof, and therefore whatever we have the comfort of, he must have the glory of, especially when any mercy is perfected.

3. It was a typical feast. It is supposed by many that our blessed Saviour was born much about the time of this feast; then he left his mansions of light above to tabernacle among us, (John, 1. 14.) and he dwelt in booths. And the worship of God under the New Testament is prophesied of under the notion of keeping the feast of tabernacles, Zech. 14. 16. For, (1.) The gospel of Christ teaches us to dwell in tabernacles, to sit loose in this world, as those that have here no continuing city, but, by faith and hope, and a holy contempt of present things, to go out to Christ without the camp, Heb. 13. 13, 14. (2.) It teaches us to rejoice before the Lord our God. Those are the circumcision, Israelites indeed, that always rejoice in Christ Jesus, Phil. 3. 3. And the more we are taken off from this world, the less liable we are to the interruption of our joys.

Lastly, We have here the summary and conclusion of these institutions. 1. God appointed these feasts, (v. 37, 38.) Beside the sabbaths and your free-will offerings. This teaches us, (1.) That calls to extraordinary services will not excuse us from our constant stated performances. Within the days of the feast of tabernacles there must fall at least one sabbath, which must be as strictly observed as any other. (2.) That God's institutions leave room for free-will offerings. Not that we may invent what he never instituted, but we may repeat what he has instituted, ordinarily, the oftener the better. God is well pleased with a willing people. 2. Moses declared them to the children of Israel, v. 44. He let them know what God appointed, and neither more nor less. Thus St. Paul delivered to the churches what he had received from the Lord. We have reason to be thankful that the feasts of the Lord, declared unto us, are not so numerous, nor the observance of them so burthensome and costly, as their's then were. but more spiritual and significant, and surer, sweeter, earnest of the everlasting feast, at the last in-gathering, which we hope to be celebrating to eternity.

CHAP. XXIV.

In this chapter we have, I. A repetition of the laws concerning the lamps and the shew-bread, v. 1. .9. II. A violation of the law against blasphemy, with the imprisonment, trial, condemnation, and execution of the blasphemer, v. 10. .14, with v. 23. III. The law against blasphemy reinforced, (v. 15, 16.) with sundry other laws, v. 17. .22.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Command the children of Israel, that they bring unto thee pure oil-olive beaten for the light, to cause the lamps to burn continually. 3. Without the veil of the testimony, in the tabernacle of the congregation, shall Aaron order it from the evening unto the morning before the LORD continually: It shall be a statute for ever in your generations. 4. He shall order the lamps upon the pure candlestick before the LORD continually. 5. And thou shalt take fine flour, and bake twelve cakes thereof: two tenth-deals shall be in one cake. 6. And thou shalt set them in two rows, six on a row, upon the pure table before the LORD. 7. And thou shalt put pure frankincense upon each row, that it may be on the bread for a memorial, even an offering made by fire unto the LORD. 8. Every sabbath he shall set it in order before the LORD continually, being taken from the children of Israel by an everlasting covenant. 9. And it shall be Aaron's and his sons; and they shall eat it in the holy place: for it is most holy unto him of the offerings of the LORD made by fire by a perpetual statute.

Care is here taken, and orders given, for the decent furnishing of the candlestick and table in God's house.

1. The lamps must always be kept burning. The law for this we had before, Exod. 27. 20, 21. It is here repeated, probably, because it now began to be put in execution, when other things were settled. (1.) The people were to provide oil, (v. 2.) and this, as every thing else that was to be used in God's service, must be of the best pure oil-olive beaten, probably it was double-strained. This was to cause the lamps to burn; all our English copies read lamps, but in the original it is singular, (v. 2.) to cause the lamp to burn; but plural, (v. 4.) He shall order the lamps. The seven lamps made all one lamp; in allusion to which, the blessed Spirit of grace is represented by seven lamps of fire before the throne, (Rev. 4. 5.) for there are diversities of gifts, but one Spirit, 1 Cor. 12. 4. Ministers are as burning and shining lights in Christ's church, but it is the duty of people to provide comfortably for them, as Israel for the lamps. Scandalous maintenance makes a scandalous ministry. (2.) The priests were to tend the lamps; they must snuff them, clean the candlestick, and supply them with oil, morning and evening, v. 3, 4. Thus, it is the work of the ministers of the gospel to hold forth that word of life, not to set up new light, but, by expounding and preaching the word, to make the light of it more clear and extensive. This was the ordinary way of keeping the lamps burning; but when the church was poor, and in distress, we find its lamps fed constantly with oil from the good olives immediately, without the ministry of priest or people; (Zech. 4. 2, 3.) for, though God has tied us to means, he has not tied himself to them, but will take effectual care that his lamp never go out in the world for want of oil.

2. The table must always be kept spread. This was appointed before, Exod. 25. 30. And here also, (1.) The table was furnished with bread; not dainties or varieties to gratify a luxurious palate, but twelve loaves, or cakes, of bread, v. 5, 6. Where there is plenty of bread, there is no famine; and where bread is not, there is no feast. There was a loaf for every tribe, for in our Father's house there is bread enough. They were all provided for by the divine bounty, and were all welcome to the divine grace. Even after the revolt of the ten tribes, this number of loaves was continued, (2 Chron. 13. 11.) for the sake of those few of each tribe that retained their affection to the temple, and continued their attendance on it. (2.) A handful of frankincense was put in a gold saucer, upon or by each row, v. 7. When the bread was removed, and given to the priests, this frankincense was burnt upon the golden altar, (I suppose,) over and above the daily incense; and this was for a memorial instead of the bread, an offering made by fire. As the handful of the meat-offering, which was burnt upon the altar, is called the memorial thereof, ch. 2. 2. Thus a little was accepted as an humble acknowledgment, and all the loaves were consigned to the priests. All God's spiritual Israel, typified by the twelve loaves, are made through Christ a sweet savour to him, and their prayers are said to come up before God for a memorial, Acts, 10. 4. The word is borrowed from the ceremonial law. (3.) Every sabbath it was renewed. When the loaves had stood there a week, the priests had them to eat with other holy things that were to be eaten in the holy place, (v. 9.) and new ones were provided at the public charge, and put in the room of them, v. 8. The Jews say, "The hands of those priests that put on, were mixed with their's that took off, that the table might be never empty, but the bread might be before the Lord continually." God is never unprovided for the entertainment of those that visit him, as men often are, Luke, 11. 5. Every one of those cakes contained two tenth deals, that is, two omers of fine flour; just so much manna every Israelite gathered on the sixth day for the sabbath, Exod. 16. 22. Whence some infer that this shew-bread, which was set on the table on the sabbath, was intended as a memorial of the manna wherewith they were fed in the wilderness. Christ's ministers should provide new bread for his house every sabbath-day, the production of their fresh studies in the scripture, that their proficiency may appear to all, 1 Tim. 4. 1, 5.

10. And the son of an Israelitish woman, whose father was an Egyptian, went out among the children of Israel: and this son of the Israelitish woman and a man of Israel strove together in the camp. 11. And the Israelitish woman's son blasphemed the name of the LORD, and cursed. And they brought him unto Moses: (and his mother's name was Shelomith, the daughter of Dibri, of the tribe of Dan: 12. And they put him in ward, that the mind of the LORD might be shewed them. 13. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 14. Bring forth him that hath cursed without the camp, and let all that heard him lay their hands upon his head, and let all the congregation stone him. 15. And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying, Whosoever curseth his God shall bear his sin. 16. And he that blasphemeth the name of the LORD, he shall surely be put to death, and all the congregation shall certainly stone him: as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the LORD, shall be put to death. 17. And he that killeth any man shall surely be put to death. 18. And he that killeth a beast shall make it good; beast for beast. 19. And if a man cause a blemish in his neighbour, as he hath done, so shall it be done unto him; 20. Breach for breach, eye for eye, tooth for tooth: as he hath caused a blemish in a man, so shall it be done to him again. 21. And he that killeth a beast, he shall restore it; and he that killeth a man, he shall be put to death. 22. Ye shall have one manner of law, as well for the stranger, as for one of your own country: for I am the LORD your God. 23. And Moses spake unto the children of Israel, that they should bring forth him that had cursed out of the camp, and stone him with stones. And the children of Israel did as the LORD commanded Moses.

Evil manners, we say, beget good laws. We have here an account of the evil manners of a certain nameless mongrel Israelite, and the good laws occasioned thereby.

I. The offender was the son of an Egyptian father, and an Israelitish mother; (v. 10.) his mother was of the tribe of Dan; (v. 11.) neither he nor his father is named, but his mother only who was an Israelite. This notice is taken of his parentage, either, 1. To intimate what occasioned the quarrel he was engaged in. The Jews say, "He offered to set up his tent among the Danites in the right of his mother, but was justly opposed by some or other of that tribe, and informed, that, his father being an Egyptian, he had no part nor lot in the matter, but must look upon himself as a stranger." Or, 2. To shew the common ill effect of such mixt marriages. When a daughter of Israel would marry an idolatrous malignant Egyptian, what could be the production of such a marriage but a blasphemer? For the children will be apt to take after the worst side, whichsoever it is; and will sooner learn of an Egyptian father to blaspheme, than of an Israelitish mother to pray and praise.

II. The occasion of the offence was contention; he strove with a man of Israel. The mixt multitude of Egyptians that came up with Israel, (Exod. 12. 38.) were many ways hurtful to them, and this was one, they were often the authors of strife. The way to preserve the peace of the church, is to preserve the purity of it. In this strife he broke out into ill language. Note, When quarrels begin, we know not what mischief they will make before they end, nor how great a matter a little fire may kindle. When men's passion is up, they are apt to forget both their reason and their religion; which is a good reason why we should not be apt either to give or to resent provocation, but leave off strife before it be meddled with, because the beginning of it is as the letting forth of water.

III. The offence itself was blasphemy and cursing, v. 11. It is supposed that his cause came to be heard before the judges, who determined that he had no right to the privileges of an Israelite, his father being an Egyptian; and that, being enraged at the sentence, 1. He blasphemed the name of the Lord. He blasphemed the name, that is, God; who is known by his name only, not by his nature, or any similitude. Not as if God were a mere name, but his is a name above every name. The translators add of the Lord, which is implied, but not expressed, in the original, for the greater reverence of the Divine Majesty; it is a shame that it should be found on record, that the very name of Jehovah should be blasphemed; tell it not in Gath. It is a fond conceit of the superstitious Jews, that his blasphemy was in pronouncing the name of Jehovah, which they call ineffable; he that made himself known by that name never forbade the calling of him by that name. It is probable, that, finding himself aggrieved by the divine appointment, which separated between the Israelites and strangers, he impudently reproached both the law and the Law-Maker, and set him at defiance. 2. He cursed either God himself, (and then his cursing was the same with blaspheming,) or the person with whom he strove; imprecations of mischief are the hellish language of hasty passion, as well as of rooted malice: or perhaps he cursed the judges that gave sentence against him; he flew in the face of the court, and ridiculed the processes of it: thus he added sin to sin.

IV. The caution with which he was proceeded against for this sin. The witnesses or inferior judges brought him and his case (which was somewhat extraordinary) unto Moses, (v. 11.) according to the order settled; (Exod. 23. 22.) and Moses himself would not give judgment hastily, but committed the offender into custody, till he had consulted the Oracle in this case. Note, judges must deliberate; both those that give the verdict, and those that give the sentence, must consider diligently what they do, and do nothing rashly, for the judgment is God's, (Deut. 1. 17.) and before him there will be a re-hearing of the cause. They waited to know what was the mind of the Lord, whether he was to be put to death by the hand of the magistrate, or to be left to the judgment of God; or rather, they wanted to know whether he should be stoned, as those were to be that only cursed their parents, (ch. 20. 9.) or whether the crime, being so much greater, some sorer punishment should be inflicted on him. Note, Those that sit in judgment should sincerely desire, and by prayer and the use of all good means should endeavour, to know the mind of the Lord, because they judge for him, (2 Chron. 19. 6.) and to him they are accountable.

V. Sentence past upon this offender by the righteous Judge of heaven and earth himself; (v. 14.) Let all the congregation stone him. God could have cut him off by an immediate stroke from heaven, but he would put this honour upon the institution of magistracy, to make use of it for the supporting and vindicating of his own glory in the world. Observe, 1. The place of execution appointed, Bring him forth without the camp; to signify their detestation of the crime, they must thus cast out the criminal as an abominable branch, and separate him from them as an unclean thing, and unworthy a place in the camp of Israel. 2. The executioners; Let all the congregation do it, to shew their zeal for the honour of God's name. Every man should have a stone to throw at him that blasphemes God, reckoning himself nearly concerned in the reproaches cast on God, Ps. 69. 9. Thus also the greater terror would be cast upon the congregation; they that once helped to stone a blasphemer would ever after dread every thing that bordered upon blasphemy, that looked like it, or looked towards it. 3. The solemnity of the execution; before the congregation stoned him, the witnesses were to lay their hands upon his head. The Jews say that this was used in the execution of no criminals but blasphemers only; and that it was done with words to this purport, Thy blood be upon thy own head, for thou thyself hast occasioned it. Let no blame be laid on the law, judges, juries, or witnesses; if thou scornest, thou alone shalt bear it.

VI. A standing law made upon this occasion for the stoning of blasphemers, v. 15, 16. Magistrates are the guardians of both tables, and ought to be as jealous for the honour of God against those that speak contemptuously of his being and government, as for the public peace and safety against the disturbers of them. 1. A great stress is laid upon this law, as in no case to be dispensed with. He shall surely be put to death; they shall certainly stone him. They that lightly esteem God's honour might think it hard to make a man an offender for a word; (words are but wind;) but God would let them know that such words as these were not to be made light of, which come from malice against God in the heart of him that speaks, and must occasion either great guilt or great grief to those that hear. 2. It is made to extend to the strangers that sojourned among them, as well as those that were born in the land. God never made any law to compel strangers to be circumcised, and embrace the Jewish religion, (proselytes made by force would be no honour to the God of Israel,) but he made a law to restrain strangers from speaking evil of the God of Israel. 3. He that was put to death for blasphemy, is said to bear his sin, in the punishment of it; no sacrifice being appointed, on the head of which the sin might be transferred, he himself was to bear it upon his own head, as a sacrifice to divine justice. So his own tongue fell upon him, (Ps. 64, 8.) and the tongue of a blasphemer will fall heavy.

VII. A repetition of some other laws annexed to this new law. 1. That murder should be punished with death, (v. 17. and again v. 21.) according to an ancient law in Noah's time, (Gen. 9. 6.) and the very law of nature, Gen. 4. 10. 2. That maimers should in like manner be punished by the law of retaliation, v. 19, 20. Not that men might in these cases be their own avengers, but they might appeal to the civil magistrate, who should award suffering to the injurious, and satisfaction to the injured, as should be thought fit, in proportion to the hurt done. This law we had before, Exod. 22. 4, 5. And it was more agreeable to that dispensation in which were revealed the rigour of the law, and what sin deserved, than to the dispensation we are under, in which are revealed the grace of the gospel, and the remission of sins: and therefore our Saviour has set aside this law, (Math. 5. 38, 39.) not to restrain magistrates from executing public justice, but to restrain us all from returning personal injuries, and to oblige us to forgive, as we are and hope to be forgiven. 3. That hurt done wilfully to a neighbour's cattle should be punished, by making good the damage, v. 18, 21. Thus the divine law took not only their lives, but their goods also, under its protection. Those beasts which belonged to no particular person, but were, as our law speaks, fera nature—of a wild nature, it was lawful for them to kill; but not those which any man had a property in. Does God take care for oxen? Yes; for our sakes he does. 4. That strangers, as well as native Israelites, should be both entitled to the benefit of this law, so as not to suffer wrong, and should be liable to the penalty of this law, in case they did wrong. And it should seem this is it that brings in these laws here, to shew how equitable it was, that strangers as well as Israelites should be punished for blasphemy, because strangers as well as Israelites were punishable for other crimes. And there may be this further reason for the recognition of these laws here; God would hereby shew what provision he had made for man's safety, in punishing those that were injurious to him; which should be an argument with magistrates to be jealous for his honour, and to punish those that blaspheme his name. If God took care for their comfort, they ought to take care for his glory.

VIII. The execution of the blasphemer; Moses did, as it were, sign the warrant for it, he spake unto the children of Israel to do it, and they did as the Lord commanded Moses, v. 23. This teaches that death is the wages of sin; and that blasphemy in particular is an iniquity to be punished by the judges. But if those who thus profane the name of God escape punishment from men, yet the Lord our God will not suffer them to escape his righteous judgments. This blasphemer was the first that died by the law of Moses. Stephen, the first that died for the gospel, died by the abuse of this law; the martyr and the malefactor suffered the same death; but how vast the difference between them!

CHAP. XXV.

The law of this chapter concerns the lands and estates of the Israelites in Canaan, the occupying and transferring of which were to be under the divine direction, as well as the management of religious worship; for as the tabernacle was a holy house, so Canaan was a holy land; and upon that account, as much as any thing, it was the glory of all lands. In token of a peculiar title which God had to this land, and a right to dispose of it, he appointed, I. That every seventh year should be a year of rest from occupying the land, a sabbatical year, v. 1. 7. In this God expected from them extraordinary instances of faith and obedience, and they might expect from God extraordinary instances of power and goodness in providing for them, v. 18. 22. II. That every fiftieth year should be a year of jubilee, that is, 1. A year of release of debts and mortgages, and return to the possession of their alienated lands, v. 8. 27. Particular directions are given, (1.) Concerning the sale and redemption of lands, v. 23. 28. (2.) Of houses in cities and villages, with a proviso for Levite-cities, v. 29. 34. (2.) A year of release of servants and bond slaves. (1.) Here is inserted a law for the kind usage of poor debtors, v. 35. 38. (2.) Then comes the law for the discharge of all Israelites that were sold for servants, in the year of jubilee, if they were not redeemed before. [1.] If they were sold to the Israelites, v. 39. 46. And, [2.] If sold to proselytes, v. 47. 55. All these appointments have something moral and of perpetual obligation in them, though in the letter of them they were not only peculiar to the Jews, but to them only while they were in Canaan.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses in mount Sinai, saying, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye come into the land which I give you, then shall the land keep a sabbath unto the LORD. 3. Six years thou shalt sow thy field, and six years thou shalt prune thy vineyard, and gather in the fruit thereof; 4. But in the seventh year shall be a sabbath of rest unto the land, a sabbath for the LORD: thou shalt neither sow thy field, nor prune thy vineyard. 5. That which groweth of its own accord of thy harvest thou shalt not reap, neither gather the grapes of thy vine undressed; for it is a year of rest unto the land. 6. And the sabbath of the land shall be meat for you; for thee, and for thy servant, and for thy maid, and for thy hired servant, and for thy stranger that sojourneth with thee, 7. And for thy cattle, and for the beast that are in thy land, shall all the increase thereof be meat.

The law of Moses laid a great deal of stress upon the sabbath, the sanctification of which was the earliest and most ancient of all divine institutions, designed for the keeping up of the knowledge and worship of the Creator among men; that law not only revived the observance of sabbath-days every week, but, for the further advancement of the honour of them, added the institution of a sabbatical year; (v. 4.) In the seventh year shall be a sabbath of rest unto the land. And hence the Jews collect that vulgar tradition, that after the world has stood six thousand years, (a thousand years being to God as one day,) it shall cease, and the eternal sabbath shall succeed. A weak foundation on which to build the fixing of that day and hour which it is God's prerogative to know. This sabbatical year began in September, at the end of harvest, the seventh month of their ecclesiastical year: and the law was, 1. That at the seed-time, which immediately followed the end of their in-gathering, they should sow no corn in their land, and that they should not in the spring dress their vineyard, and consequently that they should not expect either harvest or vintage the next year. 2. That what their ground did produce of itself, they should not claim any property or use in, otherwise than from hand to mouth, but leave it for the poor servants, strangers, and cattle, v. 5. 7. It must be a sabbath of rest to the land; they must neither do any work about it, nor expect any fruit from it; all annual labours must be intermitted in the seventh year, as much as daily labours on the seventh day. The Jews say, "They began not to reckon for the sabbatical year till they had completed the conquest of Canaan, which was in the eighth year of Joshua; the seventh year after that was the first sabbatical year, and so the fiftieth year was the jubilee." This year there was to be a general release of debts, (Deut. 15. 1, 2.) and a public reading of the law in the feast, (Deut. 31. 10, 11.) to make it the more solemn.

Now, (1.) God would hereby shew them that he was their Landlord, and that they were tenants at will under him. Landlords are wont to stipulate with their tenants, when they shall break up their ground, how long they shall till it, and when they shall let it rest: God would thus give, grant, and convey, that good land to them, under such provisos and limitations, as should let them know that they were not proprietors, but dependants on their Lord. (2.) It was a kindness to their land to let it rest sometimes, and would keep it in heart (as our husbandmen express it) for posterity, whose satisfaction God would have them to consult, and not to use the ground as if it were designed for one age only. (3.) When they were thus for a whole year taken off from all country-business, they would have the more leisure to attend the exercises of religion, and to get the knowledge of God and his law. (4.) They were hereby taught to be charitable and generous, and not to engross all to themselves, but to be willing that others should share with them in the gifts of God's bounty, which the earth brought forth of itself. (5.) They were brought to live in a constant dependence upon the Divine Providence, finding that as man lives not by bread alone, so he has bread, not by his own industry alone, but, if God pleases, by the word of blessing from the mouth of God, without any care or pains of man, Matth. 4. 4. (6.) They were reminded of the easy life man lived in paradise, when he ate of every good thing, not, as since, in the sweat of his face. Labour and toil came in with sin. (7.) They were taught to consider how the poor lived, that did neither sow nor reap, even by the blessing of God upon a little. Lastly, This year of rest typified the spiritual rest which all believers enter into through Christ, our true Noah, who giveth us comfort and rest concerning our work, and the toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed, Gen. 5. 29. Through him we are eased of the burthen of worldly care and labour, both being sanctified and sweetened to us, and we are enabled and encouraged to live by faith. And as the fruits of this sabbath of the land were enjoyed in common, so the salvation wrought out by Christ is a common salvation; and this sabbatical year seemed to have been revived in the Christian church, when the believers had all things common. Acts, 2. 44.

8. And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years. 9. Then shalt thou cause the trumpet of the jubilee to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month; in the day of atonement shall ye make the trumpet sound throughout all your land. 10. And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubilee unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family. 11. A jubilee shall that fiftieth year be unto you: ye shall not sow, neither reap that which groweth of itself in it, nor gather the grapes in it of thy vine undressed. 12. For it is the jubilee; it shall be holy unto you: ye shall eat the increase thereof out of the field. 13. In the year of this jubilee ye shall return every man unto his possession. 14. And if thou sell aught unto thy neighbour, or buyest aught of thy neighbour's hand, ye shall not oppress one another. 15. According to the number of years after the jubilee thou shalt buy of thy neighbour, and according unto the number of years of the fruits he shall sell unto thee: 16. According to the multitude of years thou shalt increase the price thereof, and according to the fewness of years thou shalt diminish the price of it: for according to the number of the years of the fruits doth he sell unto thee. 17. Ye shall not therefore oppress one another: but thou shalt fear thy God: for I am the LORD your God. 18. Wherefore ye shall do my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them; and ye shall dwell in the land in safety. 19. And the land shall yield her fruit, and ye shall eat your fill, and dwell therein in safety. 20. And if ye shall say, What shall we eat the seventh year? behold, we shall not sow, nor gather in our increase. 21. Then I will command my blessing upon you in the sixth year, and it shall bring forth fruit for three years. 22. And ye shall sow the eighth year, and eat yet of old fruit until the ninth year; until her fruits come in, ye shall eat of the old store.

Here is,

I. The general institution of the jubilee, v. 8, &c.

1. When it was to be observed; after seven sabbaths of years, v. 8. Whether the forty-ninth or fiftieth, is a great question among learned men: that it should be the seventh sabbatical year, that is, the forty-ninth,* (which by a very common form of speech is called the fiftieth,) seems to me most probable, and is, I think, made pretty clear by that learned chronologer Calvisius, and the objections removed; but this is not a place for the arguing of it. Seven sabbaths of weeks were reckoned from the passover to the feast of pentecost, (or fiftieth day, for so pentecost signifies,) and so seven sabbaths of years from one jubilee to another, and the seventh seventh is called the fiftieth; and all this honour is put upon the seventh, for the sake of God's resting the seventh day from the work of creation.

2. How it was to be proclaimed; with sound of trumpet in all parts of the country, (v. 5.) both to give notice to all persons of it, and to express their joy and triumph in it; and the word jobel, or jubilee, is supposed to signify some particular sound of the trumpet distinguishable from any other; for the trumpet that gives an uncertain sound is of little service, 1 Cor. 14. 8. The trumpet was sounded in the close of the day of atonement, thence the jubilee commenced; and very fitly; when they had been humbling and afflicting their souls for sin, then they were made to hear this voice of joy and gladness, Ps. 51. 8. When their peace was made with God, then liberty was proclaimed: for the removal of guilt is necessary to make way for the entrance of all true comfort, Rom. 5. 1, 2. In allusion to this solemn proclamation of the jubilee, it was foretold concerning our Lord Jesus, that he should preach the acceptable year of the Lord, Isa. 61. 2. He sent his apostles to proclaim it with the trumpet of the everlasting gospel, which they were to preach to every creature. And it stands still foretold, that at the last day the trumpet shall sound, which shall release the dead out of the bondage of the grave, and restore us to our possessions.

3. What was to be done in that year extraordinary; beside the common rest of the land, which was observed every sabbatical year, (v. 11, 12.) and the release of personal debts, (Deut. 15. 2, 3.) there was to be the legal restoration of every Israelite to all the property, and all the liberty which had been alienated from him since the last jubilee; so that never was any people so secured in their liberty and property (those glories of a people) as Israel was. Effectual care was taken that, while they kept close to God, these should not only not be taken from them by the violence of others, but not thrown away by their own folly.

(1.) The property which every man had in his dividend of the land of Canaan could not be alienated any longer than till the year of jubilee, and then he or his should return to it, and have a title to it as undisputed, and the possession of it as undisturbed, as ever; (v. 10, 13.) Ye shall return every man to his possession; so that, if a man had sold or mortgaged his estate, or any part of it, it should then return to him or his heirs, free of all charge and encumbrance. Now this was no wrong to the purchaser, because the year of jubilee was fixed, and every man knew when it would come, and made his bargain accordingly. By our law, indeed, if lands be granted to a man and his heirs, upon condition that he shall never sell or alienate them, the grant is good, but the condition is void and repugnant; Iniquum est ingenuis hominibus (say the lawyers) non esse liberam rerum suarum alienationem—It is unjust to prevent free-men from alienating their own possessions. Yet it is agreed in the books, that if the king grant lands to a man in fee upon condition he shall not alienate, the condition is good. Now God would shew his people Israel that their land was his, and they were his tenants; and therefore he ties them up that they shall not have power to sell, but only to make leases for any term of years, not going beyond the next jubilee. By this means it was provided, [1.] That their genealogies should be carefully preserved, which would be of use for clearing our Saviour's pedigree. [2.] That the distinction of tribes should be kept up; for though a man might purchase lands in another tribe, yet he could not retain them longer than till the year of jubilee, and then they would revert of course. [3.] That none should grow exorbitantly rich, by laying house to house, and field to field, (Isa. 5. 8.) but should rather apply themselves to the cultivating of what they had, than the enlarging of their possessions. The wisdom of the Roman commonwealth sometimes provided that no man should be master of above five hundred acres. [4.] That no family should be sunk and ruined, and condemned to perpetual poverty. This particular care God took for the support of the honour of that people, and the preserving, not only of that good land to the nation in general, but of every man's share to his family in particular, for a perpetual inheritance; that it might the better typify that good part which shall never be taken away from those that have it.

(2.) The liberty which every man was born to, if it were sold or forfeited, should likewise return at the year of jubilee; (v. 13.) Ye shall return every man to his family. Those that were sold into other families, thereby became strangers to their own; but in this year of redemption they were to return. This was typical of our redemption by Christ from the slavery of sin and Satan, and our restoration to the glorious liberty of the children of God. Some compute that the very year in which Christ died was a year of jubilee, and the last that ever was kept. But however that be, we are sure it is the Son that makes us free, and then we are free indeed.

II. A law upon this occasion against oppression in buying and selling of land; neither the buyer nor the seller must over-reach, v. 14. . 17. In short, the buyer must not give less, nor the seller take more, than the just value of the thing, considered as necessarily returning at the year of jubilee. It must be settled what the clear yearly value of the land was, and then how many years' purchase it was worth till the year of jubilee. But they must reckon only the years of the fruits, (v. 15.) and therefore must discount for the sabbatical years. It is easy to observe, that the nearer the jubilee was, the less must the value of the land be; according to the fewness of the years thou shalt diminish the price. But we do not find it so easy practically to infer from thence, that the nearer the world comes to its period, the less value we should put upon the things of it; because the time is short, and the fashion of the world passeth away, let those that buy, be as though they possessed not. One would put little value on an old house, that is ready to drop down.

All bargains ought to be made by this rule, Ye shall not oppress one another, not take advantage of one another's ignorance or necessity, but thou shalt fear thy God. Note, The fear of God reigning in the heart would effectually restrain us from doing any wrong to our neighbour in word or deed; for, though man be not, God is, the Avenger of those that go beyond or defraud their brethren, 1 Thess. 4. 6. Perhaps Nehemiah refers to this very law, (ch. 5. 15.) where he tells us, that he did not oppress those he had under his power, because of the fear of God.

III. Assurance given them that they should be no losers, but great gainers, by observing these years of rest. It is promised, 1. That they should be safe; (v. 18.) Ye shall dwell in the land in safety. And again, (v. 19.) the word signifies both outward safety, and inward security and confidence of spirit, that they should be quiet both from evil, and from the fear of evil. 2. That they should be rich; Ye shall eat your fill. Note, If we be careful to do our duty, we may cheerfully trust God with our comfort. 3. That they should not want food convenient that year in which they did neither sow nor reap; (v. 21.) I will command my blessing in the sixth year, and it shall bring forth fruit for three years. This was, (1.) A standing miracle, that whereas at other times one year did but serve to bring in another, the productions of the sixth year should serve to bring in the ninth. Note, The blessing of God upon our provision will make a little go a great way, and satisfy even the poor with bread, Ps. 132. 15. It was, (2.) A lasting memorial of the manna, which was given double on the sixth day for two days. And, (3.) It was intended for an encouragement to all God's people, in all ages, to trust him in the way of duty, and to cast their care upon him. There is nothing lost by faith and self-denial in our obedience.

23. The land shall not be sold for ever: for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me. 24. And in all the land of your possession ye shall grant a redemption for the land. 25. If thy brother be waxen poor, and hath sold away some of his possession, and if any of his kin come to redeem it, then shall he redeem that which his brother sold. 26. And if the man have none to redeem it, and himself be able to redeem it; 27. Then let him count the years of the sale thereof, and restore the overplus unto the man to whom he sold it, that he may return unto his possession. 28. But if he be not able to restore it to him, then that which is sold shall remain in the hand of him that hath bought it until the year of jubilee: and in the jubilee it shall go out, and he shall return unto his possession. 29. And if a man sell a dwelling-house in a walled city, then he may redeem it within a whole year after it is sold; within a full year may he redeem it. 30. And if it be not redeemed within the space of a full year, then the house that is in the walled city shall be established for ever to him that bought it, throughout his generations: it shall not go out in the jubilee. 31. But the houses of the villages which have no walls round about them shall be counted as the fields of the country: they may be redeemed, and they shall go out in the jubilee. 32. Notwithstanding, the cities of the Levites, and the houses of the cities of their possession, may the Levites redeem at any time. 33. And if a man purchase of the Levites, then the house that was sold, and the city of his possession, shall go out in the year of jubilee: for the houses of the cities of the Levites are their possession among the children of Israel. 34. But the field of the suburbs of their cities may not be sold; for it is their perpetual possession. 35. And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee, then thou shalt relieve him: yea, though he be a stranger, or a sojourner; that he may live with thee. 36. Take thou no usury of him, or increase: but fear thy God; that thy brother may live with thee. 37. Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase. 38. I am the LORD your God, which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, to give you the land of Canaan, and to be your God.

Here is,

I. A law concerning the real estates of the Israelites in the land of Canaan, and the transferring of them.

1. That no land should be sold for ever from the family to whose lot it fell in the division of the land. And the reason given is, The land is mine, and ye are strangers and sojourners with me, v. 23. (1.) God having a particular propriety in this land, he would by this restraint keep them sensible of it. The possessions of good people, who, having given up themselves to God, have therewith given up all they have to him, are in a particular manner at his disposal, and his disposal of them must be submitted to. (2.) They being strangers and sojourners with him in that land, and having his tabernacle among them, to alienate their part of that land would be in effect to cut themselves off from their fellowship and communion with God, which that was a token and symbol of. For which reason, Naboth would rather incur the wrath of a king, than part with the inheritance of his fathers, 1 Kings, 21. 3.

2. That if a man was constrained through poverty to sell his land for the subsistence of his family, yet, if afterward he was able, he might redeem it before the year of jubilee, (v. 24, 26, 27.) and the price must be settled according to the number of years since the sale, and before the jubilee.

3. That if the person himself was not able to redeem it, his next kinsman might, v. 25. The redeemer thereof, he that is near unto him shall come and shall redeem, so it might be read. The kinsman is called Goel, the redeemer, (Numb. 5. 8. Ruth, 3. 9.) to whom belonged the right of redeeming the land. And this typified Christ, who assumed our nature, that he might be our Kinsman, bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh, and being the only Kinsman we have that is able to do it, to him belonged the right of redemption. As for all our other kinsmen, their shoe must be plucked off, (Ruth, 4. 6, 7.) they cannot redeem; but Christ can, and hath redeemed the inheritance which we by sin had forfeited and alienated, and made a new settlement of it upon all that by faith become allied to him. We know that this Redeemer liveth, Job, 19. 25. And some make this duty of the kinsman to signify the brotherly love that should be among Christians, inclining them to recover those that are fallen, and to restore them with the spirit of meekness.

4. That if the land was not redeemed before the year of jubilee, then it should return of course to him that had sold or mortgaged it; (v. 28.) In the jubilee it shall go out. This was a figure of the free grace of God towards us in Christ, by which, and not by any price or merit of our own, we are restored to the favour of God, and become entitled to paradise, from which our first parents, and we in them, are expelled for disobedience.

5. A difference was made between houses in walled cities and lands in the country, or houses in country-villages. Houses in walled cities were more the fruits of their own industry than land in the country, which was the immediate gift of God's bounty; and therefore, if a man sold a house in a city, he might redeem it any time within a year after the sale, but otherwise it was confirmed to the purchaser for ever, and should not return, no not at the year of jubilee, v. 29, 30. This provision was made to encourage strangers and proselytes to come and settle among them. Though they could not purchase land in Canaan to them and their heirs, yet they might purchase houses in walled cities, which would be most convenient for them who were supposed to live by trade. But country-houses could be disposed of no otherwise than as lands might.

6. A clause is added in favour of the Levites, by way of exception from these rules. (1.) Dwelling-houses in the cities of the Levites might be redeemed at any time, and, if not redeemed, should revert in the year of jubilee, (v. 32, 33.) because the Levites had no other possessions than cities and their suburbs, and God would shew that the Levites were his peculiar care; and it was for the interest of the public that they should not be impoverished, or wormed out of their inheritances. (2.) The fields adjoining to their cities (Numb. 35. 4, 5.) might not be sold at any time, for they belonged not to particular Levites, but to the city of the Levites, as a corporation, who could not alienate, without a wrong to their tribe; therefore, if any of those fields were sold, the bargain was void, v. 34. Even the Egyptians took care to preserve the land of the priests, Gen. 47. 22. And there is no less reason for the taking of the maintenance of the gospel-ministry under the special protection of Christian governments.

II. A law for the relief of the poor, and the tender usage of poor debtors; and these are of more general and perpetual obligation than the former.

1. The poor must be relieved, v. 35. Here is, (1.) Our brother's poverty and distress supposed; If thy brother be waxen poor; not only thy brother by nation as a Jew, but thy brother by nature as a man, for it follows, though he be a stranger or a sojourner. All men are to be looked upon and treated as brethren, for we have all one Father, Mal. 2. 10. Though he is poor, yet still he is thy brother, and is to be loved and owned as a brother. Poverty does not destroy the relation. Though a son of Abraham, yet he may wax poor and fall into decay. Note, Poverty and decay are great grievances, and very common; The poor ye have always with you. (2.) Our duty enjoined, Thou shalt relieve him. By sympathy, pitying the poor; by service, doing for them; and by supply, giving to them according to their necessity and thine ability.

2. Poor debtors must not be oppressed. If thy brother be waxen poor, and have occasion to borrow money of thee for the necessary support of his family, Take thou no usury of him, either for money or victuals, v. 36, 37. And thus far this law binds still, but could never be thought binding where money is borrowed for purchase of lands, trade, or other improvements; for there it is reasonable that the lender share with the borrower in the profit. The law here is plainly intended for the relief of the poor, to whom it is sometimes as great a charity to lend freely as to give. Observe the arguments here used against extortion. (1.) God patronises the poor; "Fear thy God, who will reckon with thee for all injuries done to the poor: thou fearest not them, but fear him." (2.) Relieve the poor, that they may live with thee, and some way or other they may be serviceable to thee. The rich can as ill spare the hands of the poor, as the poor can the purses of the rich. (3.) The same argument is used to enforce this precept that prefaces all the ten commandments; (v. 38.) I am the Lord your God, which brought you out of Egypt. Note, It becomes those that have received mercy to shew mercy. If God has been so gracious to us, we ought not to be rigorous with our brethren.

39. And if thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee; thou shalt not compel him to serve as a bond-servant: 40. But as an hired servant, and as a sojourner, he shall be with thee, and shall serve thee unto the year of jubilee. 41. And then shall he depart from thee, both he and his children with him, and shall return unto his own family, and unto the possession of his fathers shall he return. 42. For they are my servants, which I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: they shall not be sold as bondmen. 43. Thou shalt not rule over him with rigour; but shalt fear thy God. 44. Both thy bondmen and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. 45. Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land: and they shall be your possession. 46. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen for ever: but over your brethren the children of Israel, ye shall not rule one over another with rigour. 47. And if a sojourner or stranger wax rich by thee, and thy brother that dwelleth by him wax poor, and sell himself unto the stranger or sojourner by thee, or to the stock of the stranger's family: 48. After that he is sold, he may be redeemed again: one of his brethren may redeem him. 49. Either his uncle, or his uncle's son, may redeem him, or any that is nigh of kin unto him of his family may redeem him; or if he be able, he may redeem himself. 50. And he shall reckon with him that bought him from the year that he was sold to him unto the year of jubilee; and the price of his sale shall be according unto the number of years, according to the time of an hired servant shall it be with him. 51. If there be yet many years behind, according unto them he shall give again the price of his redemption, out of the money that he was bought for. 52. And if there remain but few years unto the year of jubilee, then ye shall count with him, and according unto his years shall he give him again the price of his redemption. 53. And as a yearly hired servant shall he be with him: and the other shall not rule with rigour over him in thy sight. 54. And if he be not redeemed in these years, then he shall go out in the year of jubilee, both he and his children with him. 55. For unto me the children of Israel are servants, they are my servants whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: I am the LORD your God.

We have here the laws concerning servitude, designed to preserve the honour of the Jewish nation as a free people, and rescued, by a divine power, out of the house of bondage, into the glorious liberty of God's sons, his first-born. Now the law is,

I. That a native Israelite should never be made a bondman for perpetuity. If he was sold for debt, or for a crime, by the house of judgment, he was to serve but six years, and to go out the seventh; that was appointed, Exod. 21. 2. But if he sold himself, through extreme poverty, having nothing at all left him to preserve his life, and if it was to one of his own nation that he sold himself, in such a case it is here provided, 1. That he should not serve as a bond servant, (v. 39.) nor be sold with the sale of a bondman, (v. 42.) that is, "It must not be looked upon that his master that bought him had as absolute a property in him as in a captive taken in war, that might be used, sold, and bequeathed, at pleasure, as much as a man's cattle; no, he shall serve thee as a hired servant, whom the master has the use of only, but not a despotic power over." And the reason is, They are my servants, v. 42. God does not make his servants slaves, and therefore their brethren must not. God had redeemed them out of Egypt, and therefore they must never be exposed to sale as bondmen. The apostle applies this spiritually, (1 Cor. 7. 23.) Ye are bought with a price, be not ye the servants of men, that is, "of the lusts of men; no, nor of your own lusts;" for, being become the servants of God, we must not let sin reign in our mortal bodies, Rom. 6. 12, 22. 2. That, while he did serve, he should not be ruled with rigour, as the Israelites were in Egypt, v. 43. Both his work and his usage must be such as were fitting for a son of Abraham. Masters are still required to give to their servants that which is just and equal, Col. 4. 1. They may be used, but must not be abused. Those masters that are always hectoring and domineering over their servants, taunting them, and trampling upon them, that are unreasonable in exacting work, and giving rebukes, and that rule them with a high hand, forget that their Master is in heaven; and what will they do when he rises up? as holy Job reasons with himself, Job, 31. 13, 14. 3. That at the year of jubilee he should go out free, he and his children, and should return to his own family, v. 41. This typified our redemption, from the service of sin and Satan, by the grace of God in Christ, whose truth makes us free, John, 8. 32. The Jewish writers say, that for ten days before the jubilee-trumpet sounded, the servants that were to be discharged by it did express their great joy by feasting, and wearing garlands on their heads: it is therefore called the joyful sound, Ps. 89. 15. And we are thus to rejoice in the liberty we have by Christ.

II. That they might purchase bondmen of the heathen nations that were round about them, or of those strangers that sojourned among them, (except of those seven nations that were to be destroyed,) and might claim a dominion over them, and entail them upon their families, as an inheritance, for the year of jubilee should give no discharge to them, v. 44. 46. Thus, in our English plantations, the negroes only are used as slaves; how much to the credit of Christianity, I shall not say. Now, 1. This authority, which they had over the bondmen they purchased from the neighbouring nations, was in pursuance of the blessing of Jacob, (Gen. 27. 29.) Let people serve thee. 2. It figured the bringing in of the Gentiles to the service of Christ and his church. Ask of me, and I will give thee the heathen for thine inheritance, Ps. 2. 9. And it is promised, (Isa. 61. 5.) Strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien be your vine-dressers; see Rev. 2. 26, 27. The upright shall have the dominion in the morning, Ps. 49. 14. 3. It intimates, that none shall have the benefit of the gospel-jubilee, but those only that are Israelites indeed, and the children of Abraham by faith: as for those that continue heathenish, they continue bondmen. See this turned upon the unbelieving Jews themselves, (Gal. 4. 25.) where Jerusalem, when she had rejected Christ, is said to be in bondage with her children. Let me only add here, that, though they are not forbidden to rule their bondmen with rigour, yet the Jewish doctors say, "It is the property of mercy, and way of wisdom, that a man should be compassionate, and not make his yoke heavy upon any servant that he has."

III. That if an Israelite sold himself for a servant to a wealthy proselyte that sojourned among them, care should be taken that he should have the same advantages as if he had sold himself to an Israelite, and in some respects greater. 1. That he should have the same advantages, for instance, not to serve as a bondman, but as a hired servant, and not to be ruled with rigour, (v. 53.) in thy sight; which intimated that the Jewish magistrates should particularly have an eye to him, and, if he were abused, should take cognizance of it, and redress his grievances, though the injured servant did not himself complain. Also he was to go free at the year of jubilee, v. 54. Though the sons of strangers might serve them for ever, yet the sons of Israel might not serve strangers for ever; yet the servant here, having made himself a slave by his own act and deed, should not go out in the seventh year of release, but in the jubilee only. 2. That he should have this further advantage, that he might be redeemed again before the year of jubilee, v. 48, 49. He that had sold himself to an Israelite, might, if ever he were able, redeem himself, but his relations had no right to redeem him: "But if a man sold himself to a stranger," the Jews say, "his relations were urged to redeem him; if they did not, it was fit that he should be redeemed at the public charge," which we find done, Neh. 5. 8. The price of his ransom was to be computed according to the prospect of the year of jubilee, (v. 50. . 52.) as in the redemption of land, v. 15, 16. The learned Bishop Patrick quotes one of the Jewish rabbins for an evangelical exposition of that appointment, (v. 48.) One of his brethren shall redeem him; "This Redeemer," says the Rabbi, "is the Messiah, the son of David." They expected this Messiah to be their Redeemer out of their captivity, and to restore them to their own land again; but we welcome him as the Redeemer who shall come to Zion, and shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob, for he shall save his people from their sins; and under this notion there were those that looked for redemption in Jerusalem.

CHAP. XXVI.

This chapter is a solemn conclusion of the main body of the levitical law. The precepts that follow in this and the following book, either relate to some particular matters, or are repetitions and explications of the foregoing institutions. Now this chapter contains a general enforcement of all these laws, by promises of reward in case of obedience on the one hand, and threatenings of punishment for disobedience on the other hand; the former to work upon hope, the latter on fear, those two handles of the soul, by which it is taken hold of and managed. Here is, I. A repetition of two or three of the principal of the commandments, v. 1, 2. II. An inviting promise of all good things, if they would but keep God's commandments, v. 3. . 13. III. A terrible threatening of ruining judgments which would be brought upon them, if they were refractory and disobedient, v. 14. . 39. IV. A gracious promise of the return of mercy to those of them that would repent and reform, v. 40, 3c. Deut. 28. is parallel to this.

1. YE shall make you no idols nor graven image, neither rear you up a standing image, neither shall ye set up any image of stone in your land, to bow down unto it: for I am the LORD your God. 2. Ye shall keep my sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary: I am the LORD. 3. If ye walk in my statutes, and keep my commandments, and do them; 4. Then I will give you rain in due season, and the land shall yield her increase, and the trees of the field shall yield their fruit. 5. And your threshing shall reach unto the vintage, and the vintage shall reach unto the sowing time: and ye shall eat your bread to the full, and dwell in your land safely. 6. And I will give peace in the land, and ye shall lie down, and none shall make you afraid: and I will rid evil beasts out of the land, neither shall the sword go through your land. 7. And ye shall chase your enemies, and they shall fall before you by the sword. 8. And five of you shall chase an hundred, and an hundred of you shall put ten thousand to flight: and your enemies shall fall before you by the sword. 9. For I will have respect unto you, and make you fruitful, and multiply you, and establish my covenant with you. 10. And ye shall eat old store, and bring forth the old because of the new. 11. And I will set my tabernacle among you: and my soul shall not abhor you. 12. And I will walk among you, and will be your God, and ye shall be my people. 13. I am the LORD your God, which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, that ye should not be their bondmen; and I have broken the bands of your yoke, and made you go upright.

Here is,

I. The inculcating of those precepts of the law which were of the greatest consequence, and by which especially their obedience would be tried, v. 1, 2. They are the abstract of the second and fourth commandments; which, as they are by much the largest in the decalogue, so they are most frequently insisted on in other parts of the law. As, when a master has given many things in charge to his servant, he concludes with the repetition of those things which were of the greatest importance, and which the servant was most in danger of neglecting, bidding him, whatever he did, be sure to remember those; so here, God by Moses, after many precepts, closes all with a special charge to observe these two great commandments. 1. "Be sure you never worship images, nor ever make any sort of images or pictures for a religious use," v. 1. No sin was more provoking to God than this, and yet there was none that they were more addicted to, and which afterward proved of more pernicious consequence to them. Next to God's being, unity, and universal influence, it is necessary that we know and believe that he is an infinite Spirit; and therefore to represent him by an image in the making of it, to confine him to an image in the consecrating of it, and to worship him by an image in bowing down to it, changes his truth into a lie, and his glory into shame, as much as any thing. 2. "Be sure you keep up a great veneration for sabbaths and religious assemblies," v. 2. As nothing tends more to corrupt religion than the use of images in devotion, so nothing contributes more to the support of it than keeping the sabbaths, and reverencing the sanctuary. These make up very much of the instrumental part of religion, by which the essentials of it are kept up. Therefore we find in the prophets, that, next to the sin of idolatry, there is no sin for which the Jews are more frequently reprov'd and threaten'd, than the profanation of the sabbath-day.

II. Great encouragements given them to live in constant obedience to all God's commandments, largely and strongly assuring them, that, if they did so, they should be a happy people, and should be blessed with all the good things they could desire. Human governments enforce their laws with penalties to be inflicted for the breach of them; but God will be known also as the Rewarder of those that seek and serve him.

Let us take a view of these great and precious promises, which, though they relate chiefly to the life which now is, and to the public national concerns of that people, were typical of the spiritual blessings entailed by the covenant of grace upon all believers through Christ.

1. Plenty and abundance of the fruits of the earth. They should have seasonable rain, neither too little nor too much, but what was requisite for their land, which was watered with the dew of heaven, (Deut. 11. 10, 11.) that it might yield its increase, v. 4. The dependence which the fruitfulness of the earth beneath has upon the influences of heaven above, is a sensible intimation to us, that every good and perfect gift must be expected from above, from the Father of lights. It is promised that the earth should produce its fruits in such great abundance, that they would be kept in full employment, during both the harvest and the vintage, to gather it in, v. 5. Before they had reaped their corn, and threshed it, the vintage would be ready; and before they had finished their vintage, it would be high time to begin their sowing. Long harvests are often with us the consequences of bad weather, but with them they should be the effects of a great increase. This signified the plenty of grace which should be poured out in gospel-times, when the ploughman should overtake the reaper, (Amos, 9.13.) and a great harvest of souls should be gathered in to Christ. The plenty should be so great, that they should bring forth the old to be given away to the poor, because of the new, to make room for it in their barns, which yet they would not pull down to build greater, as that rich fool, (Luke, 12. 18.) for God gave them this abundance to be laid out, not to be hoarded up from one year to another. He that withholdeth corn, the people shall curse him, Prov. 11. 26. That promise, (Mal. 3. 10.) I will pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it, explains this here, v. 10. And that which crowns this blessing of plenty, is, that (v. 5.) You shall eat your bread to the full; which intimates that they should have, not only abundance, but content and satisfaction in it. They should have enough, and should know when they had enough. Thus the meek shall eat and be satisfied, Ps. 22. 26.

2. Peace under the divine protection, v. 5. "Ye shall dwell in your land safely; both really safe, and safe in your own apprehensions; ye shall lie down to rest in the power and promise of God, and not only none shall hurt you, but none shall so much as make you afraid," v. 6. See Ps. 4. 8. They should not be infested with wild beasts, those should be rid out of the land, or, as it is promised, (Job, 5. 23.) should be at peace with them; nor should they be terrified with the alarms of war, neither shall the sword go through your land. This holy security is promised to all the faithful, Ps. 91. 1, &c. Those must needs dwell in safety that dwell in God, Job, 9. 13, 19.

3. Victory and success in their wars abroad, while they had peace and tranquillity at home, v. 7, 8. They are also assured that the hand of God should so signally appear with them in their conquests, that no disproportion of numbers should make against them: Five of you shall have courage to attack, and strength to chase and defeat, a hundred, as Jonathan did, (1 Sam. 14. 12.) experiencing the truth of his own maxim, (v. 6.) that it is all one with the Lord to save by many or by few.

4. The increase of their people. I will make you fruitful and multiply you, v. 9. Thus the promise made to Abraham must be fulfilled, that his seed should be as the dust of the earth; and much more numerous they would have been, if they had not by their sin cut themselves short. It is promised to the gospel-church, that it shall be fruitful, John, 15. 16.

5. The favour of God, which is the fountain of all good. I will have respect unto you, v. 9. If the eye of our faith be unto God, the eye of his favour will be unto us. More is implied than is expressed in that promise, My soul shall not abhor you, (v. 11.) as there is in that threatening, My soul shall have no pleasure in him, Heb. 10. 38. Though there was that among them which might justly have alienated him from them, yet, if they would closely adhere to his institutions, he would not abhor them.

6. Tokens of his presence in and by his ordinances; I will set my tabernacle among you, v. 11. It was their honour and advantage, that God's tabernacle was lately erected among them; but here he lets them know that the continuance and establishment of it depended upon their good behaviour. The tabernacle that was now set should be settled, if they would be obedient, else not. Note, The way to have God's ordinances fix among us, as a nail in a sure place, is to cleave closely to the institution of them. It is added, (v. 12.) "I will walk among you, with delight and satisfaction, as a man in his garden; I will keep up communion with you, as a man walking with his friend." This seems to be alluded to, (Rev. 2. 1.) where Christ is said to walk in the midst of the golden candlesticks.

7. The grace of the covenant, as the fountain and foundation, the sweetness and security, of all these blessings; I will establish my covenant with you, v. 9. Let them perform their part of the covenant, and God would not fail to perform his. All covenant-blessings are summed up in the covenant-relation, (v. 12.) I will be your God, and ye shall be my people; and they are all grounded upon their redemption, (v. 13.) I am your God, because I brought you forth out of the land of Egypt. Having purchased them, he would own them, and never cast them off till they cast him off. He broke their yoke, and made them go upright; that is, Their deliverance out of Egypt put them in a state both of ease and honour, that, being delivered out of the hands of their enemies, they might serve God without fear, each one walking in his uprightness. When Israel rejected Christ, and was therefore rejected by him, their back is said to be bowed down always under the burthen of their guilt, which was heavier than that of their bondage in Egypt, Rom. 11. 10.

14. But if ye will not hearken unto me, and will not do all these commandments; 15. And if ye shall despise my statutes, or if your soul abhor my judgments, so that ye will not do all my commandments, but that ye break my covenant: 16. I also will do this unto you; I will even appoint over you terror, consumption, and the burning ague, that shall consume the eyes, and cause sorrow of heart: and ye shall sow your seed in vain, for your enemies shall eat it. 17. And I will set my face against you, and ye shall be slain before your enemies: they that hate you shall reign over you; and ye shall flee when none pursueth you. 18. And if ye will not yet for all this hearken unto me, then I will punish you seven times more for your sins. 19. And I will break the pride of your power; and I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass: 20. And your strength shall be spent in vain: for your land shall not yield her increase, neither shall the trees of the land yield their fruits. 21. And if ye walk contrary unto me, and will not hearken unto me, I will bring seven times more plagues upon you, according to your sins. 22. I will also send wild beasts among you, which shall rob you of your children, and destroy your cattle, and make you few in number; and your high-ways shall be desolate. 23. And if ye will not be reformed by me by these things, but will walk contrary unto me; 24. Then will I also walk contrary unto you, and will punish you yet seven times for your sins. 25. And I will bring a sword upon you, that shall avenge the quarrel of my covenant; and when ye are gathered together within your cities, I will send the pestilence among you; and ye shall be delivered into the hand of the enemy. 26. And when I have broken the staff of your bread, ten women shall bake your bread in one oven, and they shall deliver you your bread again by weight: and ye shall eat, and not be satisfied. 27. And if ye will not for all this hearken unto me, but walk contrary unto me; 28.

Then I will walk contrary unto you also in fury; and I, even I, will chastise you seven times for your sins. 29. And ye shall eat the flesh of your sons, and the flesh of your daughters shall ye eat. 30. And I will destroy your high places, and cut down your images, and cast your carcases upon the carcases of your idols, and my soul shall abhor you. 31. And I will make your cities waste, and bring your sanctuaries unto desolation; and I will not smell the savour of your sweet odours. 32. And I will bring the land into desolation: and your enemies which dwell therein shall be astonished at it. 33. And I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you: and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste. 34. Then shall the land enjoy her sabbaths, as long as it lieth desolate, and ye be in your enemies' land; even then shall the land rest, and enjoy her sabbaths. 35. As long as it lieth desolate it shall rest; because it did not rest in your sabbaths, when ye dwelt upon it. 36. And upon them that are left alive of you I will send a faintness into their hearts in the lands of their enemies; and the sound of a shaken leaf shall chase them; and they shall flee, as fleeing from a sword; and they shall fall when none pursueth. 37. And they shall fall one upon another, as it were before a sword, when none pursueth: and ye shall have no power to stand before your enemies. 38. And ye shall perish among the heathen, and the land of your enemies shall eat you up. 39. And they that are left of you shall pine away in their iniquity in your enemies' lands; and also in the iniquities of their fathers shall they pine away with them.

After God had set the blessing before them, (the life and good which would make them a happy people if they would be obedient,) he here sets the curse before them, the death and evil which would make them as miserable, if they were disobedient. Let them not think themselves so deeply rooted as that God's power could not ruin them, or so highly favoured as that his justice would not ruin them, if they revolted from him, and rebelled against him; no, You only have I known, therefore I will punish you soonest and sorest, Amos, 3. 2.

Observe,

I. How their sin is described, which would bring all this misery upon them. Not sins of ignorance and infirmity, God had provided sacrifices for those; not the sins they repented of and forsook; but the sins that were presumptuously committed, and obstinately persisted in.

Two things would certainly bring this ruin upon them.

1. A contempt of God's commandments; (v. 14.) "If ye will not hearken to me speaking to you by the law, nor do all these commandments, that is, desire and endeavour to do them, and, wherein you miss it, make use of the prescribed remedies." Thus their sin is supposed to begin in mere carelessness, and neglect, and omission. These are bad enough, but they make way for worse; for the people are brought in, (v. 15.) as (1.) Despising God's statutes, both the duties enjoined, and the authority enjoining them, thinking meanly of the law and the Law-Maker. Note, These are hastening apace to their own ruin, who begin to think it below them to be religious. (2.) Abhorring his judgments, their very souls abhorring them. Note, They that begin to despise religion, will come by degrees to loathe it; and mean thoughts of it will ripen into ill thoughts of it; they that turn from it will turn against it, and their hearts rise at it. (3.) Breaking his covenant. Though every breach of the commandment does not amount to a breach of the covenant, we are undone if it did,) yet, when men are come to such a pitch of impiety as to despise and abhor the commandment, the next step will be to disown God, and all relation to him. They that reject the precept will come at last to renounce the covenant. Observe, It is God's covenant which they break: he made it, but they break it. Note, If a covenant be made and kept between God and man, God must have all the honour: but if ever it be broken, man must bear all the blame; on him shall this breach be.

2. A contempt of his corrections. Even their disobedience would not have been their destruction, if they had not been obstinate and impenitent in it, notwithstanding the methods God took to reclaim them. Their contempt of God's word would not have brought them to ruin, if they had not added to that a contempt of his rod, which would have brought them to repentance. Three ways this is expressed. (1.) "If ye will not for all this hearken to me, v. 18, 21, 27. If ye will not learn obedience by the things which ye suffer, but be as deaf to the loud alarms of God's judgments as ye have been to the close reasonings of his word, and the secret whispers of your own consciences, ye are obstinate indeed." (2.) "If ye will walk contrary to me, v. 21, 23, 27. All sinners walk contrary to God, to his truths, laws, and counsels; but those especially that are incorrigible under his judgments. The design of the rod is to humble them, and soften them, and bring them to repentance; but, instead of this, their hearts are more hardened and exasperated against God, and in their distress they trespass yet more against him, 2 Chron. 28. 22. This is walking contrary to God. Some read it, "If ye walk at all adventures with me, carelessly and presumptuously, as if ye heeded not either what ye do, whether it be right or wrong, or what God does with you, whether it be for you or against you, blundering on in wilful ignorance." (3.) "If ye will not be reformed by these things. God's design in punishing is to reform, by giving men sensible convictions of the evil of sin, and obliging them to seek unto him for relief: this is the primary intention; but those that will not be reformed by the judgments of God must expect to be ruined by them. Those have a great deal to answer for, that have been long and often under God's correcting hand, and yet go on frowardly in a sinful way; sick and in pain, and yet not reformed; crossed and impoverished, and yet not reformed; broken with breach upon breach, yet not returning to the Lord, Amos, 4. 6, &c.

II. How the misery is described, which their sin would bring upon them, under two heads.

1. God himself would be against them; and this is the root and cause of all their misery. (1.) I will set my face against you; (v. 17.) that is, "I will set my face against you, set myself to ruin you." These proud sinners God will resist, and face those down that confront his authority. Or, the face is put for the anger; "I will shew myself highly displeased at you." (2.) I will walk contrary to you; (v. 24, 28.) with the froward he will wrestle, Ps. 28. 26. [marginal reading.] When God in his providence thwarts the designs of a people, which they thought well-laid, crosses their purposes, breaks their measures, blasts their endeavours, and disappoints their expectations, then he walks contrary to them. Note, There is nothing got by striving with God Almighty, for he will break either the heart or the neck of those that contend with him; will bring them either to repentance or ruin. "I will walk at all adventures with you," so some read; "all covenant loving-kindness shall be forgotten, and I will leave you to common providence." Note, Those that cast God off, deserve that he should cast them off. (3.) As they continued obstinate, the judgments should increase yet more upon them. If the first sensible tokens of God's displeasure do not attain their end, to humble and reform them, then (v. 18.) I will punish you seven times more, and again, (v. 21.) I will bring seven times more plagues, and (v. 24.) I will vanish you yet seven times, and (v. 28.) I, even I, will chastise you seven times for your sins. Note, If lesser judgments do not do their work, God will send greater; for when he judges, he will overcome. If true repentance do not stay process, it will go on till execution be taken out. Those that are obstinate and incorrigible, when they have weathered one storm, must expect another more violent; and how severely soever they are punished, till they are in hell, they must still say, "There is worse behind," unless they repent. If the founder have hitherto melted in vain, (Jer. 6. 29.) the furnace will be heated seven times hotter, (a proverbial expression, used Dan. 3. 19.) and again and again seven times hotter; and who among us can dwell with such devouring fire? God does not begin with the sorest judgments, to shew that he is patient, and delights not in the death of sinners; but, if they repent not, he will proceed to the sorest, to shew that he is righteous, and that he will not be mocked or set at defiance. (4.) Their misery is completed in that threatening, (v. 30.) My soul shall abhor you. That man is as miserable as he can be, whom God abhors; for his re-entments are just and effective. Thus, if any man draw back, as these are supposed to do, God's soul shall have no pleasure in him, (Heb. 10. 38.) and he will spue them out of his mouth, Rev. 3. 16. It is spoken of as strange, and yet too true, Hath thy soul loathed Zion? Jer. 14. 19.

2. The whole creation would be at war with them. All God's sore judgments would be sent against them; for he hath many arrows in his quiver. The threatenings here are very particular, because really they were prophecies; and he, that foresaw all their rebellions, knew they would prove so; see Deut. 31. 16, 29. This long roll of threatening shews that evil pursues sinners.

We have here, (1.) Temporal judgments threatened.

[1.] Diseases of body, which should be epidemical; (v. 16.) I will appoint over you, as task-masters to rule you with rigour, terror, consumption, and the burning ague. What we translate terror, some think, signifies a particular disease, probably, (says the learned Bishop Patrick,) the falling sickness, which is terror indeed: all chronical diseases are included in the consumption, and all acute diseases in the burning ague or fever. These consume the eyes, and cause sorrow both to those that are visited with them, and to their friends and relations. Note, All diseases are God's servants, and do what he appoints them, and are often used as scourges wherewith he chastises a provoking people. The pestilence is threatened (v. 25.) to meet them, when they are gathered together in their cities for fear of the sword. And the greater the concourse of people is, the greater desolation does the pestilence make; and when it gets among the soldiers, that should defend a place, it is of most fatal consequence.

[2.] Famine and scarcity of bread, which should be brought upon them several ways; as, First, By plunder, v. 16. Your enemies shall eat it up, and carry it off, as the Midianites did, Judg. 6. 5, 6. Secondly, By unseasonable weather, especially the want of rain; (v. 19.) I will make your heaven as iron, letting fall no rain, but reflecting heat, and then the earth would of course be as dry and hard as brass; and their labour in ploughing and sowing would be in vain, v. 20. For the increase of the earth depends upon God's good providence more than upon man's good husbandry. This should be the breaking of the staff of bread, (v. 26.) which life leans upon, and is supported by, on which perhaps they had leaned more than upon God's blessing. There should be so great a dearth of corn, that, whereas every family used to fill an oven of their own with household-bread, now ten families should have to fill but one oven; which would bring themselves, and their children, and servants, to short allowance, so that they should eat and not be satisfied. The less they had, the more craving should their appetites be. Thirdly, By the besieging of their cities; for that certainly would reduce them to such an extremity, that they should eat the flesh of their sons and daughters, v. 29.

[3.] War, and the prevalency of their enemies over them; "Ye shall be slain before your enemies, v. 17. Your choice men shall die in battle, and they that hate you shall reign over you, and justly, since you are not willing that the God that loved you should reign over you," 2 Chron. 12. 8. Miserable is that people whose enemies are their rulers, and have got dominion over them; or whose rulers are become their enemies, and under-hand seek the ruin of their interests. Thus God would break the pride of their power, v. 19. God had given them power over the nations; but when they, instead of being thankful for that power, and improving it for the service of God's kingdom, grew proud of it, and perverted the intentions of it, it was just with God to break it. Thus God would bring a sword upon them to avenge the quarrel of his covenant, v. 25. Note, God has a just quarrel with those that break covenant with him, for he will not be mocked by the treachery of perfidious men; and one way or other he will avenge this quarrel upon those that play at fast and loose with him.

[4.] Wild beasts, lions, and bears, and wolves, which should increase upon them, and tear in pieces all that came in their way, (v. 22.) as we read of two bears that in an instant killed forty-two children, 2 Kings, 2. 24. This is one of the four sore judgments threatened, (Ezek. 14. 21.) which plainly refers to this chapter. Man was made to have dominion over the creatures, and though many of them are stronger than he, yet none of them could have hurt him, nay all of them should have served him, if he had not first shaken off God's dominion, and so lost his own; and now the creatures are in rebellion against him that is in rebellion against his Maker, and, when the Lord of those hosts pleases, they are the executioners of his wrath, and ministers of his justice.

[5.] Captivity, or dispersion; I will scatter you among the heathen, (v. 33.) in your enemies' land, v. 34. Never were more people so incorporated and united among themselves as they were; but for their sin God would scatter them, so that they should be lost among the heathen from whom God had graciously distinguished them; but with whom they had wickedly mingled themselves. Yet, when they were scattered, Divine Justice had not done with them, but would draw out a sword after them, which would find them out, and follow them wherever they were. God's judgments, as they cannot be outfaced, so they cannot be outrun.

[6.] The utter ruin and desolation of their land; which should be so remarkable, that their very enemies themselves, who had helped it forward, should in the review be astonished at it, v. 32. First, Their cities should be waste, forsaken, uninhabited, and all the buildings destroyed; those that escaped the desolations of war, should fall to decay of themselves. Secondly, Their sanctuaries should be a desolation, that is, their synagogues, where they met for religious worship every sabbath, as well as their tabernacle, where they met thrice a year. Thirdly, The country itself should be desolate, not tilled or husbanded, (v. 34, 35.) then the land should enjoy its sabbaths, because they had not religiously observed the sabbatical years which God appointed them. They tilled their ground when God would have them let it rest, justly therefore were they driven out of it: and the expression intimates that the ground itself was pleased and easy, when it was rid of the burthen of such sinners, under which it had groaned, Rom. 8. 20, &c. The captivity in Babylon lasted seventy years, and so long the land enjoyed her sabbaths, as is said (2 Chron. 36. 21.) with reference to this here.

[7.] The destruction of their idols, though rather a mercy than a judgment, yet being a necessary piece of justice, is here mentioned, to shew what would be the sin that would bring all these miseries upon them; (v. 30.) I will destroy your high-places. Those that will not be parted from their sins by the commands of God, shall be parted from them by his judgments; since they would not destroy their high-places, God would. And, to upbraid them with the unreasonable fondness they had shewed for their idols, it is foretold that their carcasses should be cast upon the carcasses of their idols. They that are wedded to their lusts, sooner or later will have enough of them. Their idols would not be able to help either themselves or their worshippers; but, they that made them being like unto them, both should perish alike, and fall together as blind into the ditch.

(2.) Spiritual judgments are here threatened, which should seize the mind; for he that made that, can, when he pleases, make his sword approach to it.

It is here threatened, [1.] That they should find no acceptance with God; (v. 31.) I will not smell the savour of your sweet odours. Though the judgments of God upon them did not part between them and their sins, yet they extorted incense from them; but in vain, even their incense was an abomination, Isa. I. 13.

[2.] That they should have no courage in their wars, but should be quite dispirited and disheartened. They should not only fear and flee, (v. 17.) but fear and fall, when none pursued, v. 36. A guilty conscience would be their continual terror, so that not only the sound of a trumpet, but the very sound of a leaf, should chase them. Note, Those that cast off the fear of God expose themselves to the fear of every thing else, Prov. 28. 1. Their very fears should dash them one against another, v. 37, 38. And they that had increased one another's guilt, would now increase one another's fears.

[3.] That they should have no hope of the forgiveness of their sins; (v. 39.) They shall pine away in their iniquity, and how should they then live? Ezek. 33. 10. Note, It is a righteous thing with God to leave those to despair of pardon that have presumed to sin; and it is owing to free grace, if we are not abandoned to pine away in the iniquity we were born in, and have lived in.

40. If they shall confess their iniquity, and the iniquity of their fathers, with their trespass which they trespassed against me, and that also they have walked contrary unto me; 41. And that I also have walked contrary unto them, and have brought them into the land of their enemies; if then their uncircumcised hearts be humbled, and they then accept of the punishment of their iniquity: 42. Then will I remember my covenant with Jacob, and also my covenant with Isaac, and also my covenant with Abraham will I remember; and I will remember the land. 43. The land also shall be left of them, and shall enjoy her sabbaths, while she lieth desolate without them: and they shall accept of the punishment of their iniquity: because, even because they despised my judgments, and because their soul abhorred my statutes. 44. And yet for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them away, neither will I abhor them, to destroy them utterly, and to break my covenant with them: for I am the LORD their God. 45. But I will for their sakes remember the covenant of their ancestors, whom I brought forth out of the land of Egypt, in the sight of the heathen, that I might be their God: I am the LORD. 46. These are the statutes, and judgments, and laws, which the LORD made between him and the children of Israel in mount Sinai, by the hand of Moses.

Here the chapter concludes with gracious promises of the return of God's favour to them upon their repentance, that they might not (unless it were their own fault) pine away in their iniquity. Behold, with wonder, the riches of God's mercy to a people that had obstinately stood it out against the judgments of God, and would never think of surrendering till they were reduced to the last extremity. Yet turn you to the strong-hold, ye prisoners of hope, Zech. 9. 12. As bad as things are, they may be mended. Yet there is hope in Israel

Observe,

I. How the repentance is described which would qualify them for this mercy, v. 40, 41. The instances of it are three. 1. Confession, by which they must give glory to God, and take shame to themselves. There must be a confession of sin; their own, and their fathers', which they must lament the guilt of, because they feel the smart of it; that thus they may cut off the entail of wrath: they must in their confession put sin under its worst character, as walking contrary to God; that is the sinfulness of sin, the worst thing in it, and which in our repentance we should especially bewail. There must also be a confession of wrath; they must overlook the instruments of their trouble and the second causes, and confess that God has walked contrary to them, and so dealt with them according to their sins. Such a confession as this we find made by Daniel just before the dawning of the day of their deliverance, (ch. 9.) and the like, Ezra, 9. and Neh. 9. 2. Remorse and godly sorrow for sin; If their uncircumcised heart be humbled. An impenitent, unbelieving, unhumiliated, heart, is called an uncircumcised heart, the heart of a Gentile, that is a stranger to God, rather than the heart of an Israelite in covenant with him. True circumcision is of the heart, (Rom. 2. 29.) without which the circumcision of the flesh availeth nothing, Jer. 9. 26. Now in repentance this uncircumcised heart was humbled, that is, it was truly broken and contrite for sin. Note, An humble heart under humbling providences prepares for deliverance and true comfort. 3. Submission to the justice of God in all his dealings; if they then accept of the punishment of their iniquity, (v. 41. and again, v. 43.) that is, if they justify God and condemn themselves, patiently bear the punishment as that which they have well-deserved, and carefully answer the ends of it as that which God has well-designed, accept it as a kindness, take it as physic, and improve it, then they are penitents indeed.

II. How the mercy is described, which they should obtain upon their repentance. 1. They should not be abandoned; Though they have despised my judgments, yet for all that I will not cast them away, v. 43, 44. He speaks as a tender Father that cannot find in his heart to disinherit a son that has been very provoking, How shall I do it? Hos. 11. 8. 9. Till he had laid the foundations of a church for himself in the Gentile world, the Jewish church was not quite forsaken, nor cast away. 2. They should be remembered: I will remember the land with favour, which is grounded upon the promise before; I will remember my covenant, (v. 42.) which is repeated, v. 45. God is said to remember the covenant, when he performs the promises of it, purely for his faithfulness' sake; not because there is any thing in us to recommend us to his favour, but because he will be as good as his word. This is the church's plea; (Ps. 74. 20.) Have respect unto the covenant. He will remember the constitution of the covenant, which is such as leaves room for repentance, and promises pardon upon repentance; and the Mediator of the covenant, who was promised to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and was sent, when the fulness of time came, in remembrance of that holy covenant. The word covenant is thrice repeated, to intimate that God is ever mindful of it, and would have us to be so. The persons also with whom the covenant was made are mentioned in an unusual manner, per modum ascensus—in the ascending line, beginning with Jacob, to lead them gradually to the most ancient promise, which was made to the father of the faithful: thus (Mic. 7. 20.) he is said to perform the truth to Jacob, and the mercy to Abraham. He will for their sakes, (v. 45.) not their merit's sake, but their benefit's sake, remember the covenant of their ancestors, and upon that score shew kindness to them, though most unworthy; they are therefore said to be, as touching the election, beloved for the fathers' sakes, Rom. 11. 28. Note, When those that have walked contrary to God in a way of sin, return to him by sincere repentance, though he has walked contrary to them in a way of judgment, he will return to them in a way of special mercy, pursuant to the covenant of redemption and grace. None are so ready to repent as God is to forgive, upon repentance, through Christ, who is given for a Covenant.

Lastly, These are said to be the laws which the Lord made between him and the children of Israel, v. 46. His communion with his church is kept up by his law. He manifests not only his dominion over them, but his favour to them, by giving them his law and they manifest not only their holy fear, but their holy love, by the observance of it; and thus it is made between them, rather as a covenant than a law; for he draws with the cords of a man.

CHAP. XXVII.

The last verse of the foregoing chapter seemed to close up this statute-book, yet this chapter is added as an appendix: having given laws concerning instituted services, here he directs concerning vows and voluntary services, the freewill-offerings of their mouth. Perhaps some devout serious people among them might be so affected with what Moses had delivered to them in the foregoing chapter, as in a pang of zeal to consecrate themselves or their children or estates to him: this, because honestly meant, God would accept of; but, because men are apt to repent of such vows, he leaves room for the redemption of what had been so consecrated, at a certain rate. Here is, I. The law concerning what was sanctified to God; persons, v. 2..8. Cattle, clean or unclean, v. 9..13. Houses and lands, v. 14..25. With an exception of firstlings, v. 26, 27. II. Concerning what was devoted, v. 28, 29. III. Concerning tithes, v. 30..34.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When a man shall make a singular vow, the persons shall be for the LORD by thy estimation. 3. And thy estimation shall be of the male from twenty years old even unto sixty years old, even thy estimation shall be fifty shekels of silver, after the shekel of the sanctuary. 4. And if it be a female, then thy estimation shall be thirty shekels. 5. And if it be from five years old even unto twenty years old, then thy estimation shall be of the male twenty shekels, and for the female ten shekels. 6. And if it be from a month old even unto five years old, then thy estimation shall be of the male five shekels of silver, and for the female thy estimation shall be three shekels of silver. 7. And if it be from sixty years old and above; if it be a male, then thy estimation shall be fifteen shekels, and for the female ten shekels. 8. But if he be poorer than thy estimation, then he shall present himself before the priest, and the priest shall value him; according to his ability that vowed shall the priest value him. 9. And if it be a beast, whereof men bring an offering unto the LORD, all that any man giveth of such unto the LORD shall be holy. 10. He shall not alter it, nor change it, a good for a bad, or a bad for a good: and if he shall at all change beast for beast, then it and the exchange thereof shall be holy. 11. And if it be any unclean beast, of which they do not offer a sacrifice unto the LORD, then he shall present the beast before the priest: 12. And the priest shall value it, whether it be good or bad: as thou valuest it, who art the priest, so shall it be. 13. But if he will at all redeem it, then he shall add a fifth part thereof unto thy estimation.

This is part of the law concerning singular vows, extraordinary ones, which though God did not expressly insist on, yet if they were consistent with, and conformable to, the general precepts, he would be well-pleased with. Note, We should not only ask What must we do, but, What may we do, for the glory and honour of God? As the liberal devises liberal things, (Isa. 32. 8.) so the pious devises pious things, and the enlarged heart would willingly do something extraordinary in the service of so good a Master as God is. When we receive or expect some singular mercy, it is good to honour God with some singular vow.

I. The case is here put of persons vowed to God by a singular vow, v. 2. If a man consecrated himself, or a child, to the service of the tabernacle, to be employed there in some inferior office, as sweeping the floor, carrying out ashes, running of errands, or the like, the person so consecrated shall be for the Lord, that is, "God will graciously accept the good-will;" that is, Thou didst well that it was in thine heart, (2 Chron. 6. 8.) but, forasmuch as he had no occasion to use their service about the tabernacle, a whole tribe being appropriated to the use of it, those that were thus vowed were to be redeemed, and the money paid for their redemption was employed for the repair of the sanctuary, or other uses of it; as appears by 2 Kings, 12. 4. where it is called, in the margin, the money of the souls of his estimation.

A book of rates is accordingly provided here, by which the priests were to go in their estimation. Here is, 1. The rate of the middle-aged between twenty and threescore, these were valued highest, because most serviceable; a male fifty shekels, and the female thirty, v. 3, 4. The females were then less esteemed, but not so in Christ; for in Christ Jesus there is neither male nor female, Gal. 3. 28. Note, Those that are in the prime of their time, must look upon themselves as obliged to do more in the service of God and their generation, than can be expected either from minors that are not yet arrived to their usefulness, or from the aged that have survived it. 2. The rate of the youth between five years old and twenty, was less, because they were then less capable of doing service, v. 5. 3. Infants under five years old were capable of being vowed to God by their parents, even before they were born, as Samuel was, but not to be presented and redeemed till a month old; that, as one sabbath passed over them before they were circumcised, so one new moon might pass over them before they were estimated; and their valuation was but small, v. 6. Samuel, who was thus vowed to God, was not redeemed, because he was a Levite, and a particular favourite, and therefore was employed in his childhood in the service of the tabernacle. 4. The aged are valued less than youth, but more than children, v. 7. And the Hebrews observe, that the rate of an aged woman is two parts of three to that of an aged man, so that in that age the female came nearest to the value of a male, which occasioned (as Bishop Patrick quotes it here) this saying among them, That an old woman in a house is a treasure in a house. St. Paul sets a great value upon the aged woman, when he makes them teachers of good things, Tit. 2. 3. 5. The poor shall be valued according to their ability, v. 8. Something they must pay, that they might learn not to be rash in vowing to God, for he hath no pleasure in fools, Eccl. 5. 4. Yet not more than their ability, but secundum tenementum—according to their possessions, that they might not ruin themselves and their families by their zeal. Note, God expects and requires from men according to what they have, and not according to what they have not, Luke, 21. 4.

II. The case is put of beasts vowed to God. 1. If it was a clean beast, such as was offered in sacrifice, it must not be redeemed, nor any equivalent given for it; it shall be holy; (v. 9, 10.) after it was vowed, it was not to be put to any common use, nor changed upon second thoughts; but it must be either offered upon the altar, or, if through any blemish it was not meet to be offered, he that vowed it should not take advantage of that, but the priests should have it for their own use, (for they were God's receivers,) or it should be sold for the service of the sanctuary. This teaches caution in making vows, and constancy in keeping them when they are made; for it is a snare to a man to devour that which is holy, and after vows to make inquiry, Prov. 20. 25. And to this that rule of charity seems to allude, (2 Cor. 9. 7.) Every man according as he purposes in his heart, so let him give. 2. If it was an unclean beast, it should go to the use of the priest at such a value: but he that vowed it, upon paying that value in money.

and adding a fifth part more to it, might redeem it, if he pleased, v. 11. . 13. It was fit that men should smart for their inconstancy. God has let us know his mind concerning his service, and he is not pleased, if we do not know our own. God expects that those that deal with him should be at a point, and say what they will stand to.

14. And when a man shall sanctify his house to be holy unto the LORD, then the priest shall estimate it, whether it be good or bad: as the priest shall estimate it, so shall it stand. 15. And if he that sanctified it will redeem his house, then he shall add the fifth part of the money of thy estimation unto it, and it shall be his. 16. And if a man shall sanctify unto the LORD some part of a field of his possession, then thy estimation shall be according to the seed thereof: an homer of barley-seed shall be valued at fifty shekels of silver. 17. If he sanctify his field from the year of jubilee, according to thy estimation it shall stand. 18. But if he sanctify his field after the jubilee, then the priest shall reckon unto him the money according to the years that remain, even unto the year of the jubilee, and it shall be abated from thy estimation. 19. And if he that sanctified the field will in any wise redeem it, then he shall add the fifth part of the money of thy estimation unto it, and it shall be assured to him. 20. And if he will not redeem the field, or if he have sold the field to another man, it shall not be redeemed any more. 21. But the field, when it goeth out in the jubilee, shall be holy unto the LORD, as a field devoted; the possession thereof shall be the priest's. 22. And if a man sanctify unto the LORD a field which he hath bought, which is not of the fields of his possession; 23. Then the priest shall reckon unto him the worth of thy estimation, even unto the year of the jubilee: and he shall give thine estimation in that day, as a holy thing unto the LORD. 24. In the year of the jubilee the field shall return unto him of whom it was bought, even to him to whom the possession of the land did belong. 25. And all thy estimations shall be according to the shekel of the sanctuary: twenty gerahs shall be the shekel.

Here is the law concerning real estates dedicated to the service of God by a singular vow.

I. Suppose a man, in his zeal for the honour of God, sanctify his house to God, (v. 14.) the house must be valued by the priest, and the money got by the sale of it was to be converted to the use of the sanctuary, which by degrees came to be greatly enriched with dedicated things, 1 Kings, 15. 15. But, if the owner be minded to redeem it himself, he must not have it so cheap as another, but must add a fifth part to the price, for he should have considered before he had vowed it, v. 15. To him that was necessitous, God would abate of the estimation of himself; (v. 8.) but to him that was fickle and humoursome, and whose second thoughts inclined more to the world and his secular interest than his first, God would rise in the price. Blessed be God, there is a way of sanctifying our houses to be holy unto the Lord, without either selling them, or buying them. If we and our houses serve the Lord, if religion rule in them, and we put away iniquity far from them, and have a church in our house, holiness to the Lord is written upon it, it is his, and he will dwell with us in it.

II. Suppose a man sanctify some part of his land to the Lord, giving it to pious uses, then a difference must be made between land that came to the donor by descent, and that which came by purchase, and accordingly the case altered.

1. If it was the inheritance of his fathers, here called the field of his possession, which pertained to his family from the first division of Canaan, he might not give it all, no not to the sanctuary; God would not admit such a degree of zeal as ruined a man's family. But he might sanctify or dedicate only some part of it, v. 16. And in that case, (1.) The land was to be valued (as our countrymen commonly compute land) by so many measures sowing of barley. So much land as would take a homer, or chomer, of barley, which contained ten ephahs, Ezek. 45. 11. (not, as some have here mistaken it, an omer, which was but a tenth part of an ephah, Exod. 16. 36.) was valued at fifty shekels, a moderate price, (v. 16.) and that, if it were sanctified immediately from the year of jubilee, v. 17. But if some years after, there was to be a discount accordingly, even of that price, v. 18. And, (2.) When the value was fixed, the donor might, if he pleased, redeem it for sixty shekels, the homer's sowing, which was with the addition of a fifth part: the money then went to the sanctuary, and the land reverted to him that had sanctified it, v. 19. But if he would not redeem it, and the priest sold it to another, then at the year of jubilee, beyond which the sale could not go, the land came to the priests, and was their's for ever, v. 20, 21. Note, What is given to the Lord ought not to be given with a power of revocation: what is devoted to the Lord must be his for ever by a perpetual covenant.

2. If the land was his own purchase, and came not to him from his ancestors, then not the land itself, but the value of it, was to be given to the priests for pious uses, v. 22. . 24. It was supposed that those who, by the blessing of God, were grown so rich as to become purchasers, would think themselves obliged in gratitude to sanctify some part of the purchase, at least, (and here they are not limited, but they might, if they pleased, sanctify the whole,) to the service of God. For we ought to give as God prospers us, 1 Cor. 16. 2. Purchasers are in a special manner bound to be charitable. Now, forasmuch as purchased lands were by a former law to return at the year of jubilee to the family from which they were purchased, God would not have that law and the intentions of it defeated, by making the lands Corban, a gift, Mark, 7. 11. But it was to be computed how much the land was worth for so many years as were from the vow to the jubilee, for only so long it was his own; and God hates robbery for burnt-offerings, and we can never acceptably serve God with that which we have wronged our neighbour of. And so much money he was to give for the present, and keep the land in his own hands till the year of jubilee, when it was to return free of all encumbrances, even that of its being dedicated to him of whom it was bought. The value of the shekel, by which all these estimations were to be made, is here ascertained, (v. 25.) it shall be twenty gerahs, and every gerah was sixteen barley-corns. This was fixed before, (Exod. 30. 13.) and whereas there had been some alterations, it is again fixed in the laws of Ezekiel's visionary temple, (Ezek. 45. 12.) to denote that the gospel should reduce things to their ancient standard.

26. Only the firstling of the beasts, which should be the LORD's firstling, no man shall sanctify it; whether it be ox or sheep: it is the LORD's. 27. And if it be of an unclean beast, then he shall redeem it according to thine estimation, and shall add a fifth part of it thereto: or if it be not redeemed, then it shall be sold according to thy estimation. 28. Notwithstanding, no devoted thing, that a man shall devote unto the LORD, of all that he hath, both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession, shall be sold or redeemed: every devoted thing is most holy unto the LORD. 29. None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death. 30. And all the tithe of the land, whether of the seed of the land, or of the fruit of the tree, is the LORD's: it is holy unto the LORD. 31. And if a man will at all redeem aught of his tithes, he shall add thereto the fifth part thereof. 32. And concerning the tithe of the herd, or of the flock, even of whatsoever passeth under the rod, the tenth shall be holy unto the LORD. 33. He shall not search whether it be good or bad, neither shall he change it: and if he change it at all, then both it and the change thereof shall be holy; it shall not be redeemed. 34. These are the commandments which the LORD commanded Moses, for the children of Israel, in mount Sinai.

Here is,

I. A caution given that no man should make such a jest of sanctifying things to the Lord, as to sanctify any firstling to him, for that was his already by the law, v. 26. Though the matter of a general vow be that which we were before obliged to, as of our sacramental covenant; yet a singular vow should be of that which we were not, in such circumstances and proportions, antecedently bound to. The law concerning the firstlings of unclean beasts (v. 27.) is the same with that before, v. 11, 12.

II. Things or persons devoted are here distinguished from things or persons that were only sanctified. 1. Devoted things were most holy to the Lord, and could neither revert, nor be alienated, v. 28. They were of the same nature with those sacrifices which were called most holy, which none might touch but only the priests themselves. The difference between these and other sanctified things arose from the different expression of the vow. If a man dedicated any thing to God, binding himself with a solemn curse never to alienate it to any other purpose, then it was a thing devoted. 2. Devoted persons were to be put to death, v. 29. Not that it was in the power of any parent or master thus to devote a child or a servant to death; but it must be meant of the public enemies of Israel, who, either by the appointment of God, or by the sentence of the congregation, were devoted, as the seven nations with which they must make no league. The city of Jericho in particular was thus devoted, Josh. 6. 17. The inhabitants of Jabesh-Gilead were put to death for violating the curse pronounced upon those that came not up to Mizpeh, Judg. 21. 9, 10. Some think it was for want of being rightly informed of the true intent and meaning of this law, that Jephtha sacrificed his daughter as one devoted, which might not be redeemed.

III. A law concerning tithes, which were paid for the service of God before the law; as appears by Abraham's payment of them, (Gen. 14. 19.) and Jacob's promise of them, Gen. 28. 22. It is here appointed, 1. That they should pay tithe of all their increase, their corn, trees, and cattle, v. 30, 32. Whatsoever productions they had the benefit of, God must be honoured with the tithe of, if it were titheable. Thus they acknowledge God to be the Owner of their land, the Giver of its fruits, and themselves to be his tenants, and dependents upon him. Thus they gave him thanks for the plenty they enjoyed, and supplicated his favour in the continuance of it. And we are taught in general to honour the Lord with our substance, (Prov. 3. 9.) and in particular to support and maintain his ministers, and to be ready to communicate to them, Gal. 6. 6.—1 Cor. 9. 11. And how this may be done in a fitter and more equal proportion than that of the tenth, which God himself appointed of old, I cannot see. 2. That which was once marked for tithe should not be altered, no not for a better, (v. 33.) for Providence directed the rod that marked them. God would accept it though it were not the best, and they must not grudge it though it was, for it was what passed under the rod. 3. That it should not be redeemed, unless the owner would give a fifth part more for its ransom, v. 31. If men had the curiosity to prefer what was marked for tithe before any other part of their increase, it was fit that they should pay for their curiosity.

The last verse seems to have reference to this whole book, which it is the conclusion of; These are the commandments which the Lord commanded Moses, for the children of Israel. Many of these commandments are moral, and of perpetual obligation; others of them ceremonial, and peculiar to the Jewish economy, which yet have a spiritual significancy, and are instructive to us who are furnished with a key to let us into the mysteries contained in them; for unto us, by those institutions, is the gospel preached as well as unto them, Heb. 4. 2. And, upon the whole matter, we may see cause to bless God that we are not to come to mount Sinai, Heb. 12. 18. (1.) That we are not under the dark shadows of the law, but enjoy the clear light of the gospel, which shews us Christ the end of the law for righteousness, Rom. 10. 4. The doctrine of our reconciliation to God by a Mediator is not clouded with the smoke of burning sacrifices, but cleared by the knowledge of Christ and him crucified. (2.) That we are not under the heavy yoke of the law, and the carnal ordinances of it, (as the apostle calls them, Heb. 9. 10.) imposed till the time of reformation, a yoke which neither they nor their fathers were able to bear, (Acts, 15. 10.) but under the sweet and easy institutions of the gospel, which pronounces those the true worshippers that worship the Father in spirit and truth, by Christ only, and in his name, who is our Priest, Temple, Altar, Sacrifice, Purification, and All. Let us not therefore think, that, because we are not tied to the ceremonial cleanings, feasts, and oblations, a little care, time, and expence, will serve to honour God with. No, but rather have our hearts more enlarged with freewill-offerings to his praise, more inflamed with holy love and joy, and more engaged in seriousness of thought, and sincerity of intention; having boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, let us draw near with a true heart, and in full assurance of faith, worshipping God with so much the more cheerfulness and humble confidence, still saying, Blessed be God for Jesus Christ.

 OF THE FOURTH BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED N U M B E R S.

The titles of the five books of Moses, which we use in our Bibles, are all borrowed from the Greek translation of the Seventy, the most ancient version of the Old Testament that we know of. But the title of this book only we turn into English; in all the rest we retain the Greek word itself; for which difference I know no reason, but that the Latin translators have generally done the same. Otherwise, this book might as well have been called Arithmoi, the Greek title, as the first Genesis, and the second Exodus; or these might as well have been translated and called, the first the Generation, or Original, the second the Out-let, or Escape, as this Numbers.—This book was thus entitled, because of the numbers of the children of Israel, so often mentioned in this book, and so well worthy to give a title to it, because it was the remarkable accomplishment of God's promise to Abraham, that his seed should be as the stars of heaven for multitude. It also relates to two numberings of them, one at mount Sinai, (ch. 1.) the other in the plains of Moab, thirty-nine years after, ch. 26. And not three men the same in the last account that were in the first. The book is almost equally divided between histories and laws, intermixed.

- I. We have here the histories of the numbering and marshalling of the tribes; (ch. 1. .4.) the dedication of the altar and Levites; (ch. 7, 8.) their march; (ch. 9, 10.) their murmuring and unbelief, for which they were sentenced to wander forty years in the wilderness; (ch. 11. .14.) the rebellion of Korah; (ch. 16, 17.) the history of the last year of the forty; (ch. 20. .26.) the conquest of Midian, and the settlement of the two tribes; (ch. 31, 32.) with an account of their journies, ch. 33.
- II. We have divers laws, about the Nazarites, &c.; (ch. 5, 6.) and again, about the priests' charge, &c.; (ch. 18, 19.) feasts, (ch. 28, 29.) and vows; (ch. 30.) and relating to their settlement in Canaan, ch. 27, 34, 35, 36. An abstract of much of this book we have in a few words, (Ps. 95. 10.) Forty years long was I grieved with this generation; and an application of it to ourselves, (Heb. 4. 1.) Let us fear lest we seem to come short. Many considerable nations there were now in being, that dwelt in cities and fortified towns, of which no notice is taken, no account kept, by the sacred history; but very exact records are kept of the affairs of a handful of people, that dwelt in tents, and wandered strangely in a wilderness, because they were the children of covenant: For the Lord's portion is his people, Jacob is the lot of his inheritance.

The Numbering of the Israelites.

CHAP. I.

Israel was now to be formed into a commonwealth, or a kingdom rather; for the Lord was their King, (1 Sam. 12. 12.) their government a theocracy, and Moses under him was King in Jeshurun, Deut. 33. 5. Now, for the right settlement of this holy state, next to the institution of good laws, was necessary the institution of good order; an account therefore must be taken of the subjects of this kingdom, which is done in this chapter; where we have, I. Orders given to Moses to number the people, v. 1. .4. II. Persons nominated to assist him herein, v. 5. .16. III. The particular number of each tribe, as it was given in to Moses, v. 17. .43. IV. The sum total of all together, v. 44. .46. V. An exception of the Levites, v. 47. .51.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, in the wilderness of Sinai, in the tabernacle of the congregation, on the first day of the second month, in the second year, after they were come out of the land of Egypt, saying, 2. Take ye the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel, after their families, by the house of their fathers, with the number of their names, every male by their polls; 3. From twenty years old and upward, all that are able to go forth to war in Israel: thou and Aaron shall number them by their armies. 4. And with you there shall be a man of every tribe; every one head of the house of his fathers. 5. And these are the names of the men that shall stand with you: Of the tribe of Reuben; Elizur the son of Shedeur. 6. Of Simeon; Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai

7. Of Judah; Nahshon the son of Amminadab. 8. Of Issachar; Nethaneel the son of Zuar. 9. Of Zebulun; Eliab the son of Helon. 10. Of the children of Joseph: Of Ephraim; Elishama the son of Ammiud: Of Manasseh; Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur. 11. Of Benjamin; Abidan the son of Gideoni. 12. Of Dan; Abiezer the son of Ammishaddai. 13. Of Asher; Pagiel the son of Ocran. 14. Of Gad; Eliasaph the son of Deuel. 15. Of Naphtali; Ahirah the son of Enan. 16. These were the renowned of the congregation, princes of the tribes of their fathers, heads of thousands in Israel.

Here is a commission issued out for the numbering of the people of Israel; and David, long after, paid dear for doing it without a commission. Here is,

I. The date of this commission, v. 1. 1. The place; it is given at God's court, in the wilderness of Sinai; from his royal palace, the tabernacle of the congregation. 2. The time; in the second year after they came up out of Egypt; we may call it the second year of that reign. The laws in Leviticus were given in the first month of that year; these orders were given in the beginning of the second month.

II. The directions given for the execution of it, v. 2, 3. 1. None were to be numbered but the males, and those only such as were fit for war. None under twenty years old; for though some such might have bulk and strength enough for military service, yet, in compassion to their tender years, God would not have them put upon it to bear arms. 2. Nor were any to be numbered, who, through age, or bodily infirmity, blindness, lameness, or chronic diseases, were unfit for war. The church being militant, those only are reputed the true members of it that have listed themselves soldiers of Jesus Christ; for our life, our Christian life, is a warfare. 3. The account was to be taken according to their families, that it might not only be known how many they were, and what were their names, but of what tribe, and family, or clan; nay, of what particular house every person was; or, reckoning it the muster of an army, to what regiment every man belonged, that he might know his place himself, and the government might know where to find him. They were numbered a little before this, when their poll-money was paid for the service of the tabernacle, Exod. 38. 25, 26. But it should seem they were not then registered by the house of their fathers, as now they were. Their number was the same then that it was now, Six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty men, for as many as had died since then, and were lost in the account, so many were arrived to be twenty years old, and were added to the account. Note, As one generation passeth away, another generation cometh. As vacancies are daily made, so recruits are daily raised to fill up the vacancies, and Providence takes care that, one time or other, in one place or other, the births shall balance the burials, and the race of mankind and the holy seed may not be cut off and extinct.

III. Commissioners are named for the doing of this work. Moses and Aaron were to preside, (v. 3.) and one man of every tribe, that was renowned in his tribe, and was presumed to know it well, was to assist in it: the princes of the tribe, v. 16. Note, Those that are honourable should study to be serviceable; he that is great, let him be your minister, and shew, by his knowing the public, that he deserves to be publicly known. The charge of this muster was committed to him who was the lord-lieutenant of that tribe.

Now, why was this account ordered to be taken and kept? For several reasons. 1. To prove the accomplishment of the promise made to Abraham, that God would multiply his seed exceedingly; which promise was renewed to Jacob, (Gen. 28. 14.) that his seed should be as the dust of the earth; now it appears that there did not fail one tittle of that good promise, which was an encouragement to them to hope that the other promise of the land of Canaan for an inheritance should also be fulfilled in its season. When the number of a body of men is only guessed at, upon the view, it is easy for one, that is disposed to cavil, to surmise that the conjecture is mistaken, and that, if they were to be counted, they would not be found half so many; therefore God would have Israel numbered, that it might be upon record how vastly they were increased in a little time; that the power of God's providence, and the truth of his promise, may be seen and acknowledged by all. It could not have been expected, in any ordinary course of nature, that seventy-five souls (which was the number of Jacob's family when he went down into Egypt) should in 215 years (and it was no longer) multiply into so many hundred thousands. It is therefore to be attributed to an extraordinary virtue in the divine promise and blessing. 2. It was to intimate the particular care which God himself would take of his Israel, and expected that Moses and the inferior rulers should take of them. God is called the Shepherd of Israel: (Ps. 80. 1.) now the shepherds always kept count of their flocks, and delivered them by number to their under-shepherds, that they might know if any were missing; in like manner, God numbers his flock, that of all which he took into his fold he might lose none, but upon a valuable consideration, even those that were sacrificed to his justice. 3. It was to put a difference between the true-born Israelites and the mixed multitude that were among them; none were numbered but Israelites; all the world is but lumber in comparison with those jewels. Little account is made of others, but the saints God has a particular property in, and concern for: The Lord knows them that are his, (2 Tim. 2. 19.) knows them by name, Phil. 4. 3. The hairs of their head are numbered; but he will say to others, "I never knew you, never made any account of you." 4. It was in order to their being marshalled into several districts, for the more easy administration of justice, and their more regular march through the wilderness. It is a rout and a rabble, not an army, that is not mustered and put in order.

17. And Moses and Aaron took these men which are expressed by their names: 18. And they assembled all the congregation together on the first day of the second month, and they declared their pedigrees after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, by their polls. 19. As the LORD commanded Moses, so he numbered them in the wilderness of Sinai. 20. And the children of Reuben, Israel's eldest son, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, by their polls, every male from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; 21. Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Reuben, were forty and six thousand and five hundred. 22. Of the children of Simeon, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, those that were numbered of them, according to the number of the names, by their polls, every male from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; 23. Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Simeon, were fifty and nine thousand and three hundred. 24. Of the children of Gad, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; 25. Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Gad, were forty and five thousand six hundred and fifty. 26. Of the children of Judah, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; 27. Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Judah, were threescore and fourteen thousand and six hundred. 28. Of the children of Issachar, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; 29. Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Issachar, were fifty and four thousand and four hundred. 30. Of the children of Zebulun, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; 31. Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Zebulun, were fifty and seven thousand and four hundred. 32. Of the children of Joseph, namely, of the children of Ephraim, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; 33. Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Ephraim, were forty thousand and five hundred. 34. Of the children of Manasseh, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; 35. Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Manasseh, were thirty and two thousand and two hundred. 36. Of the children of Benjamin, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; 37. Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Benjamin, were thirty and five thousand and four hundred. 38. Of the children of Dan, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; 39. Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Dan, were threescore and two thousand and seven hundred. 40. Of the children of Asher, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war. 41. Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Asher, were forty and one thousand and five hundred. 42. Of the children of Naphtali, throughout their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; 43. Those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Naphtali, were fifty and three thousand and four hundred.

We have here the speedy execution of the orders given for the numbering of the people. It was begun the same day that the orders were given, The first day of the second month; compare v. 18. with v. 1. Note, When any work is to be done for God, it is good to set about it quickly, while the sense of duty is strong and pressing. And, for aught that appears, it was but one day's work, for many other things were done between this and the 20th day of this month, when they removed their camp, ch. 10. 11. Joab was almost ten months numbering the people in David's time, (2 Sam. 24. 8.) but then they were dispersed, now they lived close together; then Satan moved the doing of it, now God did. It was the sooner and more easily done now, because it had been done but a little while ago, and they needed but review the old books, with the alterations since made, which, probably, they had kept an account of as they occurred.

In the particulars here left upon record, we may observe,

1. That the numbers are registered in words at length, (as I may say,) and not in figures; to every one of the twelve tribes it is repeated, for the greater ceremony and solemnity of the account, that they were numbered by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of their names; to shew that every tribe took and gave in the account by the same rule, and in the same method, though so many hands were employed in it; setting down their genealogy first, to shew that their family descended from Israel, then the families themselves in their order, then dividing each family into the houses or subordinate families that branched from it, and under these the names of the particular persons, according to the rules of heraldry. Thus every man might know who were his relations or next of kin, on which some laws we have already met with did depend: besides that, the nearer any are to us in relation, the more ready we should be to do them good.

2. That they all end with hundreds, only Gad with fifty, (v. 25.) but none of the numbers descend to units or tens. Some think it was a special providence that ordered all the tribes just at this time to be even numbers, and no odd or broken numbers among them, to shew them that there was something more than ordinary designed in their increase, there being this uncommon in the circumstance of it. It is rather probable, that, Moses having some time before appointed rulers of hundreds, and rulers of fifties, (Exod. 18. 25.) they numbered the people by their respective rulers, which would bring the numbers to even hundreds or fifties.

3. That Judah is the most numerous of them all: more than double to Benjamin and Manasseh, and almost 12,000 more than any other tribe, v. 27. It was Judah whom his brethren must praise, because from him Messiah the Prince was to descend; but because that was a thing at a distance, God did many ways honour that tribe in the meantime, particularly by the great increase of it, for His sake who was to spring out of Judah (Heb. 7. 14.) in the fulness of time. Judah was to lead the van through the wilderness, and therefore was furnished accordingly with greater strength than any other tribe.

4. Ephraim and Manasseh, the sons of Joseph, are numbered as distinct tribes, and both together made up almost as many as Judah; this was in pursuance of Jacob's adoption of them, by which they were equalled with their uncles Reuben and Simeon, Gen. 48. 5. It was also the effect of the blessing of Joseph, who was to be a fruitful bough, Gen. 49. 22. And Ephraim the younger is put first, and is more numerous than Manasseh, for Jacob had crossed hands, and foreseen ten thousands of Ephraim, and thousands of Manasseh. The fulfilling of this confirms our faith in the spirit of prophecy with which the patriarchs were endued.

5. When they came down into Egypt, Dan had but one son, (Gen. 46. 23.) and so his tribe was but one family, ch. 26. 42. Benjamin had then ten sons, (Gen. 46. 21.) yet now the tribe of Dan is almost double in number to that of Benjamin. Note, The increasing and diminishing of families does not always go by probabilities. Some are multiplied greatly, and again are diminished, while others, that were poor, have families made them like a flock, Ps. 107. 38, 39, 41. and see Job, 12. 23.

6. It is said of each of the tribes, that those were numbered who were able to go forth to war, to remind them that they had wars before them, though now they were in peace, and met with no opposition. Let not him that girdeth on the harness boast as though he had put it off.

44. These are those that were numbered, which Moses and Aaron numbered, and the princes of Israel, being twelve men: each one was for the house of his fathers. 45. So were all those that were numbered of the children of Israel, by the house of their fathers, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war in Israel; 46. Even all they that were numbered were six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty.

We have here the sum total at the foot of the account; they were in all 600,000 fighting men, and 3,550 over. Some think, that, when this was their number some months before, (Exod. 38. 26.) the Levites were reckoned with them; but now that tribe was separated for the service of God, yet had so many more by this time attained to the age of twenty years, as that still they were the same number; to shew, that, whatever we part with for the honour and service of God, it shall certainly be made up to us one way or other.

Now we see what a vast body of men they were. Let us consider, 1. How much went to maintain all these (beside twice as many more, no question, of women and children, sick and aged, of the mixed multitude) for forty years together in the wilderness; and they were all at God's finding every day, having their food from the dew of heaven, and not from the fatness of the earth. Oh what a great and good Housekeeper is our God, that has such numbers depending on him, and receiving from him every day! 2. What work sin makes with a people; within forty years most of them would indeed have died of course for the common sin of mankind; for when sin entered into the world, death came with it, and how great are the desolations which it makes in the earth! But, for the particular sin of unbelief and murmuring, all those that were now numbered, except two, laid their bones under their iniquity, and perished in the wilderness. 3. What a great multitude God's spiritual Israel will amount to at last; though at one time, and in one place, they seem to be but a little flock, yet when they come all together, they shall be a great multitude, innumerable, Rev. 7. 9. And though the church's beginning be small, its latter end shall greatly increase. A little one shall become a thousand.

47. But the Levites, after the tribe of their fathers, were not numbered among them. 48. For the LORD had spoken unto Moses, saying, 49. Or!

thou shalt not number the tribe of Levi, neither take the sum of them among the children of Israel: 50. But thou shalt appoint the Levites over the tabernacle of testimony, and over all the vessels thereof, and over all things that belong to it: they shall bear the tabernacle, and all the vessels thereof; and they shall minister unto it, and shall encamp round about the tabernacle. 51. And when the tabernacle setteth forward, the Levites shall take it down: and when the tabernacle is to be pitched, the Levites shall set it up: and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death. 52. And the children of Israel shall pitch their tents, every man by his own camp, and every man by his own standard, throughout their hosts. 53. But the Levites shall pitch round about the tabernacle of testimony; that there be no wrath upon the congregation of the children of Israel: and the Levites shall keep the charge of the tabernacle of testimony. 54. And the children of Israel did according to all that the LORD commanded Moses, so did they.

Care is here taken to distinguish, from the rest of the tribes, the tribe of Levi, which, in the matter of the golden calf, had distinguished itself, Exod. 32. 26. Note, Singular services shall be recompensed with singular honours. Now, 1. It was the honour of the Levites, that they were made guardians of the spiritualities; to them was committed the care of the tabernacle and the treasures thereof, both in their camps and in their marches. (1.) When they moved, the Levites were to take down the tabernacle, to carry it and all that belonged to it, and then to set it up again in the place appointed, v. 50, 51. It was for the honour of the holy things, that none should be permitted to see them, or touch them, but those only who were called of God to the service. Thus we all are unfit and unworthy to have fellowship with God, till we are first called by his grace into the fellowship of his Son Jesus Christ our Lord, and so, being the spiritual seed of that great High Priest, are made priests to our God; and it is promised that God would take Levites to himself, even from the Gentiles, Isa. 66. 21. (2.) When they rested, the Levites were to encamp round about the tabernacle, (v. 50, 53.) that they might be near their work, and resident upon their charge, always ready to attend; and that they might be a guard upon the tabernacle, to preserve it from being either plundered or profaned. They must pitch round about the tabernacle, That there be no wrath upon the congregation, as there would be, if the tabernacle and the charge of it were neglected, or those crowded upon it that were not allowed to come near. Note, Great care must be taken to prevent sin, because the preventing of sin is the preventing of wrath. 2. It was their further honour, that as Israel, being a holy people, was not reckoned among the nations, so they, being a holy tribe, were not reckoned among other Israelites, but numbered afterward by themselves, v. 49. The service which the Levites were to do about the sanctuary is called (as we render it in the margin) a warfare, ch. 4. 23. And, being engaged in that warfare, they were discharged from military services, and therefore not numbered with those that were to go out to war. Note, They that minister about holy things should neither entangle themselves, nor be entangled, in secular affairs. The ministry is itself work enough for a whole man, and all little enough to be employed in it. It is an admonition to ministers, to distinguish themselves by their exemplary conversation from common Israelites, not affecting to seem greater, but aiming to be really better, every way better, than others.

CHAP. II.

The thousands of Israel, having been mustered in the former chapter, in this are marshalled, and a regular disposition made of their camp, by a divine appointment. Here is, I. A general order concerning it, v. 1, 2. II. Particular directions for the posting of each of the tribes, in four distinct squadrons, three tribes in each squadron. 1. In the van-guard, on the east, were posted Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun, v. 3. .9. 2. In the right wing, southward, Reuben, Simcon, and Gad, v. 10. .16. 3. In the rear, westward, Ephraim, Manassch, and Benjamin, v. 18. .21. 4. In the left wing, northward, Dan, Asher, and Naphtali, v. 25. .31. 5. The tabernacle in the centre, v. 17. And, lastly, the conclusion of this appointment, v. 32. .31.

I. AND the LORD spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, 2. Every man of the children of Israel shall pitch by his own standard, with the ensign of their fathers' house: far off about the tabernacle of the congregation shall they pitch.

Here is the general appointment given both for their orderly encampment where they rested, and their orderly march when they moved. Some order, it is probable, they had observed hitherto; they came out of Egypt in rank and file, (Exod. 13. 18.) but now they were put into a better model.

1. They all dwelt in tents, and, when they marched, carried all their tents along with them, for they found no city to dwell in, Ps. 107. 4. This represents to us our state in this world; it is a moveable state, (we are here to-day, and gone to-morrow,) and it is a military state. Is not our life a warfare? We do but pitch our tents in this world, and have in it no continuing city. Let us, therefore, while we are pitching in this world, be pressing through it.

2. Those of a tribe were to pitch together, every man by his own standard. Note, It is the will of God that mutual love and affection, converse and communion, should be kept up among relations. Those that are of kin to each other, should, as much as they can, be acquainted with each other; and the bonds of nature should be improved for the strengthening of the bonds of Christian communion.

3. Every one must know his place, and keep in it; they were not allowed to fix where they pleased, nor to remove when they pleased, but God quarters them, with a charge to abide in their quarters. Note, It is God that appoints us the bounds of our habitation, and to him we must refer ourselves. He shall choose our inheritance for us, (Ps. 47. 4.) and in his choice we must acquiesce, and not love to flit, nor be as the bird that wanders from her nest.

4. Every tribe had its standard, flag, or ensign, and it should seem every family had some particular ensign of their fathers' house, which was carried, as with us the colours of each troop or company in a regiment are. These were of use for the distinction of tribes and families, and the gathering and keeping of them together; in allusion to which the preaching of the gospel is said to lift up an ensign, to which the Gentiles shall seek, and by which they shall pitch, Isa. 11. 10, 12. Note, God is the God of order, and not of confusion. These standards made this mighty army seem more beautiful to its friends, and more formidable to its enemies. The church of Christ is said to be as terrible as an army with banners, Cant. 6. 10. It is uncertain how these standards were distinguished: some conjecture that the standard of each tribe was of the same colour with the precious stone in which the name of that tribe was written in the high priest's ephod, and that that was all the difference. Many of the modern Jews think there was some coat of arms painted in each standard, which had reference to the blessing of that tribe by Jacob. Judah bore a lion, Dan a serpent, Naphtali a hind, Benjamin a wolf, &c. Some of them say, the four principal standards were Judah a lion, Reuben a man, Joseph an ox, and Dan an eagle; making the appearances in Ezekiel's vision to allude to it. Others say, the name of each tribe was written in its standard; whatever it was, no doubt, it gave a certain direction.

5. They were to pitch about the tabernacle which was to be in the midst of them, as the tent or pavilion of a general in the centre of an army. They must encamp round the tabernacle, (1.) That it might be equally a comfort and joy to them all, as it was a token of God's gracious presence with them; (Ps. 46. 5: God is in the midst of her, she shall not be moved. Their camp had reason to be hearty, when thus they had God in the heart of them to have bread from heaven every day round about their camp, and fire from heaven, with other tokens of God's favour, in the midst of their camp, was abundantly sufficient to answer that question, Is the Lord among us, or is he not? Happy art thou, O Israel! It is probable that the doors of all their tents were made to look toward the tabernacle from all sides; for every Israelite should have his eyes always toward the Lord; therefore they worshipped at the tent-door. The tabernacle was in the midst of the camp, that it might be near to them; for it is a very desirable thing to have the solemn administrations of holy ordinances near us and within our reach. The kingdom of God is among you. (2.) That they might be a guard and defence upon the tabernacle and the Levites on every side. No invader could come near God's tabernacle, without first penetrating the thickest of their squadrons. Note, If God undertake the protection of our comforts, we ought in our places to undertake the protection of his institutions, and stand up in defence of his honour, and interest, and ministers.

6. Yet they were to pitch afar off, in reverence to the sanctuary, that it might not seem crowded and thrust up among them; and that the common business of the camp might be no annoyance to it. They were also taught to keep their distance, lest too much familiarity should breed contempt. It is supposed (from Joshua, 3. 4.) that the distance between the nearest part of the camp and the tabernacle (or perhaps between them and the camp of the Levites, who pitched near the tabernacle) was 2000 cubits, that is, 1000 yards, little more than half a measured mile with us; but the outer parts of the camp must needs be much further off. Some compute that the extent of their camp could be no less than 12 miles square; for it was like a moveable city, with streets and lanes, in which perhaps the manna fell, as well as on the outside of the camp, that they might have it at their doors. In the Christian church we read of a throne, (as in the tabernacle there was a mercy-seat,) which is called a glorious high throne from the beginning, (Jer. 17. 12.) and that throne surrounded by spiritual Israelites, 24 elders, double to the number of the tribes, clothed in white raiment, (Rev. 4. 4.) and the banner over them is Love; but we are not ordered, as they were, to pitch afar off; no, we are invited to draw near, and come boldly. The saints of the Most High are said to be round about him, Ps. 76. 11. God by his grace keep us close to him.

3. And on the east side toward the rising of the sun shall they of the standard of the camp of Judah pitch throughout their armies; and Nahshon the son of Amminadab shall be captain of the children of Judah. 4. And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were threescore and fourteen thousand and six hundred. 5. And those that do pitch next unto him shall be the tribe of Issachar; and Nathaneel the son of Zuar shall be captain of the children of Issachar. 6. And his host, and those that were numbered thereof, were fifty and four thousand and four hundred. 7. Then the tribe of Zebulun; and Eliab the son of Helon shall be captain of the children of Zebulun. 8. And his host, and those that were numbered thereof, were fifty and seven thousand and four hundred. 9. All that were numbered in the camp of Judah were an hundred thousand and fourscore thousand and six thousand and four hundred, throughout their armies. These shall first set forth. 10. On the south side shall be the standard of the camp of Reuben according to their armies: and the captain of the children of Reuben shall be Elizur the son of Shedeur. 11. And his host, and those that were numbered thereof, were forty and six thousand and five hundred. 12. And those which pitch by him shall be the tribe of Simeon: and the captain of the children of Simeon shall be Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai. 13. And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were fifty and nine thousand and three hundred. 14. Then the tribe of Gad: and the captain of the sons of Gad shall be Eliasaph the son of Reuel. 15. And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were forty and five thousand and six hundred and fifty. 16. All that were numbered in the camp of Reuben were an hundred thousand and fifty and one thousand and four hundred and fifty, throughout their armies. And they shall set forth in the second rank. 17. Then the tabernacle of the congregation shall set forward with the camp of the Levites in the midst of the camp: as they encamp, so shall they set forward, every man in his place by their standards. 18. On the west side shall be the standard of the camp of Ephraim, according to their armies: and the captain of the sons of Ephraim shall be Elishama the son of Ammihud. 19. And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were forty thousand and five hundred. 20. And by him shall be the tribe of Manasseh: and the captain of the children of Manasseh shall be Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur. 21. And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were thirty and two thousand and two hundred. 22. Then the tribe of Benjamin: and the captain of the sons of Benjamin shall be Abidan the son of Gideoni. 23. And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were thirty and five thousand and four hundred. 24. All that were numbered of the camp of Ephraim were an hundred thousand and eight thousand and an hundred, throughout their armies. And they shall go forward in the third rank. 25. The standard of the camp of Dan shall be on the north side by their armies: and the captain of the children of Dan shall be Ahiezur the son of Ammishaddai. 26. And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were threescore and two thousand and seven hundred. 27. And those that encamp by him shall be the tribe of Asher: and the captain of the children of Asher shall be Pagiel the son of Ocran. 28. And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were forty and one thousand and five hundred. 29. Then the tribe of Naphtali: and the captain of the children of Naphtali shall be Ahira the son of Enan. 30. And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were fifty and three thousand and four hundred. 31. All they that were numbered in the camp of Dan were an hundred thousand and fifty and seven thousand and six hundred. They shall go hindmost with their standards. 32. These are those which were numbered of the children of Israel, by the house of their fathers: all those that were numbered of the camps throughout their hosts were six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty. 33. But the Levites were not numbered among the children of Israel; as the LORD commanded Moses. 34. And the children of Israel did according to all that the LORD commanded Moses: so they pitched by their standards, and so they set forward, every one after their families, according to the house of their fathers.

We have here the particular distribution of the twelve tribes into four squadrons, three tribes in a squadron, one of which was to lead the other two.

Observe, 1. God himself appointed them their place, to prevent strife and envy among them. Had they been left to determine precedency among themselves, they would have been in danger of quarrelling with one another, as the disciples, who strove which should be greatest; each would have had a pretence to be first, or, at least, not to be last. Had it been left to Moses to determine, they would have quarrelled with him, and charged him with partiality; therefore God does it, who is himself the Fountain and Judge of honour, and in his appointment all must acquiesce. If God in his providence advance others above us, and abase us, we ought to be as well satisfied in his doing it that way, as if he did it, as this was done here, by a voice out of the tabernacle; and this consideration, that it appears to be the will of God it should be so, should effectually silence all envies and discontents. And, as far as our place comes to be our choice, our Saviour has given us a rule, (Luke, 14. 8.) Sit not down in the highest room; and another, (Matth. 20. 27.) He that will be chief, let him be your servant. Those that are most humble and most serviceable are really most honourable.

2. Every tribe had a captain, a prince, or commander in chief, whom God himself nominated, the same that had been appointed to number them, ch. 1. 5. Our being all the children of one Adam is so far from justifying the levellers, and taking away the distinction of place and honour, that even among the children of the same Abraham, the same Jacob, the same Judah, God himself appointed that one should be captain of all the rest. There are powers ordained of God, and those to whom honour and fear are due, and must be paid. Some observe the significancy of the names of these princes, at least, in general, how much God was in the thoughts of those that gave them their names, for most of them have El, God, at one end or other of their names. Nethaneel the gift of God; Eliab, my God a father; Elizur, my God a rock; Shelumiel, God my peace; Eliasaph, God has added; Elishama, my God has heard; Gamaliel, God my reward; Pagiel, God has met me. By which it appears that the Israelites in Egypt did not quite forget the name of their God, but, when they wanted other memorials, preserved the remembrance of it in the names of their children, and therefore comforted themselves in their affliction.

3. Those tribes were placed together, under the same standard, that were nearest of kin to each other; Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun, were the three youngest sons of Leah, and they were put together; and Issachar and Zebulun would not grudge to be under Judah, since they were younger brethren; Reuben and Simeon would not have been content in their place. Therefore Reuben, Jacob's eldest son, is made chief of the next squadron; Simeon, no doubt, is willing to be under him, and Gad, the son of Zilpah, Leah's handmaid, is fitly added to them in Levi's room: Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin, are all the posterity of Rachel. Dan, the eldest son of Billah, is made a leading tribe, though the son of a concubine, that more abundant honour might be bestowed on that which lacked; and it was said, Dan should judge his people, and to him were added the two younger sons of the handmaids. Thus unexceptionable was the order in which they were placed.

4. The tribe of Judah was in the first post of honour encamped toward the rising sun, and in their marches led the van, not only because it was the most numerous tribe, but chiefly because from that tribe Christ was to come, who is the Lion of the tribe of Judah, and was to descend from the loins of him who was now nominated chief captain of that tribe. Nahshon is reckoned among the ancestors of Christ, Matth. 1. 4. So that when he went before them, Christ himself went before them in effect, as their Leader. Judah was the first of the twelve sons of Jacob that was blessed; Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, were censured by their dying father: he therefore being first in blessing, though not in birth, is put first, to teach children how to value the smiles of their godly parents, and dread their frowns.

5. The tribe of Levi pitched close about the tabernacle, within the rest of the tribes, v. 17. They must defend the sanctuary, and then the rest of the tribes must defend them. Thus, in the vision which John saw of the glory of heaven, between the elders and the throne were four living creatures full of eyes, Rev. 4. 6, 10. Civil powers should protect the religious interests of a nation, and be a defence upon that glory.

6. The camp of Dan, (and so that tribe is called long after their settlement in Canaan, Judg. 13. 25. because celebrated for their military prowess,) though posted in the left wing when they encamped, was ordered in their march to bring up the rear, v. 31. They were the most numerous, next to Judah, and therefore were ordered into a post, which, next to the front, required the most strength, for as the strength is, so shall the day be.

Lastly, The children of Israel observed the orders given them, and did as the Lord commanded Moses, v. 34. They put themselves in the posts assigned them, without murmuring or disputing, and as it was their safety, so it was their beauty; Balaam was charmed with the sight of it, (ch. 24. 5.) How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob! Thus the gospel-church, called the camp of saints, ought to be compact according to the scripture-model, every one knowing and keeping his place, and then all that wish well to the church, rejoice, beholding their order, Col. 2. 5.

CHAP. III.

This chapter and the next are concerning the tribe of Levi, which was to be mustered and marshalled by itself, and not in common with the other tribes; which signified the particular honour put upon them, and the particular duty and service required from them. The Levites are in this chapter considered, I. As attendants on, and assistants to, the priests in the temple-service. And so we have an account, 1. Of the priests themselves, (v. 1. .4.) and their work, v. 10. 2. Of the gift of the Levites to them, (v. 5. .9.) in order to which they are mustered, (v. 14. .16.) and the sum of them taken, v. 39. Each particular family of them is mustered, has its place assigned, and its charge; the Gershonites, (v. 18. .26.) the Kohathites, (v. 27. .32.) the Merarites, v. 33. .39. II. As equivalents for the first-born, v. 11. .13. 1. The first-born are numbered, and the Levites taken instead of them, as far as the number of the Levites went, v. 40. .45. 2. What first-born there were more than the Levites were redeemed, v. 46. .51.

1. THESSE also are the generations of Aaron and Moses, in the day that the LORD spake with Moses in mount Sinai. 2. And these are the names of the sons of Aaron; Nadab the first-born, and Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. 3. These are the names of the sons of Aaron, the priests which were anointed, whom he consecrated to minister in the priest's office. 4. And Nadab and Abihu died before the LORD, when they offered strange fire before the LORD, in the wilderness of Sinai, and they had no children: and Eleazar and Ithamar ministered in the priest's office in the sight of Aaron their father. 5. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 6. Bring the tribe of Levi near, and present them before Aaron the priest, that they may minister unto him. 7. And they shall keep his charge, and the charge of the whole congregation, before the tabernacle of the congregation, to do the service of the tabernacle. 8. And they shall keep all the instruments of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the charge of the children of Israel, to do the service of the tabernacle. 9. And thou shalt give the Levites unto Aaron, and to his sons; they are wholly given unto him out of the children of Israel. 10. And thou shalt appoint Aaron and his sons, and they shall wait on their priest's office: and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death. 11. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 12. And I, behold, I have taken the Levites from among the children of Israel, instead of all the first-born that openeth the matrix among the children of Israel: therefore the Levites shall be mine; 13. Because all the first-born are mine; for on the day that I smote all the first-born in the land of Egypt I hallowed unto me all the first-born in Israel, both man and beast; mine they shall be: I am the LORD.

Here,

I. The family of Aaron is confirmed in the priest's office, v. 10. They had been called to it before, and consecrated; here they are appointed to wait on their priest's office: the apostle uses this phrase, (Rom. 12. 7.) Let us wait on our ministry. The work and office of the ministry require a constant attendance and great diligence; so frequent are the returns of its work, and yet so transient its favourable opportunities, that it must be waited on. Here is repeated what is said before, (ch. 1. 51.) The stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death; which forbids the invading of the priest's office by any other person whatsoever; none must come nigh to minister but Aaron and his sons only, all others are strangers. It also lays a charge on the priests, as door-keepers in God's house, to take care that none should come near who were forbidden by the law; they must keep off all intruders, whose approach would be to the profanation of the holy things, telling them that if they came near, it was at their peril, they would die by the hand of God, as Uzza did. The Jews say, that afterward there was hung over the door of the temple a golden sword, (perhaps alluding to that flaming sword at the entrance of the garden of Eden,) on which was engraven, The stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.

II. A particular account is given of this family of Aaron: what we have met with before concerning them, is here repeated. 1. The consecration of the sons of Aaron, v. 3. They were all anointed to minister before the Lord, though it appeared afterward, and God knew it, that two of them were wise, and were foolish. 2. The fall of the two eldest; (v. 4.) they offered strange fire, and died for so doing, before the Lord. This is mentioned here in the preamble to the law concerning the priesthood, for warning to all succeeding priests; let them know, by this example, that God is a jealous God, and will not be mocked; the holy anointing oil was an honour to the obedient, but not a shelter to the disobedient. It is here said, They had no children, Providence so ordering it, for their greater punishment, that none of their descendants should remain to be priests, and to bear up their name who had profaned God's name. 3. The continuance of the two youngest; Eleazar and Ithamar ministered in the sight of Aaron. It intimates, (1.) The care they took about their ministration, not to make any blunders; they kept under their father's eye, and took instruction from him in all they did, because, probably, Nadab and Abihu got out of their father's sight when they offered strange fire. Note, It is good for young people to act under the conduct and inspection of those that are aged and experienced. (2.) The comfort Aaron took in it; it pleased him to see his younger sons behave themselves prudently and gravely, when his two elder had miscarried. Note, It is a great satisfaction to parents to see their children walk in the truth, 3 John, v. 4. 4. A grant is made of the Levites to be assistants to the priests in their work. Give the Levites to Aaron, v. 9. Aaron was to have a greater propriety in, and power over, the tribe of Levi, than any other of the princes had in and over their respective tribes. There was a great deal of work belonging to the priest's office, and there were now only three pair of hands to do it all, Aaron's and his two sons', for it does not appear that they had either of them any children at this time, at least, not any that were of age to minister, therefore God appoints the Levites to attend upon them. Note, Those whom God finds work for, he will find help for.

Here is, (1.) The service for which the Levites were designed; they were to minister to the priests in their ministration to the Lord, (v. 6.) and to keep Aaron's charge, (v. 7.) as the deacons to the bishops in the evangelical constitutions, serving at tables, while they waited on their ministry. The Levites killed the sacrifices, and then the priests needed only to sprinkle the blood and burn the fat: the Levites prepared the incense, the priests burnt it. They were to keep, not only Aaron's charge, but the charge of the whole congregation. Note, It is a great trust that is reposed in ministers, not only for the glory of Christ, but for the good of his church; so that they must not only keep the charge of the great High Priest, but must also be faithful to the souls of men, in trust for whom a dispensation is committed to them. (2.) The consideration upon which the Levites were demanded; they were taken instead of the first-born. The preservation of the first-born of Israel, when all the first-born of the Egyptians (with whom they were many of them mingled) were destroyed, was looked upon by Him who never makes any unreasonable demands, as cause sufficient for the appropriating of all the first-born from thenceforward to himself, (v. 13.) All the first-born are mine. That was sufficient to make them his, though he had given no reason for it, for he is the sole Fountain and Lord of all beings and powers; but because all obedience must flow from love, and acts of duty must be acts of gratitude, before they were challenged into peculiar services, they were crowned with peculiar favours. Note, When he that made us saves us, we are thereby laid under further obligations to serve him and live to him. God's right to us by redemption, corroborates the right he has to us by creation.

Now, because the first-born of a family are generally the favourites, and some would think it a disparagement to have their eldest sons servants to the priests, and attending before the door of the tabernacle, God took the tribe of Levi entire for his own, in lieu of the first-born, v. 12. Note, God's institutions put no hardships upon men in any of their just interests, or reasonable affections. It was presumed that the Israelites would rather part with the Levites than with the first-born, and therefore God graciously ordered the exchange; yet for us he spared not his own Son.

14. And the Lord spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, saying, 15. Number the children of Levi after the house of their fathers, by their families: every male, from a month old and upward, shalt thou number them. 16. And Moses numbered them according to the word of the Lord, as he was commanded. 17. And these were the sons of Levi by their names; Gershon, and Kohath, and Merari. 18. And these are the names of the sons of Gershon by their families; Libni, and Shimei. 19. And the sons of Kohath by their families; Amram, and Izehar, Hebron, and Uzziel. 20. And the sons of Merari by their families; Mahli, and Mushi. These are the families of the Levites according to the house of their fathers. 21. Of Gershon was the family of the Libnites, and the family of the Shimites: these are the families of the Gershonites. 22. Those that were numbered of them, according to the number of all the males, from a month old and upward, even those that were numbered of them, were seven thousand and five hundred. 23. The families of the Gershonites shall pitch behind the tabernacle westward. 24. And the chief of the house of the father of the Gershonites shall be Eliasaph the son of Lael. 25. And the charge of the sons of Gershon in the tabernacle of the congregation shall be the tabernacle, and the tent, the covering thereof, and the hanging for the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, 26. And the hangings of the court, and the curtain for the door of the court, which is by the tabernacle, and by the altar round about, and the cords of it, for all the service thereof. 27. And of Kohath was the family of the Amramites, and the family of the Izeharites, and the family of the Hebronites, and the family of the Uzzielites: these are the families of the Kohathites. 28. In the number of all the males, from a month old and upward, were eight thousand and six hundred, keeping the charge of the sanctuary. 29. The families of the sons of Kohath shall pitch on the side of the tabernacle southward. 30. And the chief of the house of the father of the families of the Kohathites shall be Elizaphan the son of Uzziel. 31. And their charge shall be the ark, and the table, and the candlestick, and the altars, and the vessels of the sanctuary wherewith they minister, and the hanging, and all the service thereof. 32. And Eleazar, the son of Aaron the priest, shall be chief over the chief of the Levites, and have the oversight of them that keep the charge of the sanctuary. 33. Of Merari was the family of the Mahlites, and the family of the Mushiites: these are the families of Merari. 34. And those that were numbered of them, according to the number of all the males, from a month old and upward, were six thousand and two hundred. 35. And the chief of the house of the father of the families of Merari was Zuriel the son of Abihail: these shall pitch on the side of the tabernacle northward. 36. And under the custody and charge of the sons of Merari shall be the boards of the tabernacle, and the bars thereof, and the pillars thereof, and the sockets thereof, and all the vessels thereof, and all that serveth thereto, 37. And the pillars of the court round about, and their sockets, and their pins, and their cords. 38. But those that encamp before the tabernacle toward the east, even before the tabernacle of the congregation eastward, shall be Moses, and Aaron and his sons, keeping the charge of the sanctuary, for the charge of the children of Israel; and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death. 39. All that were numbered of the Levites, which Moses and Aaron numbered at the commandment of the LORD, throughout their families, all the males from a month old and upward, were twenty and two thousand.

The Levites being granted to Aaron to minister to him, they are here delivered him by tale, that he might know what he had, and employ them accordingly.

Observe,

I. By what rule they were numbered, Every male from a month old and upward, v. 15. The rest of the tribes were numbered only from 20 years old and upward, and of them those only that were able to go forth to war; but into the number of the Levites they must take in both infants and infirm; being exempted from the war, it was not insisted upon that they should be of age and strength for the wars. Though it appears afterward that little more than a third part of the Levites were fit to be employed in the service of the tabernacle, (about 8,000 out of 22,000,) ch. 4. 47, 48. yet God would have them all numbered as retainers to his family; that none may think themselves disowned and rejected of God, because they are not in a capacity of doing him that service which they see others do him. The Levites of a month old could not honour God and serve the tabernacle as those that were grown up; yet out of the mouths of babes and sucklings the Levites' praise was perfected. Let not little children be hindered from being enrolled among the disciples of Christ, for such was the tribe of Levi; of such is the kingdom of heaven, that kingdom of priests. The redemption of the first-born was reckoned from a month old; (ch. 18. 15, 16.) therefore from that age the Levites were numbered. They were numbered after the house of their fathers, not their mothers, for if the daughter of a Levite married one of another tribe, her son was not a Levite; but we read of a spiritual priest to our God, who inherited the unfeigned faith which dwelt in his mother and grandmother, 2 Tim. 1. 5.

II. How they were distributed into three classes, according to the number of the sons of Levi, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, and these subdivided into several families, v. 17..20. Concerning each of these three classes we have an account. 1. Of their number. The Gershonites were 7,500. The Kohathites were 8,600. The Merarites were 6,200. The rest of the tribes had not their subordinate families numbered by themselves, as those of Levi; this honour God put upon his own tribe. 2. Of their post about the tabernacle, on which they were to attend. The Gershonites pitched behind the tabernacle, westward, v. 23. The Kohathites on the right hand, southward, v. 29. The Merarites on the left hand, northward, v. 35. And, to complete the square, Moses and Aaron, with the priests, encamped in the front, eastward, v. 36. Thus was the tabernacle surrounded with its guards; and thus does the angel of the Lord encamp round about them that fear him, those living temples, Ps. 34. 7. Every one knew his place, and must therein abide with God. 3. Of their chief or head. As each class had its own place, so each had its own prince. The commander of the Gershonites, was Eliasaph, v. 24. Of the Kohathites, Elizaphan, (v. 30.) of whom we read, (Lev. 10. 4.) that he was one of the bearers at the funeral of Nadab and Abihu. Of the Merarites, Zuriel, v. 35. 4. Of their charge when the camp moved. Each class knew their own business; it was requisite they should; for that which is every body's work, often proves no body's work. The Gershonites were charged with the custody and carriage of all the curtains and hangings and coverings of the tabernacle and court, v. 25, 26. The Kohathites of all the furniture of the tabernacle; the ark, altar, table, &c. v. 31, 32. The Merarites of the heavy carriage, boards, bars, pillars, &c. v. 36, 37.

Here we may observe, (1.) That the Kohathites, though they were the second house, yet were preferred before the elder family of the Gershonites. Beside that Aaron and the priests were of that family, they were more numerous, and their post and charge more honourable, which, probably, was ordered to put an honour upon Moses, who was of that family. Yet, (2.) The posterity of Moses were not at all dignified or privileged, but stood upon the level with other Levites, that it might appear he did not seek the advancement of his own family, nor to entail any honours upon it either in church or state; he that had honour enough himself, coveted not to have his name shine by that borrowed light, but rather to have the Levites borrow honour from his name. Let none think contemptibly of the Levites, though inferior to the priests, for Moses himself thought it preferment enough for his sons to be Levites. Probably, it was because the family of Moses were Levites only, that in the title of this chapter, which is concerning that tribe, (v. 1.) Aaron is put before Moses.

III. The sum total of the numbers of this tribe. They are computed in all 22,000, v. 39. The sum of the particular families amounts to 300 more; if this had been added to the sum total, the Levites, instead of being 273 fewer than the first-born, as they were, (v. 43.) would have been 27 more, and so the balance would have fallen the other way; but it is supposed that the 300 which were struck off from the account when the exchange was to be made, were the first-born of the Levites themselves, born since their coming out of Egypt; which could not be put into the exchange, because they were already sanctified to God. But that which is especially observable here is, that the tribe of Levi was by much the least of all the tribes. Note, God's part in the world is too often the smallest part. His chosen are but a little flock in comparison.

40. And the LORD said unto Moses, Number all the first-born of the males of the children of Israel from a month old and upward, and take the number of their names. 41. And thou shalt take the Levites for me (I am the LORD) instead of all the first-born among the children of Israel; and the cattle of the Levites instead of all the firstlings among the cattle of the children of Israel. 42. And Moses numbered, as the LORD commanded him, all the first-born among the children of Israel. 43. And all the first-born males, by the number of names, from a month old and upward, of those that were numbered of them, were twenty and two thousand two hundred and threescore and thirteen. 44. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying,

45. Take the Levites instead of all the first-born among the children of Israel, and the cattle of the Levites instead of their cattle; and the Levites shall be mine: I am the LORD. 46. And for those that are to be redeemed of the two hundred and threescore and thirteen of the first-born of the children of Israel, which are more than the Levites; 47. Thou shalt even take five shekels apiece by the poll, after the shekel of the sanctuary shalt thou take them: (the shekel is twenty gerahs:) 48. And thou shalt give the money, wherewith the odd number of them is to be redeemed, unto Aaron and to his sons. 49. And Moses took the redemption money of them that were over and above them that were redeemed by the Levites: 50. Of the first-born of the children of Israel took he the money; a thousand three hundred and threescore and five shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary: 51. And Moses gave the money of them that were redeemed unto Aaron and to his sons, according to the word of the LORD, as the LORD commanded Moses.

Here is the exchange made of the Levites for their first-born.

1. The first-born were numbered from a month old, v. 42, 43. Those certainly were not reckoned, who, though first-born, were become heads of families themselves, but those only that were under age; and the learned Bishop Patrick is decidedly of opinion that none were numbered but those only that were born since their coming out of Egypt, when the first-born were sanctified, Exod. 13. 2. If there were 22,000 first-born males, we may suppose as many females, and all these brought forth in the first year after they came out of Egypt; we must infer from thence that in the last year of their servitude, even then when it was in the greatest extremity, there were abundance of marriages made among the Israelites; they were not discouraged by the present distress, but married in faith, expecting that God would shortly visit them with mercy, and that their children, though born in bondage, should live in liberty and honour. And it was a token of good to them, an evidence that they were blessed of the Lord, that they were not only kept alive, but greatly increased, in a barren wilderness.

2. The number of the first-born, and that of the Levites, by a special providence, came pretty near to each other; thus, when he divided the nations, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel, Deut. 32. 8. Known unto God are all his works before-hand, and there is an exact proportion between them, and so it will appear, when they come to be compared. The Levites' cattle are said to be taken instead of the firstlings of the cattle of the children of Israel, that is, The Levites, with all their possessions, were devoted to God instead of the first-born and all their's; for, when we give ourselves to God, all we have passes as appurtenances with the premises.

3. The small number of first-born, which exceeded the number of the Levites, (273 in all,) were to be redeemed, at five shekels apiece, and the redemption-money given to Aaron; for it would not do well to have them added to the Levites. It is probable, that, in the exchange, they began with the eldest of the first-born, and so downward, so that those were to be redeemed with money who were the 273 youngest of the first-born; more likely so, than either that it was determined by lot, or that the money was paid out of the public stock. The church is called the church of the first-born, which is redeemed, not as they were, with silver and gold, but, being devoted by sin to the justice of God, is ransomed with the precious blood of the Son of God.

CHAP. IV.

In the former chapter an account was taken of the whole tribe of Levi, in this, of those of that tribe who were in the prime of their time for service, betwixt 30 and 50 years old. I. The servicable men of the Kohathites are ordered to be numbered, and their charges given them, v. 2. . 20. II. Of the Gershonites, v. 21. . 28. III. Of the Merarites, v. 29. . 33. IV. The numbers of each, and the sum total at last, are recorded, v. 34. . 49.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, 2. Take the sum of the sons of Kohath from among the sons of Levi, after their families, by the house of their fathers, 3. From thirty years old and upward even until fifty years old, all that enter into the host, to do the work in the tabernacle of the congregation. 4. This shall be the service of the sons of Kohath in the tabernacle of the congregation, about the most holy things. 5. And when the camp setteth forward, Aaron shall come, and his sons, and they shall take down the covering vail, and cover the ark of testimony with it: 6. And shall put thereon the covering of badgers' skins, and shall spread over it a cloth wholly of blue, and shall put in the staves thereof. 7. And upon the table of shew-bread they shall spread a cloth of blue, and put thereon the dishes, and the spoons, and the bowls, and covers to cover withal: and the continual bread shall be thereon: 8. And they shall spread upon them a cloth of scarlet, and cover the same with a covering of badgers' skins, and shall put in the staves thereof. 9. And they shall take a cloth of blue, and cover the candlestick of the light, and his lamps, and his tongs, and his snuff-dishes, and all the oil vessels thereof, wherewith they minister unto it: 10. And they shall put it and all the vessels thereof within a covering of badgers' skins, and shall put it upon a bar. 11. And upon the golden altar they shall spread a cloth of blue, and cover it with a covering of badgers' skins, and shall put to the staves thereof: 12. And they shall take all the instruments of ministry, wherewith they minister in the sanctuary, and put them in a cloth of blue, and cover them with a covering of badgers' skins, and shall put them on a bar: 13. And they shall take away the ashes from the altar, and spread a purple cloth thereon: 14. And they shall put upon it all the vessels thereof, wherewith they minister about it, even the censers, the flesh-hooks, and the shovels, and the basins, all the vessels of the altar; and they shall spread upon it a covering of badgers' skins, and put to the staves of it. 15. And when Aaron and his sons have made an end of covering the sanctuary, and all the vessels of the sanctuary, as the camp is to set forward; after that, the sons of Kohath shall come to bear it: but they shall not touch any holy thing, lest they die. These things are the burthen of the sons of Kohath in the tabernacle of the congregation. 16. And to the office of Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest pertaineth the oil for the light, and the sweet incense, and the daily meat-offering, and the anointing oil, and the oversight of all the tabernacle, and of all that therein is, in the sanctuary, and in the vessels thereof. 17. And the LORD spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, 18. Cut ye not off the tribe of the families of the Kohathites from among the Levites: 19. But thus do unto them, that they may live, and not die, when they approach unto the most holy things: Aaron and his sons shall go in, and appoint them every one to his service and to his burthen: 20. But they shall not go in to see when the holy things are covered, lest they die.

We have here a second muster of the tribe of Levi. As that tribe was taken out of all Israel to be God's peculiar, so the middle-aged men of that tribe were taken from among the rest to be actually employed in the service of the tabernacle. Now observe,

I. Who were to be taken into this number. All the males from 30 years old to 50. Of the other tribes, those that were numbered to go forth to war, were from 20 years old and upward, but of the Levites, only from 30 to 50; for the service of God requires the best of our strength, and the prime of our time, which cannot be better spent than to the honour of him who is the First and Best. And a man may make a good soldier much sooner than a good minister.

Now, 1. They were not to be employed till they were 30 years old, because, till then, they were in danger of retaining something childish and youthful, and had not gravity enough to do the service, and wear the honour, of a Levite. They were entered as probationers, at 25 years old, (ch. 8. 24.) and in David's time, when there was more work to be done, at 20, (1 Chron. 23. 24. and so, Ezra, 3. 8.) but they must be five years learning, and waiting, and so fitting themselves for service; nay, in David's time, they were 10 years in preparation, from 20 to 30. John Baptist began his public ministry, and Christ his, at 30 years old; it is not in the letter of it obligatory on gospel-ministers now, as if they must either not begin their work till 30 years old, or must leave it off at 50; but it gives us two good rules, (1.) That ministers must not be novices, 1 Tim. 3. 6. It is a work that requires ripeness of judgment, and great steadiness, and therefore those are very unfit for it who are but babes in knowledge, and have not put away childish things. (2.) That they must learn before they teach, serve before they rule, and must first be proved, 1 Tim. 3. 10. 2. They were discharged at 50 years old from the toilsome part of the service, particularly this of carrying the tabernacle; for that is the special service to which they are here ordained, and which there was most occasion for while they were in the wilderness. When they began to enter upon old age they were dismissed; (1.) In favour to them, that they might not be over-toiled, when their strength began to decay. Twenty years' good service was thought pretty well for one man. (2.) In honour to the work, that it might not be done by those who, through the infirmities of age, were slow and heavy. The service of God should be done when we are in the most lively, active, frame. Those do not consider this, who put off their repentance to old age, and so leave the best work to be done in the worst time.

II. How their work is described. They are said to enter into the host, or warfare, to do the work in the tabernacle. The ministry is, 1. A good work, 1 Tim. 3. 1. Ministers are not ordained to the honour only, but to the labour, not to have the wages, but to do the work. 2. A good warfare, 1 Tim. 1. 18. They that enter into the ministry must look upon themselves as entered into the host, and approve themselves good soldiers, 2 Tim. 2. 3.

Now, as to the sons of Kohath in particular, here is,

(1.) Their service appointed them in the removes of the tabernacle. Afterward, when the tabernacle was fixed, they had other work assigned them: but this was the work of the day, which was to be done in its day. Observe, Wherever the camp of Israel went, the tabernacle of the Lord went with them, and care must be taken for the carriage of it. Note, Wherever we go, we must see to it that we take our religion along with us, and not forget that, or any part of it. Now, the Kohathites were to carry all the holy things of the tabernacle. They were charged with those things before, (ch. 3. 31.) but here they have more particular instructions given them.

[1.] Aaron, and his sons the priests, must pack up the things which the Kohathites were to carry, as here directed, v. 5, &c. God had before appointed that none should come into the most holy place, but only Aaron once a year with a cloud of incense; (Lev. 16. 2.) and yet, the necessity of their unsettled state requiring it, that law is here dispensed with; for, every time they removed, Aaron and his sons went in to take down the ark, and make it up for carriage; for (as the learned Bishop Patrick suggests) the Shechinah, or display of the Divine Majesty, which was over the mercy-seat, removed for the present in the pillar of cloud, which was taken up, and then the ark was not dangerous to be approached.

[2.] All the holy things must be covered; the ark and table with three coverings, all the rest with two. Even the ashes of the altar, in which the holy fire was carefully preserved and raked up, must have a purple cloth spread over them, v. 13. Even the brazen altar, though in the court of the sanctuary it stood open to the view of all, yet was covered in the carriage of it. All these coverings are designed, First, For safety, that these holy things might not be ruffled with the wind, sullied with the rain, or tarnished with the sun, but that they might be preserved in their beauty; for on all the glory shall be a defence. The covering of badgers' skins, being thick and strong, would keep out wet; and, while we are in our passage through the wilderness of this world, it concerns us to be fenced for all weathers, Isa. 4. 5, 6. Secondly, For decency and ornament. Most of these things had a cloth of blue, or purple, or scarlet, spread outmost; and the ark was covered with a cloth wholly of blue, v. 6. An emblem (say some) of the azure skies, which are spread like a curtain between us and the Majesty on high, Job. 26. 9. Those that are faithful to God should endeavour likewise to appear beautiful before men, that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour. Thirdly, For concealment. It signified the darkness of that dispensation. That which is now brought to light by the gospel, and revealed to babes, was then hid from the wise and prudent. They saw only the coverings, not the holy things themselves, (Heb. 10. 1.) but now Christ has destroyed the face of the covering, Isa. 25. 7.

[3.] When all the holy things were covered, then the Kohathites were to carry them on their shoulders. Those things that had staves were carried by their staves, (v. 6, 8, 11, 14.) those that had not were carried upon a bar, or bier, or bearing barrow, v. 10, 12. See how the tokens of God's presence in this world are moveable things; but we look for a kingdom that cannot be moved.

(2.) Eleazar, now the eldest son of Aaron, is appointed overseer of the Kohathites in this service; (v. 16.) he must take care that nothing was forgot, left behind, or displaced. As a priest, he had more honour than the Levites, but then he had more care; and that care was a heavier burthen, no doubt, upon his heart, than all the burthens that were laid upon their shoulders. It is much easier to do the work of the tabernacle than to discharge the trusts of it, to obey than to rule.

(3.) Great care must be taken to preserve the lives of these Levites, by preventing their unseasonable irreverent approach to the most holy things, (v. 18.) Cut ye not off the Kohathites. Note,

Those who do not what they can to keep others from sin, do what they can to cut them off. [1.] The Kohathites must not see the holy things till the priests had covered them, v. 20. Even they that bore the vessels of the Lord, saw not what they bore; so much were even they in the dark concerning the gospel, whose office it was to expound the law. And, [2.] When the holy things were covered, they might not touch them, at least not the ark, called here the holy thing, upon pain of death, v. 15. Uzza was struck dead for the breach of this law. Thus were the Lord's ministers themselves then kept in fear, and that was a dispensation of terror, as well as darkness; but now, through Christ, the case is altered; we have seen with our eyes, and our hands have handled the word of life, (1 John, 1. 1.) and we are encouraged to come boldly to the throne of grace.

21. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 22. Take also the sum of the sons of Gershon, throughout the houses of their fathers, by their families; 23. From thirty years old and upward until fifty years old shalt thou number them; all that enter in to perform the service, to do the work in the tabernacle of the congregation. 24. This is the service of the families of the Gershonites, to serve, and for burthens: 25. And they shall bear the curtains of the tabernacle, and the tabernacle of the congregation, his covering, and the covering of the badgers' skins that is above upon it, and the hanging for the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 26. And the hangings of the court, and the hanging for the door of the gate of the court, which is by the tabernacle, and by the altar round about, and their cords, and all the instruments of their service, and all that is made for them: so shall they serve. 27. At the appointment of Aaron and his sons shall be all the service of the sons of the Gershonites, in all their burthens, and in all their service: and ye shall appoint unto them in charge all their burthens. 28. This is the service of the families of the sons of Gershon in the tabernacle of the congregation: and their charge shall be under the hand of Ithamar the son of Aaron the priest. 29. As for the sons of Merari, thou shalt number them after their families, by the house of their fathers; 30. From thirty years old and upward even unto fifty years old shalt thou number them, every one that entereth in to the service, to do the work of the tabernacle of the congregation. 31. And this is the charge of their burthen, according to all their service in the tabernacle of the congregation; the boards of the tabernacle, and the bars thereof, and the pillars thereof, and sockets thereof, 32. And the pillars of the court round about, and their sockets, and their pins, and their cords, with all their instruments, and with all their service: and by name ye shall reckon the instruments of the charge of their burthen. 33. This is the service of the families of the sons of Merari, according to all their service, in the tabernacle of the congregation, under the hand of Ithamar the son of Aaron the priest.

We have here the charge of the other two families of the Levites, which, though not so honourable as the first, yet was necessary, and was to be done regularly. 1. The Gershonites were charged with all the drapery of the tabernacle; the curtains, and hangings, and the coverings of badgers' skins, v. 22. 26. Those they were to take down, when the cloud removed, and the ark and the rest of the holy things were carried away, to pack up and bring with them, and then to set up again, where the cloud rested. Aaron and his sons allotted to them their respective charge, "You shall take care of such a curtain, and you of such a hanging, that every one may know his work, and there may be no confusion." v. 27. Ithamar particularly was to take the oversight of them v. 28. 2. The Merarites were charged with the heavy carriage the boards and bars, the pillars and sockets, the pins and cords, and those were delivered them by name, v. 31, 32. An inventory was given them of every particular, that it might be forthcoming, and nothing to seek, when the tabernacle was to be set up again. Though these seemed of less importance than the other things pertaining to the sanctuary, yet there was this care taken of them, to teach us with the greatest exactness to preserve pure and entire all divine institutions, and to take care that nothing be lost. It also intimates the care God takes of his church, and every member of it; the good Shepherd calls his own sheep by name, John, 10. 3.

Here were thousands of men employed about these services, though a much less number would have served for the bearing of those burthens; but it was requisite that the tabernacle should be taken down and set up with great expedition, and many hands would make quick work, especially when every one knew his work. They had tents of their own to take care of, and to take along with them, but the young men under 30, and the old men above 50, might serve for them; nor is there any mention of them, for God's house must always be preferred before our own. Their care was preposterous, who built and ceiled their own houses, while God's house lay waste, Hag. 1. 4, 9.

The death of the saints is represented as the taking down of the tabernacle, (2 Cor. 5. 1.) and the putting of it off, 2 Pet. 1. 14. The immortal soul, like the most holy things, is first recovered and taken away, carried by angels unseen, under the inspection of the Lord Jesus, or Eleazar; and care is taken also of the body, the skin and flesh which are as the curtains, the bones and sinews which are as the bars and pillars; none of these shall be lost: commandment is given concerning the bones, a covenant made with the dust; these are in safe custody, and shall all be produced in the great day, when this tabernacle shall be set up again, and these vile bodies made like the glorious body of Jesus Christ.

34. And Moses and Aaron, and the chief of the congregation, numbered the sons of the Kohathites, after their families, and after the house of their fathers, 35. From thirty years old and upward even unto fifty years old, every one that entereth into the service for the work in the tabernacle of the congregation: 36. And those that were numbered of them by their families were two thousand seven hundred and fifty. 37. These were they that were numbered of the families of the Kohathites, all that might do service in the tabernacle of the congregation, which Moses and Aaron did number according to the commandment of the LORD by the hand of Moses. 38. And those that were numbered of the sons of Gershon, throughout their families, and by the house of their fathers, 39. From thirty years old and upward even unto fifty years old, every one that entereth into the service, for the work in the tabernacle of the congregation, 40. Even those that were numbered of them, throughout their families, by the house of their fathers, were two thousand and six hundred and thirty. 41. These are they that were numbered of the families of the sons of Gershon, of all that might do service in the tabernacle of the congregation, whom Moses and Aaron did number, according to the commandment of the LORD. 42. And those that were numbered of the families of the sons of Merari, throughout their families, by the house of their fathers, 43. From thirty years old and upward even unto fifty years old, every one that entereth into the service, for the work in the tabernacle of the congregation, 44. Even those that were numbered of them after their families, were three thousand and two hundred. 45. These be those that were numbered of the families of the sons of Merari, whom Moses and Aaron numbered, according to the word of the LORD by the hand of Moses. 46. All those that were numbered of the Levites, whom Moses and Aaron, and the chief of Israel, numbered after their families, and after the house of their fathers, 47. From thirty years old and upward even unto fifty years old, every one that came to do the service of the ministry, and the service of the barthen in the tabernacle of the congregation, 48. Even those that were numbered of them were eight thousand and five hundred and fourscore. 49. According to the commandment of the LORD, they were numbered by the hand of Moses, every one according to his service, and according to his burthen: thus were they numbered of him, as the LORD commanded Moses.

We have here a particular account of the numbers of the three families of the Levites respectively, that is, of the effective men, between 30 years old and 50.

Observe, 1. That the Kohathites were, in all, 8,600, from a month old and upward; but of those there were but 2,750 serviceable men, not a third part. The Gershonites, in all, 7,500, and of them but 2,630 serviceable men, little more than a third part. Note, Of the many that add to the numbers of the church, there are comparatively but few that contribute to the service of it. So it has been, and so it is; many have a place in the tabernacle that do but little of the work of the tabernacle, Phil. 2. 20, 21.

2. That the Merarites were but 6,200 in all, and yet of these there were 3,200 serviceable men, that is, several more than half. The greatest burthen lay upon that family, the boards, and pillars, and sockets; and God so ordered it, that, though they were the fewest in number, yet they should have the most able men among them; for, whatever service God calls men to, he will furnish them for it, and give strength in proportion to the work, grace sufficient.

3. The whole number of the able men of the tribe of Levi, which entered into God's host to war his warfare, was but 8,580, whereas the able men of the other tribes, that entered into the host of Israel to war their warfare, were many more. The least of the tribes had almost four times as many able men as the Levites, and some of them more than eight times as many: for those that are engaged in the service of this world, and war after the flesh, are many more than those that are devoted to the service of God, and fight the good fight of faith.

CHAP. V.

In this chapter, we have, I. An order, pursuant to the laws already made, for the removing of the unclean out of the camp, v. 1. .4. II. A repetition of the laws concerning restitution, in case of wrong done to a neighbour, (v. 5. .8.) and concerning the appropriating of the hallowed things to the priests, v. 9, 10. III. A new law made concerning the trial of a wife suspected of adultery, by the waters of jealousy, v. 11. .31.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Command the children of Israel, that they put out of the camp every leper, and every one that hath an issue, and whosoever is defiled by the dead: 3. Both male and female shall ye put out, without the camp shall ye put them; that they defile not their camps, in the midst whereof I dwell. 4. And the children of Israel did so, and put them out without the camp: as the LORD spake unto Moses, so did the children of Israel. 5. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 6. Speak unto the children of Israel, When a man or woman shall commit any sin that men commit, to do a trespass against the LORD, and that person be guilty; 7. Then they shall confess their sin which they have done: and he shall recompense his trespass with the principal thereof, and add unto it the fifth part thereof, and give it unto him against whom he hath trespassed. 8. But if the man have no kinsman to recompense the trespass unto, let the trespass be recompensed unto the LORD, even to the priest; beside the ram of the atonement, whereby an atonement shall be made for him. 9. And every offering of all the holy things of the children of Israel, which they bring unto the priest, shall be his. 10. And every man's hallowed things shall be his: whatsoever any man giveth the priest, it shall be his.

Here is,

I. A command for the purifying of the camp, by turning out from within its lines all those that were ceremonially unclean, by issues, leprosy, or the touch of dead bodies, until they were cleansed according to the law, v. 2, 3. These orders are executed immediately, v. 4. 1. The camp was now newly-modelled and put in order, and therefore, to complete the reformation of it, it is next to be cleansed. Note, The purity of the church must be as carefully consulted and preserved as the peace and order of it. It is requisite, not only that every Israelite be confined to his own standard, but that every polluted Israelite be separated from it. The wisdom from above is first pure, then peaceable. 2. God's tabernacle was now fixed in the midst of their camp, and therefore they must be careful to keep it clean. Note, The greater profession of religion any house or family makes, the more they are obliged to put away iniquity far from the tabernacle, Job. 22. 23

The person, the place, in the midst of which God dwells, must not be defiled; for, if it be, he is affronted, offended, and provoked to withdraw, 1 Cor. 3. 16, 17.

This expulsion of the unclean out of the camp was to signify, (1.) What the governors of the church ought to do; they must separate between the precious and the vile, and purge out scandalous persons as old leaven, (1 Cor. 5. 8, 13.) lest others be infected and defiled, Heb. 12. 15. It is for the glory of Christ, and the edification of his church, that those who are openly and incorrigibly profane and vicious should be put out and kept from Christian communion till they repent. (2.) What God himself will do in the great day; he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather out of his kingdom all things that offend. As here the unclean were shut out of the camp, so into the new Jerusalem no unclean thing shall enter, Rev. 21. 27.

II. A law concerning restitution, in case of wrong done to a neighbour. It is called a sin that men commit, (v. 6.) because it is common among men; a sin of man, that is, a sin against man, so it is thought that it should be translated and understood. If a man over-reach or defraud his brother in any matter, it is to be looked upon as a trespass against the Lord, who is the Protector of right, the Punisher of wrong, and who strictly charges and commands us to do justly. Now, what is to be done when a man's awakened conscience charges him with guilt of this kind, and brings it to his remembrance, though done long ago? 1. He must confess his sin, confess it to God, confess it to his neighbour, and so take shame to himself. If he have denied it before, though it go against the grain to own himself in a lie, yet he must do it; because his heart was hardened, he denied it, therefore he has no other way of making it appear that his heart is now softened, but by confessing it. 2. He must bring a sacrifice, a ram of atonement, v. 8. Satisfaction must be made for the offence done to God, whose law is broken, as well as for the loss sustained by our neighbour; restitution in that case is not sufficient without faith and repentance. 3. Yet the sacrifices would not be accepted till full amends was made to the party wronged, not only the principal, but a fifth part added to it, v. 7. It is certain, that, while that which is got by injustice is knowingly retained in the hands, the guilt of the injustice remains upon the conscience, and is not purged by sacrifice or offering, prayers or tears, for it is one and the same continued act of sin persisted in. This law we had before, (Lev. 6. 4.) and it is here added, that, if the party wronged were dead, and he had no near kinsman who was entitled to the debt, or it were any way uncertain to whom the restitution should be made, that should not serve for an excuse to detain what was unjustly gotten; to whomsoever it pertained, it was certainly none of his that got it by sin, and therefore it must be given to the priest, v. 8. If there were any that could make out a title to it, it must not be given to the priest; (God hates robbery for burnt-offerings;) but if there were not, then it lapsed to the great Lord, (ob defectum sanguinis—for want of issue,) and the priests were his receivers. Note, Some work of piety or charity is a piece of necessary justice to be done by those who are conscious to themselves that they have done wrong, but know not how otherwise to make restitution; what is not our property will never be our profit.

III. A general rule concerning hallowed things given upon this occasion, that, whatever was given to the priest, his it shall be, v. 9, 10. 1. He that gave it shall not receive his gift again, upon any pretence whatsoever. This law ratifies and confirms all grants for pious uses, that people might not give things to the priests in a fit of zeal, and then recall them in a fit of vexation. 2. The other priests shall not come in sharers with that priest who then officiated, and to whom the hallowed thing, whatever it was, was given. Let him that was most ready and diligent in attending fare the better for it; if he do the work, let him have the pay, and much good may it do him.

11. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying,

12. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, If any man's wife go aside, and commit a trespass against him, 13. And a man lie with her carnally, and it be hid from the eyes of her husband, and be kept close, and she be defiled, and there be no witness against her, neither she be taken with the manner; 14. And the spirit of jealousy come upon him, and he be jealous of his wife, and she be defiled: or if the spirit of jealousy come upon him, and he be jealous of his wife, and she be not defiled: 15. Then shall the man bring his wife unto the priest, and he shall bring her offering for her, the tenth part of an ephah of barley-meal; he shall pour no oil upon it, nor put frankincense thereon, for it is an offering of jealousy, an offering of memorial, bringing iniquity to remembrance. 16. And the priest shall bring her near, and set her before the LORD: 17. And the priest shall take holy water in an earthen vessel; and of the dust that is in the floor of the tabernacle the priest shall take, and put it into the water: 18. And the priest shall set the woman before the LORD, and uncover the woman's head, and put the offering of memorial in her hands, which is the jealousy-offering: and the priest shall have in his hand the bitter water that causeth the curse: 19. And the priest shall charge her by an oath, and say unto the woman, If no man have lain with thee, and if thou hast not gone aside to uncleanness with another instead of thy husband, be thou free from this bitter water that causeth the curse: 20. But if thou hast gone aside to another instead of thy husband, and if thou be defiled, and some man hath lain with thee beside thine husband: 21. Then the priest shall charge the woman with an oath of cursing, and the priest shall say unto the woman, The LORD make thee a curse and an oath among thy people, when the LORD doth make thy thigh to rot and thy belly to swell; 22. And this water that causeth the curse shall go into thy bowels, to make thy belly to swell, and thy thigh to rot: And the woman shall say, Amen, amen. 23. And the priest shall write these curses in a book, and he shall blot them out with the bitter water: 24. And he shall cause the woman to drink the bitter water that causeth the curse: and the water that causeth the curse shall enter into her, and become bitter. 25. Then the priest shall take the jealousy-offering out of the woman's hand, and shall wave the offering before the LORD, and offer it upon the altar: 26. And the priest shall take an handful of the offering, even the memorial thereof, and burn it upon the altar, and afterward shall cause the woman to drink the water. 27. And when he hath made her to drink the water, then it shall come to pass, that, if she be defiled, and have done trespass against her husband; that the water that causeth the curse shall enter into her, and become bitter, and her belly shall swell, and her thigh shall rot: and the woman shall be a curse among her people. 28. And if the woman be not defiled, but be clean; then she shall be free, and shall conceive seed. 29. This is the law of jealousies, when a wife goeth aside to another instead of her husband, and is defiled; 30. Or when the spirit of jealousy cometh upon him, and he be jealous over his wife, and shall set the woman before the LORD, and the priest shall execute upon her all this law. 31. Then shall the man be guiltless from iniquity, and this woman shall bear her iniquity.

We have here the law concerning the solemn trial of a wife whose husband was jealous of her. Observe,

I. What was the case supposed, That a man had some reason to suspect his wife to have committed adultery, v. 12. .14. Here, 1. The sin of adultery is justly represented as an exceeding sinful sin; it is going aside from God and virtue, and the good way, Prov. 2. 17. It is committing a trespass against the husband, robbing him of his honour, alienating his right, introducing a spurious brood into his family, to share with his children in his estate, and violating her covenant with him. It is being defiled, for nothing pollutes the mind and conscience more than this sin does. 2. It is supposed to be a sin which great care is taken by the sinners to conceal; which there is no witness of; the eye of the adulterer waits for the twilight, Job, 24. 15. And the adulteress takes her opportunity when the good man is not at home, Prov. 7. 19. It would not covet to be secret, if it were not shameful; and the Devil, who draws sinners to this sin, teaches them how to cover it. 3. The spirit of jealousy is supposed to come upon the husband, of which Solomon says, It is the rage of a man, (Prov. 6. 34.) and that it is cruel as the grave, Cant. 8. 6. 4. "Yet" (say the Jewish writers) "he must make it appear that he has some just cause for the suspicion." The rule they give is, "If the husband have said unto his wife, before witnesses, 'Be not thou in secret with such a man,' and, notwithstanding that admonition, it is afterward proved that she was in secret with that man, though her father or her brother, then he may compel her to drink the bitter water." But the law here does not tie him to that particular method of proving the just cause of his suspicion; it might be otherwise proved. In case it could be proved that she had committed adultery, she was to be put to death, (Lev. 20. 10.) but if it was uncertain, then this law took place. From hence, (1.) Let all wives be admonished not to give any the least occasion for the suspicion of their chastity; it is not enough that they abstain from the evil of uncleanness, but they must abstain from all appearance of it, from every thing that looks like it, or leads to it, or may give the least umbrage to jealousy; for how great a matter may a little fire kindle! (2.) Let all husbands be admonished not to entertain any causeless or unjust suspicions of their wives. Charity in general, much more, conjugal affection, teaches to think no evil, 1 Cor. 13. 5. It is the happiness of the virtuous woman that the heart of her husband doth safely trust in her, Prov. 31. 11.

II. What was the course prescribed in this case; 1. That, if the suspected wife was innocent, she might not continue under the reproach and uneasiness of her husband's jealousy. 2. That, if she was guilty, her sin might find her out, and others might hear, and fear, and take warning. Now, the process of the trial must be thus:

(1.) Her husband must bring her to the priest, with the witnesses that could prove the ground of his suspicion, and desire that she might be put upon her trial. The Jews say that the priest was first to endeavour to persuade her to confess the truth, saying to this purport, "Dear daughter, perhaps thou wast overtaken by drinking wine, or wast carried away by the heat of youth or the examples of bad neighbours; come, confess the truth, for the sake of his great name which is described in the most sacred ceremony, and do not let it be blotted out with the bitter water." If she confessed, saying, "I am defiled," she was not put to death, but was divorced, and lost her dowry; if she said, "I am pure," then they proceeded.

(2.) He must bring a coarse offering of barley-meal, without oil or frankincense, agreeably to the present afflicted state of his family; for a great affliction it was, either to have cause to be jealous, or to be jealous without cause. It is an offering of memorial, to signify that what was to be done was intended as a religious appeal to the omniscience and justice of God.

(3.) The priest was to prepare the water of jealousy; the holy water out of the laver, at which the priests were to wash when they ministered; this must be brought in an earthen vessel, containing (they say) about a pint; and it must be an earthen vessel, because the coarser and plainer every thing was, the more agreeable it was to the occasion. Dust must be put into the water, to signify the reproach she lay under, and the shame she ought to take to herself, putting her mouth in the dust; but dust from the floor of the tabernacle, to put an honour upon every thing that pertained to the place God had chosen to put his name there, and to keep up in the people a reverence for it: see John, 8. 6.

(4.) The woman was to be set before the Lord, at the east gate of the temple-court, (say the Jews,) and her head was to be uncovered, in token of her sorrowful condition, and there she stood for a spectacle to the world, that other women might learn not to do after her lewdness, Ezek. 23. 48. Only the Jews say, "Her own servants were not to be present, that she might not seem vile in their sight, who were to give honour to her; her husband also must be dismissed."

(5.) The priest was to adjure her to tell the truth, and to denounce the curse of God against her if she were guilty, and to declare what would be the effect of her drinking the water of jealousy, v. 19. .22. He must assure her, that, if she was innocent, the water would do her no harm, v. 19. None need fear the curse of the law, if they have not broken the commands of the law. But, if she was guilty, this water would be poison to her, it would make her belly to swell, and her thigh to rot, and she should be a curse or abomination among her people, v. 21, 22. To this she must say, Amen, as Israel must do to the curses pronounced on mount Ebal, Deut. 27. 26. Some think the Amen, being doubled, respects both parts of the adjuration, both that which freed her if innocent, and that which condemned her if guilty. No woman, if she was guilty, could say Amen to this adjuration, and drink the water upon it, unless she disbelieved the truth of God, or defied his justice, and was come to such a pitch of impudence and hard-heartedness in sin, as to challenge God Almighty to do his worst, and choose rather to venture upon his curse than to give him glory by making confession; thus has whoredom taken away the heart.

(6.) The priest was to write this curse in a scrip or scroll of parchment, verbatim—word for word, as he had expressed it, and then to wipe or scrape out what he had written into the water, (v. 23.) to signify that it was that curse which impregnated the water, and gave it its strength to effect what was intended. It signified, that, if she was innocent, the curse should be blotted out, and never appear against her, as it is written, (Isa. 48. 25.) I am he that blotteth out thy transgression; and (Ps. 51. 9.) Blot out mine iniquities. But that, if she was guilty, the curse, as it was written, being infused into the water, it would enter into her bowels with the water, even like oil into her bones, (Ps. 109. 18.) as we read of a curse entering into a house, Zech. 5. 4.

(7.) The woman must then drink the water; (v. 24.) it is called the bitter water, some think, because they put wormwood in it to make it bitter, or rather, because it caused the curse. Thus, sin is called an evil thing and a bitter, for the same reason, because it causeth the curse, Jer. 2. 19. If she had been guilty, (and otherwise it did not cause the curse,) she was made to know, that, though her stolen waters had been sweet, and her bread eaten in secret pleasant, yet the end was bitter as wormwood, Prov. 9. 17. and ch. 5. 4. Let all that meddle with forbidden pleasures know that they will be bitterness in the latter end. The Jews say, that if, upon denouncing the curses, the woman was so terrified that she durst not drink the water, but confessed she was defiled, the priest flung down the water, and cast her offering among the ashes, and she was divorced without dowry: if she confessed not, and yet would not drink, they forced her to it; and if she was ready to throw it up again, they hastened her away, that she might not pollute the holy place.

(8.) Before she drank the water, the jealousy-offering was waved and offered upon the altar; (v. 25, 26.) a handful of it was burnt for a memorial, and the remainder of it eaten by the priest, unless the husband was a priest, and then it was scattered among the ashes. This offering, in the midst of the transaction, signified that the whole was an appeal to God, as a God that knows all things, and from whom no secret is hid.

Lastly, All things being thus performed according to the law, they were to wait the issue. The water, with a little dust put into it, and the scrapings of a written parchment, had no natural tendency at all to do either good or hurt; but, if God was thus appealed to in the way of an instituted ordinance, though otherwise the innocent might have continued under suspicion, and the guilty undiscovered, yet God would so far own his institution, as that, in a little time, by the miraculous operation of Providence, the innocency of the innocent should be cleared, and the sin of the guilty should find them out.

1. If the suspected woman was really guilty, the water she drank would be poison to her, (v. 37.) her belly would swell, and her thigh rot by a vile disease for vile deserts, and she would mourn at the last, when her flesh and body are consumed, Prov. 5. 11. Bishop Patrick says, from some of the Jewish writers, that the effect of these waters appeared immediately; she grew pale, and her eyes ready to start out of her head. Dr. Lightfoot says, that sometimes it appeared not for two or three years, but she bare no children, was sickly, languished, and rotted at last; it is probable that some indications appeared immediately. The rabbins say, that the adulterer also died in the same day and hour that the adulteress did, and in the same manner too; that his belly swelled, and his secret parts rotted: a disease, perhaps, not much unlike that which, in these latter ages, the avenging hand of a righteous God has made the scourge of uncleanness, and in which whores and whoremongers infect, and plague, and ruin, one another, since they escape punishment from men. The Jewish doctors add, that the waters had this effect upon the adulteress only in case the husband had never offended in the same kind; but that, if he had at any time defiled the marriage-bed, God did not thus right him against his injurious wife; and that, therefore, in the latter and degenerate ages of the Jewish church, when uncleanness did abound, this way of trial was generally disused and laid aside: men, knowing their own crimes, were content not to know their wives' crimes. And to this, perhaps, may refer the threatening, (Hos. 4. 14.) I will not punish your spouses when they commit adultery, for yourselves are separated with whores.

2. If she was innocent, the water she drank would be physic to her; (v. 28.) She shall be free, and shall conceive seed. The Jewish writers magnify the good effects of this water to the innocent woman; that, to recompense for her the wrong done to her by the suspicion, she should, after the drinking of these waters, be stronger, and look better, than ever; if she was sickly, she should become healthful, should bear a man-child, and have easy labour.

From the whole we may learn, (1.) That secret sins are known to God, and sometimes are strangely brought to light in this life; however, there is a day coming when God will, by Jesus Christ, as here by the priest, judge the secrets of men according to the gospel, Rom. 2. 16. (2.) That, in particular, Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge. The violation of conjugal faith and chastity is highly provoking to the God of heaven, and sooner or later it will be reckoned for. Though we have not now the waters of jealousy to be a sensible terror to the unclean, yet we have a word from God, which ought to be as great a terror, that, if any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy, 1 Cor. 3. 17. (3.) That God will find out some way or other to clear the innocency of the innocent, and to bring forth their righteousness as the light. (4.) That to the pure all things are pure, but to the defiled nothing is so, Tit. 1. 15. The same word is to some a savour of life unto life, to others a savour of death unto death, like those waters of jealousy, according as they receive it; the same providence is for good to some, and for hurt to others, Jer. 24. 5, 8, 9. And, whatsoever it is intended for, it shall not return void.

CHAP. VI.

In this chapter, we have, I. The law concerning Nazarites. 1. What it was which the vow of a Nazarite obliged him to, v. 1. . 8. 2. A remedial law, in case a Nazarite happened to be polluted by the touch of a dead body, v. 9. . 12. 3. The solemnity of his discharge when his time was up, v. 13. . 21. II. Instructions given to the priests how they should bless the people, v. 22. . 27.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When either a man or woman shall separate themselves to vow a vow of a Nazarite, to separate themselves unto the LORD: 3. He shall separate himself from wine and strong drink, and shall drink no vinegar of wine, or vinegar of strong drink, neither shall he drink any liquor of grapes, nor eat moist grapes, or dried. 4. All the days of his separation shall he eat nothing that is made of the vine-tree, from the kernels even to the husk. 5. All the days of the vow of his separation there shall no razor come upon his head: until the days be fulfilled, in the which he separateth himself unto the LORD, he shall be holy, and shall let the locks of the hair of his head grow. 6. All the days that he separateth himself unto the LORD he shall come at no dead body. 7. He shall not make himself unclean for his father, or for his mother, for his brother, or for his sister, when they die: because the consecration of his God is upon his head. 8. All the days of his separation be is holy unto the LORD. 9. And if any man die very suddenly by him, and he hath defiled the head of his consecration; then he shall shave his head in the day of his cleansing, on the seventh day shall he shave it. 10. And on the eighth day he shall bring two turtles, or two young pigeons, to the priest, to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: 11. And the priest shall offer the one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering, and make an atonement for him, for that he sinned by the dead, and shall hallow his head that same day. 12. And he shall consecrate unto the LORD the days of his separation, and shall bring a lamb of the first year for a trespass-offering: but the days that were before shall be lost, because his separation was defiled. 13. And this is the law of the Nazarite, when the days of his separation are fulfilled: He shall be brought unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: 14. And he shall offer his offering unto the LORD, one he-lamb of the first year without blemish for a burnt-offering, and one ewe-lamb of the first year without blemish for a sin-offering, and one ram without blemish for peace-offerings, 15. And a basket of unleavened bread, cakes of fine flour mingled with oil, and wafers of unleavened bread anointed with oil, and their meat-offering, and their drink-offerings. 16. And the priest shall bring them before the LORD, and shall offer his sin-offering, and his burnt-offering: 17. And he shall offer the ram for a sacrifice of peace-offerings unto the LORD, with the basket of unleavened bread: the priest shall offer also his meat-offering, and his drink-offering. 18. And the Nazarite shall shave the head of his separation at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and shall take the hair of the head of his separation, and put it in the fire which is under the sacrifice of the peace-offerings. 19. And the priest shall take the sodden shoulder of the ram, and one unleavened cake out of the basket, and one unleavened wafer, and shall put them upon the hands of the Nazarite, after the hair of his separation is shaven: 20. And the priest shall wave them for a wave-offering before the LORD: this is holy for the priest, with the wave-breast and heave shoulder: and after that the Nazarite may drink wine. 21. This is the law of the Nazarite who hath vowed, and of his offering unto the LORD for his separation, beside that that his hand shall get: according to the vow which he vowed, so he must do after the law of his separation.

After the law for the discovery and shame of those that by sin had made themselves vile, fitly follows this for the direction and encouragement of those that by their eminent piety and devotion had made themselves honourable, and distinguished themselves from their neighbours. It is very probable that there were those, before the making of this law, who went under the character of Nazarites, and were celebrated by that title as persons professing greater strictness and zeal in religion than other people; for the vow of a Nazarite is spoken of here as a thing already well-known, but the obligation of it is reduced to a greater certainty than hitherto it had been. Joseph is called a Nazarite among his brethren, (Gen. 49. 26.) not only because separate from them, but because eminent among them. Observe,

I. The general character of a Nazarite; it is a person separated unto the Lord, v. 2. Some were Nazarites for life, either by divine designation, as Samson, (Judg. 13. 5.) and John Baptist, (Luke, 1. 15.) or by their parents' vow concerning them, as Samuel, 1 Sam. 1. 11. Of these this law speaks not. Others were so for a certain time, and by their own voluntary engagement, and concerning them rules are given by this law. A woman might bind herself with the vow of a Nazarite, under the limitations we find, ch. 30. 3. where the vow which the woman is supposed to vow unto the Lord seems to be meant especially of this vow. The Nazarites were, 1. Devoted to the Lord during the time of their Nazariteship, and, it is probable, spent much of their time in the study of the law, in acts of devotion, and instructing others. An air of piety was therefore put upon them, and upon their whole conversation. 2. They were separated from common persons and common things. Those that are consecrated to God must not be conformed to this world. They distinguished themselves, not only from others, but from what they themselves were before and after. 3. They separated themselves by vowing a vow; every Israelite was bound by the divine law to love God with all his heart, but the Nazarites by their own act and deed bound themselves to some religious observances, as fruits and expressions of that love, which other Israelites were not bound to. Some such there were whose spirits God stirred up to be in their day the ornaments of the church, the standard-bearers of religion, and patterns of piety. It is spoken of as a great favour to their nation, that God raised up their young men for Nazarites, Amos, 2. 11. The Nazarites were known in the streets, and respected as purer than snow, whiter than milk, Lam. 4. 7. Christ was called in reproach a Nazarene, so were his followers, but he was no Nazarite according to this law, he drank wine, and touched dead bodies, yet in him this type had its accomplishment, for in him all purity and perfection met; and every true Christian is a spiritual Nazarite separated by vow unto the Lord. We find St. Paul, by the persuasion of his friends, in complaisance to the Jews, submitting to this law of the Nazarites; but, at the same time, it is declared that the Gentiles should observe no such thing, Acts, 21. 24, 25. It was looked upon as a great honour to a man to be a Nazarite, and therefore, if a man speak of it as a punishment, saying, for instance, "I will be a Nazarite rather than do so or so," he is (say the Jews) a wicked man; but he that vows unto the Lord in the way of holiness to be a Nazarite, lo, the crown of his God is upon his head.

II. The particular obligations that the Nazarites lay under; that the families of superstitious men might not multiply their restraints endlessly, God himself lays down the law for them, and gives them the rule of their profession.

1. They must have nothing to do with the fruit of the vine, v. 3, 4. They must drink no wine nor strong drink, nor eat grapes, not the kernel of the husk; they might not so much as eat a raisin. The learned Dr. Lightfoot has a conjecture, (Hor. Heb. in Luc. 1. 15.) that, as the ceremonial pollutions, by leprosy and otherwise, represented the sinful state of fallen man, so the institution of the order of Nazarites was designed to represent the pure and perfect state of man in innocency; and that the tree of knowledge, forbidden to Adam, was the vine, and for that reason it was forbidden to the Nazarites, and all the produce of it. They who gave the Nazarites wine to drink did the tempter's work, (Amos, 2. 12.) persuading them to that forbidden fruit. That it was reckoned a perfection and praise not to drink wine, appears from the instance of the Rechabites, Jer. 35. 6. They were to drink no wine; (1.) That they might be examples of temperance and mortification. Those that separate themselves to God and to his honour must not gratify the desires of the body, but keep that under and bring it into subjection. Drinking a little wine for the stomach's sake is allowed, to help that, 1 Tim. 5. 23. But drinking much wine for the palate's sake, to please that, does by no means become those who profess to walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. (2.) That they might be qualified to employ themselves in the service of God. They must not drink, lest they forget the law, (Prov. 31. 5.) lest they should err through wine, Isa. 28. 7. Let all Christians oblige themselves to be very moderate in the use of wine and strong drink; for if the love of these once get the mastery of a man, he becomes a very easy prey to Satan. It is observable, that, because they were to drink no wine, (which was the thing mainly intended,) they were to eat nothing that came of the vine, to teach us with the utmost care and caution to avoid sin, and every thing that borders upon it and leads to it, or may be a temptation to us. Abstain from all appearance of evil, 1 Thess. 5. 22.

2. They must not cut their hair, v. 5. They must neither poll their heads, nor shave their beards; this was that mark of Samson's Nazariteship, which we often read of in his story. Now, (1.) This signified a noble neglect of the body and the ease and ornament of it, which became those who, being separated to God, ought to be wholly taken up with their souls, to secure their peace and beauty. It signified that they had, for the present, renounced all sorts of sensual pleasures and delights, and resolved to live a life of self-denial and mortification. Mephibosheth in sorrow trimmed not his beard, 2 Sam. 19. 24. (2.) Some observe, that long hair is spoken of as a badge of subjection, 1 Cor. 11. 5, &c. So that the long hair of the Nazarites denoted their subjection to God, and their putting themselves under his dominion. (3.) By this they were known to all that met them to be Nazarites, and so it commanded respect. It made them look great without art; it was nature's crown to the head, and a testimony for them, that they had preserved their purity. For, if they had been defiled, their hair must have been cut, v. 9. See Jer. 7. 29.

3. They must not come near any dead body, v. 6, 7. Others might touch dead bodies, and contracted only a ceremonial pollution by it for some time; some must do it, else the dead must be unburied, but the Nazarites must not do it, upon pain of forfeiting all the honour of their Nazariteship. They must not attend the funeral of any relation, no not father or mother, any more than the high priest himself, because the consecration of his God is upon his head. Those that separate themselves to God must learn, (1.) To distinguish themselves, and do more than others. (2.) To keep their consciences pure from dead works, and not to touch the unclean thing. The greater profession of religion we make, and the more eminent we appear, the greater care we must take to avoid all sin, for we have so much the more honour to lose by it. (3.) To moderate their affections even to their near relations, so as not to let their sorrow for the loss of them break in upon their joy in God, and submission to his will. See Matth. 8. 21, 22.

4. All the days of their separation they must be holy to the Lord, v. 8. This was the meaning of those external observances, and without this they were of no account. The Nazarites must be devoted to God, employed for him, and their minds intent upon him; they must keep themselves pure in heart and life, and be in every thing conformable to the divine image and will; this is to be holy, this is to be a Nazarite indeed.

III. The provision that was made for the cleansing of a Nazarite, if he happened unavoidably to contract a ceremonial pollution by the touch of a dead body. No penalty is ordered by this law for the wilful breach of the foregoing laws, for it was not supposed that a man, who had so much religion as to make that vow, could have so little as to break it presumptuously; nor could it be supposed that he should drink wine, or have his hair cut, but by his own fault; but purely by the providence of God, without any fault of his own, he might be near a dead body, and that is the case put, (v. 9.) If a man die very suddenly by him, he has defiled the head of his consecration. Note, Death sometimes takes men away very suddenly, and without any previous warning. A man might be well and dead in so little a time, that the most careful Nazarite could not avoid being polluted by the dead body; so short a step is it sometimes, and so soon taken, from time to eternity. God prepare us for sudden death!

In this case, 1. He must be purified from the ceremonial pollution he had contracted, as others must, upon the seventh day, v. 9. Nay, more was required for the purifying of the Nazarite, than of any other person that had touched a dead body; he must bring a sin-offering and a burnt-offering, and an atonement must be made for him, v. 10, 11. This teaches us, that sins of infirmity, and the faults we are overtaken in by surprise, must be seriously repented of, and that an application must be made of the virtue of Christ's sacrifice to our souls for the forgiveness of them every day, 1 John, 2. 1, 2. It teaches us also, that, if those who make an eminent profession of religion do any thing to sully the reputation of their profession, more is expected from them than others, for the retrieving both of their peace and of their credit. 2. He must begin the days of his separation again; for all that were past before his pollution, though coming ever so near the period of his time set, were lost, and not reckoned to him, v. 12. This obliged them to be very careful not to defile themselves by the dead, for that was the only thing that made them lose their time, and it teaches us, that if a righteous man turn away from his righteousness, and defile himself with dead works, all his righteousness that he has done shall be lost to him, Ezek. 33. 13. It is all lost, all in vain, if he do not persevere, Gal. 3. 4. He must begin again, and do his first works.

IV. The law for the solemn discharge of a Nazarite from his vow, when he had completed the time he fixed to himself; before the expiration of that term he could not be discharged; before he vowed, it was in his own power, but it was too late after the vow to make inquiry; the Jews say, that the time of a Nazarite's vow could not be less than thirty days; and if a man said, "I will be a Nazarite but for two days," yet he was bound for thirty; but it should seem Paul's vow was for only seven days, Acts, 21. 27. Or rather, then he observed the ceremony of finishing that vow of Nazariteship, from which, being at a distance from the temple, he had discharged himself some years before at Cenchrea, only by the ceremony of cutting his hair, Acts, 18. 18.

When the time of the vowed separation was out, he was to be made free, 1. Publicly at the door of the tabernacle, (v. 13.) that all might take notice of the finishing of his vow, and none might be offended, if they saw him now drink wine, who had so lately refused. 2. It was to be done with sacrifices, v. 14. Lest he should think that by this eminent piece of devotion he had made God a Debtor to him, he is appointed, even when he had finished his vow, to bring an offering to God; for when we have done our utmost in duty to God, still we must own ourselves behind-hand with him. He must bring one of each sort of the instituted offerings. (1.) A burnt-offering, as an acknowledgment of God's sovereign dominion over him and all he had, still, notwithstanding his discharge from this particular vow. (2.) A sin-offering. This, though mentioned second, (v. 14.) yet seems to have been offered first, (v. 16.) for atonement must be made for our sins, before any of our sacrifices can be accepted. And it is very observable, that even the Nazarite, that in the eye of men was purer than snow, and whiter than milk, yet durst not appear before the holy God without a sin-offering. Though he had fulfilled the vow of his separation without any pollution, yet he must bring a sacrifice for sin; for there is guilt insensibly contracted by the best of men, even in their best works; some good omitted, some ill admitted, which, if we were dealt with in strict justice, would be our ruin; and in consequence of which it is necessary for us to receive the atonement, and plead it as our righteousness before God. (3.) A peace-offering, in thankfulness to God, who had enabled him to fulfil his vow, and in supplication to God for grace to preserve him from ever doing any thing unbecoming one that had been once a Nazarite; remembering, that, though he was now freed from the bonds of his vow, he still remained under the bonds of the divine law. (4.) To those were added the meat-offerings, and drink-offerings, according to the manner, (v. 15, 17.) for these always accompanied the burnt-offerings and peace-offerings; and, beside those, a basket of unleavened cakes and wafers. (5.) Part of the peace-offering, with a cake and wafer, was to be waved for a wave-offering: (v. 19, 20.) and this was a gratuity to the priest, who had it for his pains, after it had been first presented to God. (6.) Beside all this, he might bring his free-will-offerings, such as his hand shall get, v. 21. More than this he might bring, but not less. And, to grace the solemnity, it was common upon this occasion to have their friends to be at charges with them, Acts, 21, 24. Lastly, One ceremony more was appointed, which was like the cancelling of the bond when the condition is performed, and that was the cutting off his hair; which and been suffered to grow all the time of his being a Nazarite, and burning it in the fire over which the peace-offerings were boiling, v. 13. This intimated that his full performance of his vow was acceptable to God in Christ the great Sacrifice, and not otherwise. Learn hence to vow and pay to the Lord our God, for he has no pleasure in fools.

22. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 23. Speak unto Aaron and unto his sons, saying, On this wise ye shall bless the children of Israel, saying unto them, 24. The LORD bless thee, and keep thee: 25. The LORD make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: 26. The LORD lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace. 27. And they shall put my name upon the children of Israel: and I will bless them.

Here,

1. The priests, among other good offices which they were to do, are appointed solemnly to bless the people in the name of the Lord, v. 23. It was part of their work, Deut. 21. 5. Hereby God put an honour upon the priests, for the less is blessed of the better; and hereby he gave great comfort and satisfaction to the people, who looked upon the priest as God's mouth to them. Though the priest of himself could do no more than beg a blessing, yet being an intercessor by office, and doing that in His name who commands the blessing, the prayer carried with it a promise, and he pronounced it as one having authority, with his hands lifted up, and his face toward the people. Now, (1.) This was a type of Christ's errand into the world, which was to bless us, (Acts, 3. 26.) as the High Priest of our profession. The last thing he did on earth was, with up-lifted hand, to bless his disciples, Luke, 24. 50, 51. The learned Bishop Pierson observes it as a tradition of the Jews, that the priests blessed the people only at the close of the morning-sacrifice, not of the evening-sacrifice, to shew (says he) that in the last days, the days of the Messiah, which are (as it were) the evening of the world, the benediction of the law should cease, and the blessing of Christ should take place. (2.) It was a pattern to gospel-ministers, the masters of assemblies, who are in like manner to dismiss their solemn assemblies with a blessing. The same that are God's mouth to his people, to teach and command them, are his mouth likewise to bless them; and they that receive the law shall receive the blessing. The Hebrew doctors warn the people that they say not, "What availeth the blessing of this poor simple priest?" "For," say they, "the receiving of the blessing depends, not on the priest, but on the holy blessed God."

2. A form of blessing is here prescribed them in their other devotions; but this being God's command concerning benediction, that it might not look like any thing of their own, he puts the very words in their mouths, v. 24. 26. Where observe, (1.) That the blessing is commanded upon each particular person, The Lord bless thee. They must each of them prepare themselves to receive the blessing, and then they should find enough in it to make them every man happy; Blessed shalt thou be, Deut. 28. 3. If we take the law to ourselves, we may take the blessing to ourselves, as if our names were inserted. (2.) That the name Jehovah is three times repeated in it, and (as the critics observe) each with a different accent, in the original; the Jews themselves think there is some mystery, and we know what it is, the New Testament having explained it, which directs us to expect the blessing from the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of the Father, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, each of which persons is Jehovah, and yet they are "not three Lords, but one Lord," 2 Cor. 13. 14. (3.) That the favour of God is all in all in this blessing, for that is the fountain of all good. [1.] The Lord bless thee! Our blessing God is only our speaking well of him, his blessing us is doing well for us; those whom he blesses are blessed indeed. [2.] The Lord make his face shine upon thee! Alluding to the shining of the sun upon the earth, to enlighten and comfort it, and to renew the face of it. "The Lord love thee, and make thee to know that he loves thee." We cannot but be happy if we have God's love; and we cannot but be easy, if we know that we have it. [3.] The Lord lift up his countenance upon thee! This is to the same purport with the former, and it seems to allude to the smiles of a father upon his child, or of a man upon his friend, whom he takes pleasure in. If God give us the assurances of his special favour and his acceptance of us, that will put gladness into the heart, Ps. 4. 7, 8. (4.) That the fruits of this favour, conveyed by this blessing, are, protection, pardon, and peace. [1.] Protection from evil, v. 24. The Lord keep thee, for it is he that keeps Israel, and neither slumbers nor sleeps, Ps. 121. 4. And all believers are kept by the power of God. [2.] Pardon of sin, v. 25. The Lord be gracious, or merciful, unto thee. [3.] Peace, (v. 26.) including all that good which goes to make up a complete happiness.

3. God here promises to ratify and confirm the blessing, (v. 27.) They shall put my name upon the children of Israel. God gives them leave to make use of his name in blessing the people, and to bless them as his people, called by his name. This included all the blessings they could pronounce upon them, to mark them for God's peculiar, the people of his choice and love. God's name upon them was their honour, their comfort, their safety, their plea; We are called by thy name, leave us not. It is added, and I will bless them. Note, A divine blessing goes along with divine institutions, and puts virtue and efficacy into them. What Christ says of the peace, is true of the blessing; when God's ministers pronounce the blessing, "Peace be to this congregation," if the sons of peace and heirs of blessing be there, the peace, the blessing, shall rest upon them, Luke, 10. 5, 6. For in every place where God records his name, he will meet his people and bless them.

CHAP. VII.

God having set up house (as it were) in the midst of the camp of Israel, the princes of Israel here come a visiting with their presents, as tenants to their Landlord, in the name of their respective tribes. They brought presents, I. Upon the dedication of the tabernacle, for the service of that, v. 1. 9. II. Upon the dedication of the altar, for the use of that, v. 19. 88. And, III. God graciously signified his acceptance of what was done, v. 89. The two foregoing chapters were the records of additional laws which God gave to Israel, this is the history of the additional services which Israel performed to God.

1. AND it came to pass on the day that Moses had fully set up the tabernacle, and had anointed it, and sanctified it, and all the instruments thereof, both the altar and all the vessels thereof, and had anointed them, and sanctified them; 2. That the princes of Israel, heads of the house of their fathers, who were the princes of the tribes, and were over them that were numbered, offered: 3. And they brought their offering before the LORD, six covered waggons, and twelve oxen; a waggon for two of the princes, and for each one an ox: and they brought them before the tabernacle. 4. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 5. Take it of them, that they may be to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation; and thou shalt give them unto the Levites, to every man according to his service. 6. And Moses took the waggons and the oxen, and gave them unto the Levites. 7. Two waggons and four oxen he gave unto the sons of Gershon, according to their service: 8. And four waggons and eight oxen he gave unto the sons of Merari, according unto their service, under the hand of Ithamar the son of Aaron the priest. 9. But unto the sons of Kohath he gave none: because the service of the sanctuary belonging unto them was that they should bear upon their shoulders.

Here is the offering of the princes to the service of the tabernacle. Observe,

1. When it was; not till it was fully set up, v. 1. When all things were done, both about the tabernacle itself, and the camp of Israel which surrounded it, according to the directions given, then they began their presents; probably, about the eighth day of the second month. Note, Necessary observances must always take place of freewill-offerings: first those, and then these.

2. Who they were that offered; The princes of Israel, heads of the house of their fathers, v. 2. Note, Those that are above others in power and dignity, ought to go before others, and endeavour to go beyond them, in every thing that is good. The more any are advanced, the more is expected from them, for the greater opportunity they have of serving God and their generation. What are wealth and authority good for, but as they enable a man to do so much the more good in the world?

3. What they offered; six waggons, with each of them a yoke of oxen to draw them, v. 3. Doubtless, these waggons were agreeable to the rest of the furniture of the tabernacle and its appurtenances, the best of the kind, like the carriages which great princes use, when they go in procession. Some think that God, by Moses, intimated to them what they should bring; or their own consideration perhaps suggested to them to make this present. Though God's wisdom had ordained all the essentials of the tabernacle, yet it seems these accidental conveniencies were left to be provided by their own discretion, which was to set in order that which was wanting, (Tit. 1. 5.) and these waggons were not refused, though no pattern of them was shewn to Moses in the mount. Note, It must not be expected that the divine institution of ordinances should descend to all those circumstances which are determinable, and are fit to be left alterable, by human prudence, that wisdom which is profitable to direct. Observe, No sooner is the tabernacle fully set up, than this provision is made for the removal of it. Note, Even when we are but just settled in the world, and think we are beginning to take root, we must be preparing for changes and removes, especially for the great change. When we are here in this world, every thing must be accommodated to a militant and moveable state. While the tabernacle was framing, the princes were very generous in their offerings, for then they brought precious stones, and stones to be set, (Exod. 35. 27.) yet now they bring more presents. Note, Those that have done good should study to abound therein yet more and more, and not be weary of well-doing.

4. How their offering was disposed of, and what use was made of it; the waggons and oxen were given to the Levites, to be used in carrying the tabernacle; both for their ease, (for God would not have any of his servants over-burthened with work,) and for the more safe and right conveyance of the several parts of the tabernacle, which would be best kept together, and sheltered from the weather, in waggons. (1.) The Gershonites, that had the light carriage, the curtains and hangings, had but two waggons, and two yoke of oxen; (v. 7.) when they had loaded those, they must carry the rest, if any remained, upon their shoulders. (2.) The Merarites, that had the heavy carriage, and that which was most unwieldy, the boards, pillars, sockets, &c. had four waggons, and four yoke of oxen allotted them; (v. 8.) and yet, if they had not more waggons of their own, they would be obliged to carry a great deal upon their backs too, for the silver sockets alone weighed a hundred talents, which was above four ton, and that was enough to load four waggons that were drawn but by one yoke of oxen apiece. But each socket being a talent weight, which is about a man burthen, (as appears, 2 Kings, 5. 23.) probably they carried those on their backs, and put the boards and pillars into the waggons. Observe here, how God wisely and graciously ordered the most strength to those that had the most work. Each had waggons according to their service. Whatever burthen God in his providence lays upon us, he will, by his sufficient grace, proportion the strength to it, 1 Cor. 10. 13. (3.) The Kohathites, that had the most sacred carriage, had no waggons at all, because they were to carry their charge upon their shoulders, (v. 9.) with a particular care and veneration. When in David's time they carried the ark in a cart, God made them to know, to their terror, by the death of Uzza, that they did not seek him in the due order. See 1 Chron. 15. 13.

10. And the princes offered for dedicating of the altar in the day that it was anointed, even the princes offered their offering before the altar.

11. And the Lord said unto Moses, They shall offer their offering, each prince on his day, for the dedicating of the altar. 12. And he that offered his offering the first day was Nashson the son of Amminadab, of the tribe of Judah: 13. And his offering was one silver charger, the weight thereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them were full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering: 14. One spoon of ten shekels of gold, full of incense: 15. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt-offering: 16. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering: 17. And for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Nahshon the son of Amminadab. 18. On the second day Nethaneel the son of Zuar, prince of Issachar, did offer: 19. He offered for his offering one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering: 20. One spoon of gold of ten shekels, full of incense: 21. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt-offering: 22. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering: 23. And for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Nethaneel the son of Zuar. 24. On the third day Eliab the son of Helon, prince of the children of Zebulun, did offer: 25. His offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering: 26. One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: 27. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt-offering: 28. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering: 29. And for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Eliab the son of Helon. 30. On the fourth day Elizur the son of Shedeur, prince of the children of Reuben, did offer: 31. His offering was one silver charger of the weight of an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering: 32. One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: 33. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt-offering: 34. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering: 35. And for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Elizur the son of Shedeur. 36. On the fifth day Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai, prince of the children of Simeon, did offer: 37. His offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering: 38. One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: 39. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt-offering: 40. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering: 41. And for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai. 42. On the sixth day Eliasaph the son of Denel, prince of the children of Gad, offered: 43. His offering was one silver charger of the weight of an hundred and thirty shekels, a silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering: 44. One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: 45. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt-offering: 46. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering: 47. And for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Eliasaph the son of Denel. 48. On the seventh day Elishama the son of Ammihud, prince of the children of Ephraim, offered: 49. His offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering: 50. One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: 51. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt-offering: 52. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering: 53. And for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Elishama the son of Ammihud. 54. On the eighth day offered Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur, prince of the children of Manasseh: 55. His offering was one silver charger of the weight of an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering: 56. One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: 57. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt-offering: 58. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering: 59. And for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur. 60. On the ninth day Abidan the son of Gideoni, prince of the children of Benjamin, offered: 61. His offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering: 62. One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: 63. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt-offering: 64. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering: 65. And for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Abidan the son of Gideoni. 66. On the tenth day Ahiezer the son of Ammishaddai, prince of the children of Dan, offered: 67. His offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering: 68. One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: 69. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt-offering: 70. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering: 71. And for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Ahiezer the son of Ammishaddai. 72. On the eleventh day Pagiel the son of Ocran, prince of the children of Asher, offered: 73. His offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering: 74. One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: 75. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt-offering: 76. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering: 77. And for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Pagiel the son of Ocran. 78. On the twelfth day Ahira the son of Enan, prince of the children of Naphtali, offered: 79. His offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering: 30. One golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: 31. One young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt-offering: 32. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering: 33. And for a sacrifice of peace-offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Ahira the son of Enan. 34. This was the dedication of the altar, in the day when it was anointed by the princes of Israel: twelve chargers of silver, twelve silver bowls, twelve spoons of gold: 35. Each charger of silver weighing an hundred and thirty shekels, each bowl seventy: all the silver vessels weighed two thousand and four hundred shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary: 36. The golden spoons were twelve, full of incense, weighing ten shekels apiece, after the shekel of the sanctuary: all the gold of the spoons was an hundred and twenty shekels. 37. All the oxen for the burnt-offering were twelve bullocks, the rams twelve, the lambs of the first year twelve, with their meat-offering: and the kids of the goats for sin-offering twelve. 38. And all the oxen for the sacrifice of the peace-offerings were twenty and four bullocks, the rams sixty, the he-goats sixty, the lambs of the first year sixty. This was the dedication of the altar, after that it was anointed. 39. And when Moses was gone into the tabernacle of the congregation to speak with him, then he heard the voice of one speaking unto him from off the mercy-seat that was upon the ark of testimony, from between the two cherubims: and he spake unto him.

We have here an account of the great solemnity of dedicating the altars, both that of burnt-offerings, and that of incense: they had been sanctified before, when they were anointed, (Lev. 8. 10, 11.) but now they were handselled, as it were, by the princes, with their freewill-offerings. They began the use of them with rich presents, great expressions of joy and gladness, and extraordinary respect to those tokens of God's presence with them. Now observe here,

I. That the princes and great men were first and forwardest in the service of God. Those that are entitled to precedency should go before in good works, and that is true honour. Here is an example to the nobility and gentry, those that are in authority, and of the first rank in their country; they ought to improve their honour and power, their estate and interest, for the promoting of religion, and the service of God, in the places where they live. It is justly expected, that they who have more than others should do more good than others with what they have, else they are unfaithful stewards, and will not make up their account with joy. Nay, great men must not only with their wealth and power assist and protect those that serve God, but they must make conscience of being devout and religious themselves, and employing themselves in the exercises of piety, which will greatly redound to the honour of God, (Ps. 138. 4, 5.) and have a good influence upon others, who will be the more easily persuaded to the acts of devotion, when they see them thus brought into reputation. It is certain that the greatest of men is less than the least of the ordinances of God; nor are the meanest services of religion any disparagement to those that make the greatest figure in the world.

II. The offerings they brought were very rich and valuable; so rich, that some think there was not so great a difference in estate between them and others, as that they were able to bear the expence of them themselves, but that the heads of each tribe contributed to the offering which their prince brought.

1. They brought some things to remain for standing service: twelve large silver dishes, each about sixty ounces weight; as many large silver cups, or bowls, of about thirty-five ounces; the former to be used for the meat-offerings, the latter for the drink-offerings; the former for the flesh of the sacrifices, the latter for the blood. The latter was God's table, (as it were,) and it was fit that so great a King should be served in plate. The golden spoons, being filled with incense, were intended, it is probable, for the service of the golden altar, for both the altars were anointed at the same time. Note, In works of piety and charity, we ought to be generous according as our ability is. The Israelites indeed might well afford to part with their gold and silver in abundance to the service of the sanctuary, for they needed it not to buy meat, and victual their camp, who were daily fed with bread from heaven; nor did they need it to buy bread, or pay their army, who were shortly to be put in possession of Canaan.

2. They brought some things to be used immediately, offerings of each sort, burnt-offerings, sin-offerings, and a great many peace-offerings, (on part of which they were to feast with their friends,) and the meat-offerings that were to be annexed to them. Hereby they signified their thankful acceptance of, and cheerful submission to, all those laws concerning the sacrifices which God had lately by Moses delivered to them. And though it was a time of joy and rejoicing, yet it is observable that still in the midst of their sacrifices we find a sin-offering; since in our best services we are conscious to ourselves that there is a mixture of sin, it is fit that there should be even in our most joyful services a mixture of repentance. In all our approaches to God, we must by faith have an eye to Christ as the great Sin-offering, and make mention of him.

3. They brought their offerings each on a several day, in the order that they had been lately put into, so that the solemnity lasted twelve days. So God appointed, (v. 11.) They shall bring their offering, each prince on his day, and so they did. One sabbath must needs fall within the twelve days, if not two, but it should seem they did not intermit on the sabbath, for it was holy work, proper enough for a holy day. God appointed that it should thus be done on several days; (1.) That the solemnity might be prolonged, and so might be universally taken notice of by all Israel, and the remembrance of it more effectually preserved. (2.) That an equal honour might thereby be put upon each several tribe; in Aaron's breast-plate each had his precious stone, so in this offering each had his day. (3.) Thus it would be done more decently and in order; God's work should not be done confusedly, and in a hurry; take time, and we shall have done the sooner; or, at least, we shall have done the better. (4.) God hereby signified how much pleased he is, and how much pleased we should be, with the exercises of piety and devotion. The repetition of them should be a continual pleasure to us, and we must not be weary of well-doing. If extraordinary services come to be done for twelve days together, we must not shrink from it, nor call it a task and a burthen. (5.) The priests and Levites, having this occasion to offer the same sacrifices, and those some of every sort, every day, for so many days together, would have their hands well set in, and would be well versed in the laws concerning them. (6.) The peace-offerings were all to be eaten the same day they were offered, and two oxen, five rams, five he-goats, and five lambs, were enough for one day's festival; had there been more, especially if all had been brought on a day, there might have been danger of excess. The virtue of temperance must not be left, under pretence of the religion of feasting.

4. All their offerings were exactly the same, without any variation, though it is probable that neither the princes nor the tribes were all alike rich; but thus it was intimated that all the tribes of Israel had an equal share in the altar, and an equal interest in the sacrifices that were offered upon it. Though one tribe was posted more honourably in the camp than another, yet they and their services were all alike acceptable to God. Nor must we have the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ with respect to persons, Jam. 2. 1.

5. Nahshon, the prince of the tribe of Judah, offered first, because God had given that tribe the first post of honour in the camp; and the rest of the tribes acquiesced, and offered in the same order in which God had appointed them to encamp. Judah, of which tribe Christ came, first, and then the rest; thus, in the dedication of souls to God, every man is presented in his own order, Christ the First-Fruits, 1 Cor. 15. 23. Some observe that Nahshon is the only one that is not expressly called a prince, (v. 12.) which the Jews give this account of; he is not called a prince, that he might not be puffed up because he offered first; and all the others are called princes, because they (though some of them of the elder house) submitted, and offered after him. Or, because the title of Prince of Judah did more properly belong to Christ, for unto him shall the gathering of the people be.

6. Though the offerings were all the same, yet the account of them is repeated at large for each tribe, in the same words. We are sure there are no vain repetitions in scripture; what then shall we make of these repetitions? Might it not have served, to say of this noble jury, that the same offering which their foreman brought, each on his day brought likewise? No, God would have it specified for each tribe: and why so? (1.) It was for the encouragement of these princes, and of their respective tribes, that, each of their offerings being recorded at large, no slight might seem to be put upon them; for rich and poor meet together before God. (2.) It was for the encouragement of all generous acts of piety and charity, by letting us know that what is given is lent to the Lord, and he carefully records it, with every one's name prefixed to his gift, because what is so given he will pay again, and even a cup of cold water shall have its reward. He is not unrighteous, to forget either the cost or the labour of love, Heb. 6. 10. We find Christ taking particular notice of what was cast into the treasury, Mark, 12. 41. Though what is offered be but little, while it is according to our ability, though it be a contribution mixed with the charity of others, yet it shall be recorded, that it may be recompensed in the resurrection of the just.

7. The sum total is added at the foot of the account, (v. 84 . . 88.) to shew how much God was pleased with the mention of his free-will-offerings; and what a great deal it amounted to in the whole, when every prince brought in his quota! How greatly would the sanctuary of God be enriched and beautified, if all would in their places do their part towards it, by exemplary purity and devotion, extensive charity, and universal usefulness!

8. God signified his gracious acceptance of these presents that were brought him, by speaking familiarly to Moses, as a man speaks to his friend, from off the mercy-seat; (v. 89. ch. 12. 8.) and in speaking to him, he did in effect speak to all Israel, shewing them this token for good, Ps. 103. 7. Note, By this we may know that God hears and accepts our prayers, if he gives us grace to hear and receive his word, for thus our communion with him is maintained and kept up. I know not why we may not suppose, that, upon each of the days on which these offerings were brought, (probably, while the priests and offerers were feasting upon the peace-offerings,) Moses was in the tabernacle, receiving some of these laws and orders which we have already met with in this and the foregoing book. And here the excellent Bishop Patrick observes, that God's speaking to Moses thus by an audible articulate voice, as if he had been clothed with a body, might be looked upon as an earnest of the incarnation of the Son of God in the fulness of time, when the Word should be made flesh, and speak in the language of the sons of men. For however God at sundry times and in divers manners spake unto the fathers, he has in these last days spoken unto us by his Son. And that He who now spake to Moses, as the Shechinah or Divine Majesty, from between the cherubims, was the Eternal Word, the second Person in the Trinity, was the pious conjecture of many of the ancients; for all God's communion with man is by his Son, by whom he made the world, and rules the church, and who is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.

CHAP. VIII.

This chapter is concerning the lamps or lights of the sanctuary. I. The burning lamps in the candlestick, which the priests were charged to tend, v. 1. . 4. II. The living lamps, (if I may so call them,) the Levites, who, as ministers, were burning and shining lights. The ordination of the priests we had an account of, Lev. 8. Here we have an account of the ordination of the Levites, the inferior clergy. 1. How they were purified, v. 5. . 8. 2. How they were parted with by the people, v. 9, 10. 3. How they were presented to God in lieu of the first-born, v. 11. . 18. 4. How they were consigned to Aaron and his sons, to be ministers to them, v. 19. 5. How all these orders were daily executed, v. 20. . 22. And, lastly, The age appointed for their ministration, v. 23. . 26.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto Aaron, and say unto him, When thou lightest the lamps, the seven lamps shall give light over against the candlestick. 3. And Aaron did so; he lighted the lamps thereof over against the candlestick, as the LORD commanded Moses. 4. And this work of the candlestick was of beaten gold, unto the shaft thereof, unto the flowers thereof, was beaten work: according unto the pattern which the LORD had shewed Moses, so he made the candlestick.

Directions were given long before this for the making of the golden candlestick, (Exod. 25. 31.) and it was made according to the pattern shewed to Moses in the mount, Exod. 37. 17. But now it was that the lamps were first ordered to be lighted, when other things began to be used. Observe, 1. Who must light the lamps; Aaron himself, he lighted the lamps, v. 3. As the people's representative to God, he thus did the office of a servant in God's house, lighting his Master's candle; as the representative of God to the people, he thus gave them the significations of God's will and favour, thus expressed, (Ps. 13. 28.) Thou wilt light my candle; and thus Aaron himself was now lately directed to bless the people, The Lord make his face to shine upon thee, ch. 6. 25. The commandment is a lamp, Prov. 6. 23. The scripture is a light shining in a dark place, 2 Pet. 1. 19. And a dark place indeed even the church would be without it, as the tabernacle (which had no window in it) without the lamps. Now the work of ministers is to light these lamps, by expounding and applying the word of God. The priest lighted the middle lamp from the fire of the altar, and the rest of the lamps he lighted one from another, which (says Mr. Ainsworth) signifies that the fountain of all light and knowledge is in Christ, who has the seven spirits of God figured by the seven lamps of fire, (Rev. 4. 5.) but that, in the expounding of scripture, one passage must borrow light from another. He also supposes that seven being a number of perfection, by the seven branches of the candlestick is shewed the full perfection of the scriptures, which are able to make us wise to salvation. 2. To what end the lamps were lighted; that they might give light over against the candlestick, that is, to that part of the tabernacle where the table stood, with the shew-bread upon it, over against the candlestick. They were not lighted like tapers in an urn, to burn to themselves, but to give light to the other side of the tabernacle, for therefore candles are lighted, Matth. 5. 15. Note, The lights of the world, the lights of the church, must shine as lights. Therefore we have light, that we may give light.

5. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 6. Take the Levites from among the children of Israel, and cleanse them. 7. And thus shalt thou do unto them, to cleanse them: Sprinkle water of purifying upon them, and let them shave all their flesh, and let them wash their clothes, and so make themselves clean. 8. Then let them take a young bullock with his meat-offering, even fine flour mingled with oil, and another young bullock shalt thou take for a sin-offering. 9. And thou shalt bring the Levites before the tabernacle of the congregation: and thou shalt gather the whole assembly of the children of Israel together: 10. And thou shalt bring the Levites before the LORD: and the children of Israel shall put their hands upon the Levites: 11. And Aaron shall offer the Levites before the LORD for an offering of the children of Israel, that they may execute the service of the LORD. 12. And the Levites shall lay their hands upon the heads of the bullocks: and thou shalt offer the one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering, unto the LORD, to make an atonement for the Levites. 13. And thou shalt set the Levites before Aaron, and before his sons, and offer them for an offering unto the LORD. 14. Thus shalt thou separate the Levites from among the children of Israel: and the Levites shall be mine. 15. And after that shall the Levites go in to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation: and thou shalt cleanse them, and offer them for an offering. 16. For they are wholly given unto me from among the children of Israel: instead of such as open every womb, even instead of the first-born of all the children of Israel, have I taken them unto me. 17. For all the first-born of the children of Israel are mine, both man and beast: on the day that I smote every first-born in the land of Egypt, I sanctified them for myself. 18. And I have taken the Levites for all the first-born of the children of Israel. 19. And I have given the Levites as a gift to Aaron and to his sons from among the children of Israel, to do the service of the children of Israel in the tabernacle of the congregation, and to make an atonement for the children of Israel: that there be no plague among the children of Israel, when the children of Israel come nigh unto the sanctuary. 20. And Moses, and Aaron, and all the congregation of the children of Israel, did to the Levites according unto all that the LORD commanded Moses concerning the Levites, so did the children of Israel unto them. 21. And the Levites were purified, and they washed their clothes; and Aaron offered them as an offering before the LORD; and Aaron made an atonement for them to cleanse them. 22. And after that went the Levites in to do their service in the tabernacle of the congregation before Aaron, and before his sons: as the LORD had commanded Moses concerning the Levites, so did they unto them. 23. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 24. This is it that belongeth unto the Levites: from twenty and five years old and upward they shall go in to wait upon the service of the tabernacle of the congregation: 25. And from the age of fifty years they shall cease waiting upon the service thereof, and shall serve no more: 26. But shall minister with their brethren in the tabernacle of the congregation, to keep the charge, and shall do no service. Thus shalt thou do unto the Levites touching their charge.

We read before of the separating of the Levites from among the children of Israel when they were numbered, and the numbering of them by themselves, (ch. 3. 6, 15.) that they might be employed in the service of the tabernacle. Now here we have directions given for their solemn ordination, (v. 6.) and the performance of it, v. 20. All Israel must know that they took not this honour to themselves, but were called of God to it; nor was it enough that they were distinguished from their neighbours, but they must be solemnly devoted to God. Note, All that are employed for God must be dedicated to him, according as the degree of the employment is. Christians must be baptized, ministers must be ordained; we must first give ourselves unto the Lord, and then our services. Observe in what method this was done.

I. The Levites must be cleansed, and were so. The rites and ceremonies of their cleansing were to be performed, 1. By themselves. They must wash their clothes, and not only bathe, but shave all their flesh, as the leper was to do when he was cleansed, Lev. 14. 8. They must cause a razor to pass over all their flesh, to clear themselves from that defilement which would not wash off. Jacob, whom God loved, was a smooth man; it was Esau that was hairy. The great pains they were to take with themselves, to make themselves clean, teaches all Christians, and ministers particularly, by repentance and mortification, to cleanse themselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, that they may perfect holiness. They must be clean that bear the vessels of the Lord. 2. By Moses. He must sprinkle the water of purifying upon them, which was prepared by divine direction. This signified the application of the blood of Christ to our souls by faith, to purify us from an evil conscience, that we may be fit to serve the living God. It is our duty to cleanse ourselves, and God's promise that he will cleanse us.

II. The Levites, being thus prepared, must be brought before the Lord in a solemn assembly of all Israel, and the children of Israel must put their hands upon them; (v. 10.) so transferring their interest in them and in their service (to which, as a part, the whole body of the people was entitled) to God and to his sanctuary. They presented them to God as living sacrifices, holy and acceptable, to perform a reasonable service; and therefore, as the offerers in all other cases did, they laid their hands upon them, desiring that their service might be accepted in lieu of the attendance of the whole congregation, particularly the first-born, which they acknowledge God might have insisted on. This will not serve to prove a power in the people to ordain ministers; for this imposition of hands by the children of Israel upon the Levites did not make them ministers of the sanctuary, but only signified the people's parting with that tribe out of their militia, and civil incorporations, in order to their being made ministers by Aaron, who was to offer them before the Lord. All the congregation of the children of Israel could not lay hands on them, but it is probable that the rulers and elders did it, as the representative body of the people. Some think that the first-born did it; because in their stead the Levites were consecrated to God. Whatever God calls for from us to serve his own glory by, we must cheerfully resign it; lay our hands upon it, not to detain it, but to surrender it, and let it go to Him that is entitled to it.

III. Sacrifices were to be offered for them; a sin-offering first, (v. 12.) and then a burnt-offering, to make an atonement for the Levites, who, as the parties concerned, were to lay their hands upon the head of the sacrifices. See here, 1. That we are all utterly unworthy, and unfit to be admitted into, and employed in, the service of God, till atonement be made for sin, and thereby our peace made with God. That interposing cloud must be scattered, before there can be any comfortable communion settled between God and our souls. 2. That it is by sacrifice, by Christ the great Sacrifice, that we are reconciled to God, and made fit to be offered to him. It is by him that Christians are sanctified to the work of their Christianity, and ministers to the work of their ministry. The learned Bishop Patrick's notion of the sacrifice offered by the Levites, is, that the Levites were themselves considered as an expiatory sacrifice, for they were given to make atonement for the children of Israel, (v. 19.) and yet not being devoted to death, any more than the first-born were, these two sacrifices were substituted in their stead, upon which therefore they were to lay their hands, that their sin, which the children of Israel laid upon them, (v. 10.) might be transferred to these beasts.

IV. The Levites themselves were offered before the Lord for an offering of the children of Israel, v. 11. Aaron gave them up to God, as being first given up by themselves, and by the children of Israel. The original word signifies a wave-offering, not that they were actually waved, but they were presented to God, as the God of heaven and the Lord of the whole earth, as the wave-offerings were. And, in calling them wave-offerings, it was intimated to them that they must continually lift up themselves toward God in his service, lift up their eyes, lift up their hearts, and must move to and fro with readiness in the business of their profession. They were not ordained to be idle, but to be active and stirring.

V. God here declares his acceptance of them, (v. 14.) The Levites shall be mine. God took them instead of the first-born, (v. 16. .18.) of which before, ch. 3. 41. Note, What is in sincerity offered to God shall be graciously owned and accepted by him. And his ministers, who have obtained mercy of him to be faithful, have particular marks of favour and honour put upon them; they shall be mine, and then (v. 15.) they shall go in to do the service of the tabernacle. God takes them for his own, that they may serve him. All that expect to share in the privileges of the tabernacle must resolve to do the service of the tabernacle. As, on the one hand, none of God's creatures are his necessary servants, (he needs not the service of any of them,) so, on the other hand, none are taken merely as honorary servants, to do nothing. All whom God owns he employs, angels themselves have their services.

VI. They are then given as a gift to Aaron and his sons, (v. 19.) yet so that as the benefit accrued to the children of Israel. 1. The Levites must act under the priests, as attendants on them, and assistants to them, in the service of the sanctuary. Aaron offers them to God, (v. 11.) and then God gives them back to Aaron, v. 19. Note, Whatever we give up to God he will give back to us, unspeakably to our advantage. Our hearts, our children, our estates, are never more our's, more truly, more comfortably our's, than when we have offered them up to God. 2. They must act for the people. They were taken to do the service of the children of Israel, that is, not only to do the service which they should do, but to serve their interests, and do that which would really redound to the honour, safety, and prosperity, of the whole nation. Note, They that faithfully perform the service of God do one of the best services that can be done to the public; God's ministers, while they keep within the sphere of their office, and conscientiously discharge the duty of it, must be looked upon as some of the most useful servants of their country. The children of Israel can as ill spare the tribe of Levi as any of their tribes. But what is the service they do the children of Israel? It follows, it is to make an atonement for them, that there be no plague among them. It was the priests' work to make atonement by sacrifice, but the Levites made atonement by attendance, and preserved the peace with heaven, which was made by sacrifice. If the service of the priests in the tabernacle had been left to all the first-born of Israel promiscuously, it would have been either neglected, or done unskillfully and irreverently, being done by those that were neither so closely tied to it, nor so diligently trained up to it, nor so constantly used to it, as the Levites were; and this would bring a plague among the children of Israel; meaning, perhaps, the death of the first-born themselves, which was the last and greatest of the plagues of Egypt. To prevent this, and to preserve the atonement, the Levites were appointed to do this service, who should be bred up to it under their parents from their infancy, and therefore would be well-versed in it; and so the children of Israel, that is, the first-born, should not need to come nigh to the sanctuary; or, when any Israelites had occasion, the Levites would be ready to instruct them, and introduce them, and so prevent any fatal miscarriage or mistake. Note, It is a very great kindness to the church, that ministers are appointed to go before them in the things of God, as guides, overseers, and rulers, in religious worship, and to make that their business. When Christ ascended on high, he gave these gifts, Eph. 4. 8, 11, 12.

VII. The time of their ministration is fixed. 1. They were to enter upon the service at 25 years old, v. 24. They were not charged with the carrying of the tabernacle, and the utensils of it, till they were thirty years old, ch. 4. 3. But they were entered to be otherwise servicable at 25 years old; a very good age for ministers to begin their public work at. The work then required that strength of body, and the work now requires that maturity of judgment and steadiness of behaviour, which men rarely arrive at till about that age: and novices are in danger of being lifted up with pride. 2. They were to have a writ of ease at 50 years old; then they were to return from the warfare, as the phrase is, (v. 25.) not cashiered with disgrace, but preferred rather to the rest which their age required, to be loaded with the honours of their office, as hitherto they had been with the burthens of it. They shall minister with their brethren in the tabernacle, to direct the junior Levites, and set them in; and they shall keep the charge, as guards upon the avenues of the tabernacle, to see that no stranger intruded, nor any person in his uncleanness, but they shall not be put upon any service which may be a fatigue to them. If God's grace provide that men shall have ability according to their work, man's prudence should take care that men have work only according to their ability. The aged are most fit for trusts, and to keep the charge, the younger are most fit for work, and to do the service. Those that have used the office of a servant well, purchase to themselves a good degree, 1 Tim. 3. 13. Yet indeed gifts are not tied to ages, (Job, 32. 9.) but all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit. Thus was the affair of the Levites settled.

CHAP. IX.

This chapter is, I. Concerning the great ordinance of the passover; 1. Orders are given for the observance of it, at the return of the year, v. 1. .5. 2. Provisions added for the case of such as should be ceremonially unclean, or otherwise disabled, at the time when the passover was to be kept, v. 6. .14. II. Concerning the great favour of the pillar of cloud, which was a guide to Israel through the wilderness, v. 15. .23.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, in the first month of the second year after they were come out of the land of Egypt, saying, 2. Let the children of Israel also keep the passover at his appointed season. 3. In the fourteenth day of this month, at even, ye shall keep it in his appointed season: according to all the rites of it, and according to all the ceremonies thereof, shall ye keep it. 4. And Moses spake unto the children of Israel, that they should keep the passover. 5. And they kept the passover on the fourteenth day of the first month at even in the wilderness of Sinai: ac-ording to all that the LORD commanded Moses, so did the children of Israel. 6. And there were certain men who were defiled by the dead body of a man, that they could not keep the passover on that day: and they came before Moses and before Aaron on that day: 7. And those men said unto him, We are defiled by the dead body of a man: wherefore are we kept back, that we may not offer an offering of the LORD in his appointed season among the children of Israel? 8. And Moses said unto them, Stand still, and I will hear what the LORD will command concerning you. 9. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 10. Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If any man of you or of your posterity shall be unclean by reason of a dead body, or be in a journey afar off, yet he shall keep the passover unto the LORD. 11. The fourteenth day of the second month at even they shall keep it, and eat it with unleavened bread and bitter herbs. 12. They shall leave none of it unto the morning, nor break any bone of it: according to all the ordinances of the passover they shall keep it. 13. But the man that is clean, and is not in a journey, and forbearth to keep the passover, even the same soul shall be cut off from his people: because he brought not the offering of the LORD in his appointed season, that man shall bear his sin. 14. And if a stranger shall sojourn among you, and will keep the passover unto the LORD; according to the ordinance of the passover, and according to the manner thereof, so shall he do: ye shall have one ordinance, both for the stranger, and for him that was born in the land.

Here we have,

I. An order given for the solemnization of the passover, the day twelvemonth after they came out of Egypt, on the fourteenth day of the first month of the second year, some days before they were numbered, for that was done in the beginning of the second month. Observe, 1. God gave particular orders for the keeping of this passover, otherwise (it should seem) they had not kept it, for, in the first institution of this ordinance, it was appointed to be kept when they should come into the land of promise, Exod. 12. 25. And, for aught that appears, after this, they kept no passover till they came to Canaan, Josh. 5. 10. This was an early indication of the abolishing of the ceremonial institutions at last, that, so soon after they were first appointed, some of them were suffered to lie asleep for so many years. The ordinance of the Lord's supper (which came in the room of the passover) was not thus intermitted or set aside, in the first days of the Christian church, though those were days of greater difficulty and distress than Israel knew in the wilderness; nay, in the times of persecution, the Lord's supper was celebrated more frequently than afterward. The Israelites in the wilderness could not forget their deliverance out of Egypt, their present state was a constant memorandum of it to them; all the danger was when they came to Canaan, there therefore they had need to be reminded of the rock out of which they were hewn. However, because the first passover was celebrated in a hurry, and was rather the substance itself than the sign, it was the will of God that at the return of the year, when they were more composed, and better acquainted with the divine law, they should observe it again, that their children might more distinctly understand the solemnity, and the better remember it hereafter. Calvin supposes that they were obliged to keep it now, and notes it as an instance of their carelessness, that they had need to be reminded of an institution which they so lately received. 2. Moses faithfully transmitted to the people the orders given him, v. 4. Thus St. Paul delivered to the churches what he received of the Lord concerning the gospel-passover, 1 Cor. 11. 23. Note, Magistrates must be monitors, and ministers must stir up men's minds by way of remembrance to that which is good. 3. The people observed the orders given them, v. 5. Though they had lately kept the feast of dedication, (ch. 7.) yet they did not desire to excuse themselves with that from keeping this feast. Note, Extraordinary performances must not supersede or jostle out our stated services. They kept the passover even in the wilderness: though our condition be solitary and unsettled, yet we must keep up our attendance on God by holy ordinances as we have opportunity, for in them we may find the best conversation, and the best repose. Thus is God's Israel provided for in a desert.

II. Instructions given concerning those that were ceremonially unclean, when they were to eat the passover. The law of the passover required every Israelite to eat of it; some subsequent laws had forbidden those that had contracted any ceremonial pollution to eat of the holy things; those whose minds and consciences are defiled by sin are utterly unfit for communion with God, and cannot partake, with any true comfort, of the gospel-passover, till they are cleansed by true repentance and faith: and a sad dilemma they are in; if they come not to holy ordinances, they are guilty of a contempt of them; if they do come in their pollution, they are guilty of a profanation of them. They must therefore wash, and then compass God's altar.

Now, 1. Here is the case that happened in Israel when this passover was to be kept. Certain men were defiled by the dead body of a man, (v. 6.) and they lay under that defilement seven days, (ch. 19. 11.) and in that time might not eat of the holy things, Lev. 7. 20. This was not their iniquity, but their infelicity; some persons must touch dead bodies, to bury them out of sight, and therefore they could, with the better grace, bring their complaint to Moses.

2. The application made to Moses by the persons concerned, v. 7. Note, It is people's wisdom, in difficult cases concerning sin and duty, to consult with their ministers whom God has set over them, and to ask the law at their mouth, Mal. 2. 7. These means we must use in pursuance of our prayers to God to lead us in a plain path. Observe with what trouble and concern these men complain that they were kept back from offering to the Lord. They did not complain of the law as unjust, but lamented their unhappiness, that they fell under the restraint of it at this time, and desired some expedient might be found out for their relief. Note, It is a blessed sight to see people hungering and thirsting after God's ordinances, and to hear them complaining of that which prevents their enjoyment of them. It should be a trouble to us, when by any occasion we are kept back from bringing our offering in the solemnities of a sabbath or a sacrament, as it was to David, when he was banished from the altar, Ps. 42. 1, 2.

3. The deliberation of Moses in resolving this case: here seemed to be law against law; and though it a rule that the latter law must explain the former, yet he pitied these Israelites, that were thus debarred the privilege of the passover, and therefore took time to consult the oracles, and to know what was the mind of God in this case; (v. 8.) I will hear what the Lord will command concerning you. Ministers must take example from thence in resolving cases of conscience. (1.) They must not determine rashly, but take time to consider, that every circumstance may be duly weighed, the case viewed in a true light, and spiritual things compared with spiritual. (2.) They must ask counsel of God's mouth, and not determine according to the bias of their own fancy or affection, but impartially, according to the mind of God, to the best of their knowledge. We have no such oracle to consult as Moses had, but we must have recourse to the law and the testimony, and speak according to that rule; and if, in difficult cases, we take time to spread the matter in particular before God by a humble believing prayer, we have reason to hope that the Spirit which is promised, to lead us into all truth, will enable us to direct others in the good and right way.

4. The directions which God gave in this case, and in other similar cases, explanatory of the law of the passover. This disagreeable accident produced good laws. (1.) Those that happened to be ceremonially unclean at the time when the passover should be eaten, were allowed to eat it that day month, when they were clean; so were those that happened to be in a journey afar off, v. 10, 11. See here, [1.] That when we are to attend upon God in solemn ordinances, it is very necessary both that we be clean, and that we be composed. [2.] That that may excuse the deferring of a duty for a time, which yet will not justify us in the total neglect and omission of it. He that is at variance with his brother may leave his gift before the altar, while he goes to be reconciled to his brother; but, when he has done his part towards it, whether it be effected or no, he must come again, and offer his gift, Matth. 5. 23, 24. This secondary passover was to be kept on the same day of the month with the first, because the ordinance was a memorial of their deliverance on that day of the month. Once we find the whole congregation keeping the passover, on this fourteenth day of the second month, in Hezekiah's time, (2 Chron. 30. 15.) which perhaps might help to account for the admission of some that were not clean to the eating of it; had the general passover been kept in the first month, the unclean might have been put off till the second; but that being kept in the second month, they had no warrant to eat it in the third month; and therefore, rather than not eat of it at all, they were admitted, though not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary, v. 19, 20. (2.) When the passover was observed in the second month, all the rites and ceremonies of it must strictly observed, v. 12. They must not think, that, because the time was dispensed with, any part of the solemnity of it might be abated; no, when we cannot do as we would, we must do the utmost we can, in the service of God. (3.) This allowance in a case of necessity should by no means countenance or indulge any in their neglect to keep the passover at the time appointed, when they were not under the necessity, v. 13. When a person is under no incapacity to eat the passover in the appointed time, if he neglects it then, upon the presumption of the liberty granted by this law, he puts an affront upon God, impiously abuses his kindness, and he shall certainly bear his sin, and be cut off from his people. Note, As those who against their minds are forced to absent themselves from God's ordinances, may comfortably expect the favours of God's grace under their affliction; so those who of choice absent themselves, may justly expect the tokens of God's wrath for their sin. Be not deceived, God is not mocked. (4.) Here is a clause added in favour of strangers, v. 14. Though it was requisite that the stranger, who would join with them in eating the passover, should be circumcised as a proselyte to their religion, (Exod. 12. 48, 49.) yet this kind admission of those that were not native Israelites to eat the passover, was an intimation of the favour designed for the poor Gentiles by Christ. As then there was one law, so in the days of the Messiah there should be one gospel, for the stranger, and for him that was born in the land; for, in every nation, he that fears God, and works righteousness, is accepted of him, and this was a truth before Peter perceived it, Acts, 10. 34, 35.

15. And on the day that the tabernacle was reared up the cloud covered the tabernacle, namely, the tent of the testimony: and at even there was upon the tabernacle as it were the appearance of fire until the morning. 16. So it was always: the cloud covered it by day, and the appearance of fire by night. 17. And when the cloud was taken up from the tabernacle, then after that the children of Israel journeyed: and in the place where the cloud abode, there the children of Israel pitched their tents. 18. At the commandment of the LORD the children of Israel journeyed, and at the commandment of the LORD they pitched: as long as the cloud abode upon the tabernacle they rested in their tents. 19. And when the cloud tarried long upon the tabernacle many days, then the children of Israel kept the charge of the LORD, and journeyed not. 20. And so it was, when the cloud was a few days upon the tabernacle; according to the commandment of the LORD they abode in their tents, and according to the commandment of the LORD they journeyed. 21. And so it was, when the cloud abode from even unto the morning, and that the cloud was taken up in the morning, then they journeyed: whether it was by day or by night that the cloud was taken up, they journeyed. 22. Or whether it were two days, or a month, or a year, that the cloud tarried upon the tabernacle, remaining thereon, the children of Israel abode in their tents, and journeyed not: but when it was taken up, they journeyed. 23. At the commandment of the LORD they rested in their tents, and at the commandment of the LORD they journeyed: they kept the charge of the LORD, at the commandment of the LORD by the hand of Moses.

We have here the history of the cloud; not a natural history, who knows the balancings of the clouds? but a divine history of a cloud that was appointed to be the visible sign and symbol of God's presence with Israel.

I. When the tabernacle was finished, this cloud, which before had hung on high over their camp, settled upon the tabernacle, and covered it, to shew that God manifests his presence with his people in and by his ordinances; there he makes himself known, and to them we must look, if we would see the beauty of the Lord, Ps. 27. 4. Ezek. 37. 26, 27. Thus God glorified his own appointments, and signified his acceptance of his people's love and obedience.

II. That which appeared as a cloud by day, appeared as a fire all night: had it been a cloud only, it had not been visible by night; and had it been a fire only, it would have been scarcely discernible by day; but God would give them sensible demonstrations of the constancy of his presence with them, and his care of them, and that he kept them night and day, Isa. 27. 3. Ps. 121. 6. And thus we are taught to set God always before us, and to see him near us both night and day. Something of the nature of that divine revelation which the Old-Testament church was governed by, might also be signified by these visible signs of God's presence, the cloud denoting the darkness, and the fire the terror, of that dispensation, in comparison with the more clear and comfortable discoveries God has made of his glory in the face of Jesus Christ.

III. This pillar of cloud and fire directed and determined all the motions, marches, and encampments, of Israel in the wilderness. I. As long as the cloud rested upon the tabernacle, so long they continued in the same place, and never stirred; though, no doubt, they were very desirous to be pressing forward in their journey toward Canaan, where they longed to be, and hoped to be quickly, yet as long as the cloud rested, if it were a month, or a year, so long they rested, v. 22. Note, He that believeth doth not make haste. There is no time lost, while we are waiting God's time. It is as acceptable a piece of submission to the will of God to sit still contentedly when our lot requires it, as to work for him when we are called to it. 2. When the cloud was taken up, they removed, however comfortably soever they were encamped, v. 17. Whether it moved by day or night, they delayed not to attend its motions, (v. 21.) and, probably, there were some appointed to stand centinel day and night within sight of it, to give timely notice to the camp of its beginning to stir, and this is called keeping the charge of the Lord. The people being thus kept at a constant uncertainty, and having no time fixed for stopping or removing, were obliged to hold themselves in constant readiness to march upon very short warning. And for the same reason we are kept at uncertainty concerning the time of our putting off the earthly house of this tabernacle, that we may be always ready to remove at the commandment of the Lord. 3. As long and as far as the cloud moved, so long and so far they marched, and just there where it abode they pitched their tents about it, and God's tent under it, v. 17. Note, It is uncomfortable staying when God is departed, but very safe and pleasant going when we see God go before us, and resting where he appoints us to rest. This is repeated again and again in these verses, because it was a constant miracle, and often repeated, and what never failed in all their travels, and because it is a matter which we should take particular notice of, as very significant and instructive. It is mentioned long after by David, (Ps. 105. 39.) and by the people of God after their captivity, Neh. 9. 19. And the conduct of this cloud is spoken of as signifying the guidance of the blessed Spirit; (Isa. 63. 14.) The Spirit of the Lord caused him to rest, and so didst thou lead thy people.

This teaches us, (1.) The particular care God takes of his people. Nothing could be more expressive and significant of God's tenderness of Israel, than the conduct of this cloud; it led them by the right way, (Ps. 107. 7.) went on their pace; God did by it, as it were, cover them with his feathers. We are not now to expect such sensible tokens of the divine presence and guidance as this was, but the promise is sure to all God's spiritual Israel, that he will guide them by his counsel, (Ps. 73. 24.) even unto death, Ps. 48. 14. That all the children of God shall be led by the Spirit of God, Rom. 8. 14. That he will direct their paths who in all their ways acknowledge him, Prov. 3. 6. There is a particular providence conversant about all their affairs, to direct and over-rule them for the best. The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord, Ps. 37. 23. (2.) The particular regard we ought to have to God in all our ways. In our affections and actions we must follow the direction of his word and Spirit; all the motions of our souls must be guided by the divine will; at the commandment of the Lord, our hearts should always move and rest; in all our affairs, we must follow Providence, reconciling ourselves to all its disposals, and bringing our mind to our condition, whatever it is. The people of Israel, having the cloud for their guide, were eased of the trouble of holding councils of war, to consider when and whither they should march, which might have occasioned strifes and debates among them: nor needed they to send spies before to inform them of the posture of the country, or pioneers to clear the way, or officers to mark out their camp; the pillar of cloud did all this for them; and those that by faith commit their works to the Lord, though they are bound to the prudent use of means, yet may in like manner be easy in the expectations of the event; "Father, thy will be done; dispose of me and mine as thou pleasest; here I am, desirous to be found waiting on my God continually, to journey and rest at the commandment of the Lord." What thou wilt, and where thou wilt, only let me be thine, and always in the way of my duty."

CHAP. X.

In this chapter we have, I. Orders given about the making and using of silver trumpets, which seems to have been the last of all the commandments God gave upon mount Sinai, and one of the least, yet not without its significance, v. 1..10. II. The history of the removal of Israel's camp from mount Sinai, and their orderly march into the wilderness of Paran, v. 11..28. III. Moses's treaty with Hobab, his brother-in-law, v. 29..32. IV. Moses's prayer at the removing and resting of the ark, v. 33..36.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Make thee two trumpets of silver; of a whole piece shalt thou make them: that thou mayest use them for the calling of the assembly, and for the journeying of the camps. 3. And when they shall blow with them, all the assembly shall assemble themselves to thee at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 4. And if they blow but with one trumpet, then the princes, which are heads of the thousands of Israel, shall gather themselves unto thee. 5. When ye blow an alarm, then the camps that lie on the east parts shall go forward. 6. When ye blow an alarm the second time, then the camps that lie on the south side shall take their journey: they shall blow an alarm for their journies. 7. But when the congregation is to be gathered together, ye shall blow, but ye shall not sound an alarm. 8. And the sons of Aaron, the priests, shall blow with the trumpets; and they shall be to you for an ordinance for ever throughout your generations. 9. And if ye go to war in your land against the enemy that oppresseth you, then ye shall blow an alarm with the trumpets; and ye shall be remembered before the LORD your God, and ye shall be saved from your enemies. 10. Also in the day of your gladness, and in your solemn days, and in the beginnings of your mouths, ye shall blow with the trumpets over your burnt-offerings, and over the sacrifices of your peace-offerings; that they may be to you for a memorial before your God: I am the LORD your God.

We have here directions concerning the public notices that were to be given to the people upon several occasions by sound of trumpet. In a thing of this nature, one would think, Moses needed not to have been taught of God, his own reason might teach him the conveniency of trumpets; but their constitution was to be in every thing divine, and therefore, even in this matter, small as it seems. Moses is here directed,

1. About the making of them. They must be made of silver; not cast, but of beaten work, (as some read it,) the matter and shape, no doubt, very fit for the purpose. He was now ordered to make but two, because there were but two priests to use them. But in Solomon's time we read of a hundred and twenty priests sounding with trumpets, 2 Chron. 5. 12. The form of these trumpets is supposed to be much like our's at this day.

2. Who were to make use of them; not any inferior person, but the priests themselves, the sons of Aaron, v. 8. As great as they were, they must not think it a disparagement to them to be trumpeters in the house of God; the meanest office there was honourable. This signified that the Lord's ministers should lift up their voice like a trumpet, to shew people their sins, (Isa. 58. 1.) to call them to Christ, Isa. 27. 13.

3. Upon what occasions the trumpets were to be sounded. (1.) For the calling of assemblies, v. 2. Thus they are bid to blow the trumpet in Zion, for the calling of a solemn assembly together, to sanctify a fast, Joel, 2. 15. Public notice ought to be given of the time and place of religious assemblies; for the invitation to the benefit of ordinances is general, whoever will, let him come. Wisdom cries in the chief places of concourse. But, that the trumpet might not give an uncertain sound, they are directed, if only the princes and elders were to meet, to blow but one of the trumpets; less should serve to call them together, who ought to be examples of forwardness in any thing that is good: but, if the body of the people were to be called together, both the trumpets must be sounded, that they might be heard at the greater distance. In allusion to this, they are said to be blessed that hear the joyful sound, (Ps. 89. 15.) that is, that are invited and called upon to wait upon God in public ordinances, Ps. 122. 1. And the general assembly at the great day will be summoned by the sound of the archangel's trumpet, Matth. 24. 31. (2.) For the journeying of the camps; to give notice when each squadron must move, for no man's voice could reach to give the word of command: soldiers with us, that are well disciplined, may be exercised by beat of drum. When the trumpets were blown for this purpose, they must sound an alarm, (v. 5.) a broken, quavering, interrupted sound, which was proper to excite and encourage the minds of people in their marches against their enemies; whereas a continued equal sound was more proper for the calling of the assembly together; (v. 7.) yet, when the people were called together to deprecate God's judgments, we find an alarm sounded, Joel, 2. 1. At the first sounding, Judah's squadron marched, at the second Reuben's, at the third Ephraim's, at the fourth Dan's, v. 5, 6. And some think that this was intended to sanctify their marches; for thus were proclaimed by the priests, who were God's mouth to the people, not only the divine orders given them to move, but the divine blessing upon them in all their motions. He that hath ears, let him hear, that God is with them of a truth. King Abijah valued himself and his army very much upon this, (2 Chron. 13. 12.) God himself is with us for our Captain, and his priests with sounding trumpets. (3.) For the animating and encouraging of their armies, when they went out to battle, v. 9. "If ye go to war, blow with the trumpets, signifying thereby your appeal to Heaven for the decision of the controversy, and your prayer to God to give you victory, and God will own this his own institution, and ye shall be remembered before the Lord your God." God will take notice of this sound of the trumpet, and be engaged to fight their battles; let all the people take notice of it, and be encouraged to fight his, as David, when he heard a sound of a going upon the tops of the mulberry trees. Not that God needed to be awaked by sound of trumpet, any more than Christ needed to be awaked by his disciples in the storm, Matth. 3. 25. But, where he intends mercy, it is his will that we should solicit for it; ministers must stir up the good soldiers of Jesus Christ to fight manfully against sin, the world, and the Devil, by assuring them that Christ is the Captain of their salvation, and will tread Satan under their feet. (4.) For the solemnizing of their sacred feast, v. 10. One of their feasts was called the blowing of trumpets, Lev. 23. 23, &c. And it should seem they were thus to grace the solemnity of all their feasts (Ps. 81. 3.) and their sacrifices, (2 Chron. 29. 27.) to intimate with what joy and delight they performed their duty to God, and to raise the minds of those that attended the services to a holy triumph in the God they worshipped. And then their performances were for a memorial before God; for then he takes pleasure in our religious exercises, when we take pleasure in them. Holy work should be done with holy joy.

11. And it came to pass on the twentieth day of the second month, in the second year, that the cloud was taken up from off the tabernacle of the testimony. 12. And the children of Israel took their journeys out of the wilderness of Sinai; and the cloud rested in the wilderness of Paran. 13. And they first took their journey according to the commandment of the LORD by the hand of Moses. 14. In the first place went the standard of the camp of the children of Judah according to their armies: and over his host was Nahshon the son of Amminadab. 15. And over the host of the tribe of the children of Issachar was Nethanceel the son of Zuar. 16. And over the host of the tribe of the children of Zebulun was Eliab the son of Helon. 17. And the tabernacle was taken down; and the sons of Gershon and the sons of Merari set forward, bearing the tabernacle. 18. And the standard of the camp of Reuben set forward according to their armies: and over his host was Elizur the son of Shedeur. 19. And over the host of the tribe of the children of Simeon was Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai. 20. And over the host of the tribe of the children of Gad was Eliasaph the son of Deuel. 21. And the Kohathites set forward, bearing the sanctuary: and the other did set up the tabernacle against they came. 22. And the standard of the camp of the children of Ephraim set forward according to their armies: and over his host was Elishama the son of Ammihud. 23. And over the host of the tribe of the children of Manasseh was Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur. 24. And over the host of the tribe of the children of Benjamin was Abidan the son of Gideoni. 25. And the standard of the camp of the children of Dan set forward, which was the reeward of all the camps throughout their hosts: and over his host was Abiezer the son of Ammishaddai. 26. And over the host of the tribe of the children of Asher was Pagiel the son of Ocran. 27. And over the host of the tribe of the children of Naphtali was Ahira the son of Eran. 28. Thus were the journeyings of the children of Israel according to their armies, when they set forward.

Here is,

1. A general account of the removal of the camp of Israel from mount Sinai, before which mountain it had lain now about a year, in which time, and place, a great deal of memorable business was done. Of this removal, it should seem, God gave them notice some time before, (Deut. 1. 6, 7.) Ye have dwelt long enough in this mountain, turn you, and take your journey toward the land of promise. The apostle tells us that mount Sinai genders to bondage, (Gal. 4. 24.) and signifies the law there given, which is of use indeed as a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, yet we must not rest in it, but advance toward the joys and liberties of the children of God, for our happiness is conferred not by the law, but by promise.

Observe, 1. The signal given, v. 11. The cloud was taken up, and we may suppose it stood for some time, till they were ready to march; and a great deal of work it was to take down all those tents, and pack up all those goods, that they had there; but, every family being employed about its own, and all at the same time, many hands made quick work of it. 2. The march began:

They took their journey according to the commandment of the Lord, and just as the cloud led them, v. 13. Some think that mention is thus frequently made in this and the foregoing chapter of the commandment of the Lord, guiding and governing them in all their travels, to obviate the calumny and reproach which were afterward thrown upon Israel, that they tarried so long in the wilderness, because they had lost themselves there, and could not find the way out. No, the matter was not so; in every stage, in every step, they were under divine directions; and if they knew not where they were, yet he that led them did. Note, Those that have given up themselves to the direction of God's word and Spirit, steer a steady course, even when they seem to be bewildered. While they are sure they cannot lose their God and Guide, they need not fear losing their way. 3. The place they rested in, after three days' march. They went out of the wilderness of Sinai, and rested in the wilderness of Paran. Note, all our removes in this world are but from one wilderness to another. The changes which we think will be for the better do not always prove so; while we carry about with us, wherever we go, the common infirmities of human nature, we must expect, wherever we go, to meet with its common calamities; we should never be at rest, never at home, till we come to heaven, and all will be well there.

II. A particular draught of the order of their march, according to the late model. 1. Judah's squadron marched first, v. 14. .16. The leading standard, now lodged with that tribe, was an earnest of the sceptre, which in David's time should be committed to it, and looked further to the Captain of our salvation, of whom it was likewise foretold, that unto him should the gathering of the people be. 2. Then came those two families of the Levites which were intrusted to carry the tabernacle. As soon as ever the cloud was taken up, the tabernacle was taken down, and packed up for removing, v. 17. And here the six waggons came laden with the more bulky part of the tabernacle. This frequent removing of the tabernacle in all their journeys signified the moveableness of that ceremonial dispensation. That which was so often shifted would at length vanish away, Heb. 8. 13. 3. Reuben's squadron marched forward next, taking place after Judah, according to the commandment of the Lord, v. 18. .20. 4. Then the Kohathites followed with their charge, the sacred furniture of the tabernacle, in the midst of the camp, the safest and most honourable place, v. 21. And they, that is, (says the margin,) the Gershonites, and Merarites, did set up the tabernacle against they came; and perhaps it is expressed thus generally, because, if there was occasion, not those Levites only, but the other Israelites that were in the first squadron, lent a hand to the tabernacle to hasten the rearing of it up, even before they set up their own tents. 5. Ephraim's squadron followed next after the ark, (v. 22. .24.) to which, some think, the Psalmist alludes, when he prays, (Ps. 80. 2.) Before Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh, the three tribes that composed this squadron, stir up thy strength; (and the ark is called his strength, Ps. 78. 61.) and come and save us. 6. Dan's squadron followed last, v. 25. .27. It is called the reeward, or gathering host, of all the camps, because it gathered up all that were left behind; not the women and children, those we may suppose were taken care of by the heads of their families, in their respective tribes; but all the unclean, the mixed multitude, and all that were weak and feeble, and east behind in their march. Note, He that leadeth Joseph like a flock, has a tender regard to the hindmost, (John. 17. 12.) that cannot keep pace with the rest, and of all that are given him, he will lose none. See Ezek. 34. 16.

29. And Moses said unto Hobab, the son of Raguel the Midianite, Moses' father-in-law, We are journeying unto the place of which the LORD said, I will give it you: come thou with us, and we will do thee good: for the LORD hath spoken good concerning Israel. 30. And he said unto him, I will not go; but I will depart to mine own land, and to my kindred. 31. And he said, Leave us not, I pray thee; forasmuch as thou knowest how we are to encamp in the wilderness, and thou mayest be to us instead of eyes. 32. And it shall be, if thou go with us, yea, it shall be, that what goodness the LORD shall do unto us, the same will we do unto thee. 33. And they departed from the mount of the LORD three days' journey: and the ark of the covenant of the LORD went before them in the three days journey, to search out a resting place for them. 34. And the cloud of the LORD was upon them by day, when they went out of the camp. 35. And it came to pass, when the ark set forward, that Moses said, Rise up, LORD, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee flee before thee. 36. And when it rested, he said, Return, O LORD, unto the many thousands of Israel.

Here is,

I. An account of what passed between Moses and Hobab, now upon this advance which the camp of Israel made toward Canaan. Some think that Hobab was the same with Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, and that the story, Exod. 18. should come in here; it seems more probable that Hobab was the son of Jethro, alias Reuel, or Raguel, (Exod. 2. 18.) and that when the father, being aged, went to his own land, (Exod. 18. 27.) he left his son Hobab with Moses, as Barzillai left Chimham with David; and the same word signifies both a father-in-law, and a brother-in-law. Now this Hobab stopped contentedly with Israel while they encamped at mount Sinai, near his own country; but now that they were removing, he was for going back to his own country and kindred, and his father's house.

Here is, 1. The kind invitation Moses gives him to go forward with them to Canaan, v. 29. He tempts him with a promise that they would certainly be kind to him, and puts God's word in for security, The Lord hath spoken good concerning Israel. As if he had said, "Come, cast in thy lot among us, and thou shalt fare as we fare; and we have the promise of God for it, that we shall fare well." Note, Those that are bound for the heavenly Canaan should invite and encourage all their friends to go along with them, for we shall have never the less of the treasures of the covenant, and the joys of heaven, for others coming in to share with us. And what argument can be more powerful with us to take God's people for our people, than this, that God hath spoken good concerning them. It is good having fellowship with those that have fellowship with God, (1 John. 1. 3.) and going with those with whom God is, Zech. 8. 23.

2. Hobab's inclination, and present resolution, to go back to his own country, v. 30. One would have thought that he who had seen so much of the special presence of God with Israel, and such surprising tokens of his favour to them, should not have needed much invitation to embark with them. But his refusal must be imputed to the affection he had for his native air and soil, which was not overpowered, as it ought to have been, by a believing regard to the promise of God, and a value for covenant-blessings. He was indeed a son of Abraham's loins, (for the Midianites descended from Abraham by Keturah,) but not an heir of Abraham's faith, (Heb. 11. 8.) else he had not given Moses this answer. Note, The things of this world which are seen, draw strongly from the pursuit of the things of the other world, which are not seen. The magnetic virtue of this earth prevails with most people above the attractives of heaven itself.

3. The great importunity Moses used with him to alter his resolution, v. 31, 32. He urges, (1.) That he might be serviceable to them, "We are to encamp in the wilderness," (a country well-known to Hobab,) "and thou mayest be to us instead of eyes, not to shew us where we must encamp, nor what way we must march," (the cloud was to direct that,) "but to shew us the conveniencies and inconveniencies of the place we march through, and encamp in, that we may make the best use we can of the conveniencies, and the best fence we can against the inconveniencies." Note, It will very well consist with our trust in God's providence, to make use of the help of our friends in those things wherein they are capable of being serviceable to us. Even they that were led by miracle must not slight the ordinary means of direction. Some think that Moses suggests this to Hobab, not because he expected much benefit from his information, but to please him with the thought of being some way useful to so great a body, and so to draw him on with them, by inspiring him with an ambition to obtain that honour. Calvin gives quite another sense of this place, very agreeable with the original, which yet I do not find taken notice of by any since. "Leave us not, I pray thee, but come along, to share with us in the promised land, for therefore hast thou known our encampment in the wilderness, and hast been to us instead of eyes; and we cannot make thee amends for sharing with us in our hardships, and doing us so many good offices, unless thou go with us to Canaan. Surely, for this reason, thou didst set out with us, that thou mightest go on with us." Note, Those that have begun well should use that as a reason for their persevering, because otherwise they lose the benefit and recompence of all they have done and suffered. (2.) That they would be kind to him, (v. 32.) What goodness the Lord shall do to us, the same will we do to thee. Note, [1.] We can give only what we receive. We can do no more service and kindness to our friends, than God is pleased to put it into the power of our hand to do. This is all we dare promise, to do good, as God shall enable us. [2.] Those that share with God's Israel in their labours and hardships, shall share with them in their comforts and honours. Those that are willing to take their lot with them in the wilderness, shall have their lot with them in Canaan; if we suffer with them, we shall reign with them, 2 Tim. 2. 12. Luke, 22. 28, 29.

We do not find any reply that Hobab here made to Moses, and therefore we hope that his silence gave consent, and he did not leave them, but that, when he perceived he might be useful, he preferred that before the gratifying of his own inclination; in this case he left us a good example. And we find (Judg. 1. 16. 1 Sam. 15. 6.) that his family was no loser by it.

II. An account of the communion between God and Israel in this remove. They left the mount of the Lord, (v. 33.) that mount Sinai, where they had seen his glory and heard his voice, and had been taken into covenant with him; (they must not expect that such appearances of God to them, as they had there been blessed with, should be constant;) they departed from that celebrated mountain, which we never read of in scripture any more, unless with reference to these past stories; now farewell, Sinai, Zion is the mountain of which God has said, This is my rest for ever, (Ps. 132. 14.) and of which we must say so. But, when they left the mount of the Lord, they took with them the ark of the covenant of the Lord, by which their stated communion with God was to be kept up. For,

1. By it God did direct their paths. The ark of the covenant went before them, some think, in place, at least, in this remove; others think, only in influence; though it was carried in the midst of the camp, yet the cloud that hovered over it directed all their motions. The ark, that is, the God of the ark, is said to search out a resting-place for them; not that God's infinite wisdom and knowledge need to make searches, but every place they were directed to was as convenient for them, as if the wisest man they had among them had been employed to go before them, and mark out the camp to the best advantage. Thus Canaan is said to be a land which God spied out, Ezek. 20. 6.

2. By it they did in all their ways acknowledge God, looking upon it as a token of God's presence; when that moved, or rested they had their eye up unto God. Moses, as the mouth of the congregation, lifted up a prayer, both at the removing and the resting of the ark; thus their going out and coming in were sanctified by prayer, and it is an example to us to begin and end every day's journey, and every day's work, with prayer.

(1.) Here is his prayer when the ark set forward, (v. 35.) Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered. They were now in a desolate country, but they were marching towards an enemy's country, and their dependence was upon God for success and victory in their wars, as well as for direction and supply in the wilderness. David used this prayer long after, (Ps. 68. 1.) for he also fought the Lord's battles. Note, [1.] There are those in the world that are enemies to God, and haters of him: secret and open enemies; enemies to his truths, his laws, his ordinances, his people. [2.] The scattering and defeating of God's enemies is a thing to be earnestly desired, and believingly expected, by all the Lord's people. This prayer is a prophecy. Those that persist in rebellion against God are hasting toward their own ruin. [3.] For the scattering and defeating of God's enemies, there needs no more but God's arising. When God arase to judgment, the work was soon done, Ps. 76. 8, 9. "Rise, Lord, as the sun riseth, to scatter the shadows of the night." Christ's rising from the dead scattered his enemies, Ps. 68. 18.

(2.) His prayer when the ark rested, v. 36. [1.] That God would cause his people to rest. So some read it, "Return, O Lord, the many thousands of Israel, return them to their rest again, after this fatigue." Thus it is said, (Isa. 63. 14.) The Spirit of the Lord caused him to rest. Thus he prays that God would give Israel success and victory abroad, and peace and tranquillity at home. [2.] That God himself would take up his rest among them. So we read it, Return to the thousands of Israel, the ten thousand thousand. So the word is. Note, First, The church of God is a great body; there are many thousands belonging to God's Israel. Secondly, We ought in our prayers to concern ourselves for this body. Thirdly, The welfare and happiness of the Israel of God consist in the continual presence of God among them. Their safety consists not in their numbers, though they are thousands, many thousands, but in the favour of God and his gracious return to them, and residence with them. These thousands are ciphers, he is the figure, and upon this account, Happy art thou, O Israel, who is like unto thee, O people!

CHAP. XI.

Hitherto things had gone pretty well in Israel, little interruption had been given to the methods of God's favour to them since the matter of the golden calf; the people seemed teachable in marshalling and purifying the camp, the princes devout and generous in dedicating the altar, and there was good hope that they would be in Canaan presently. But at this chapter begins a melancholy scene, the measures are all broken, God is turned to be their Enemy, and fights against them—and it is sin, sin, that makes all this mischief. I. Their murmurings kindled a fire among them, which yet was soon quenched by the prayer of Moses, v. 1. .3. II. No sooner was the fire of judgment quenched, than the fire of sin breaks out again, and God takes occasion from it to magnify both his mercy and his justice. 1. The people fret for want of flesh, v. 4. .9. 2. Moses frets for want of help, v. 10. .15. Now, (1.) God promises to gratify them both; to appoint help for Moses, (v. 16, 17.) and to give the people flesh, v. 18. .23. And, (2.) He presently makes good both these promises. For, [1.] The Spirit of God qualifies the seventy elders for the government, v. 24. .30. [2.] The power of God brings quails to feast the people, v. 31, 32. Yet, [3.] The justice of God plagued them for their murmurings, v. 33. .35.

1. AND when the people complained, it displeased the LORD: and the LORD heard it; and his anger was kindled; and the fire of the LORD burnt among them, and consumed them: that were in the uttermost parts of the camp.

2. And the people cried unto Moses; and when Moses prayed unto the LORD, the fire was quenched. 3. And he called the name of the place Taberah: because the fire of the LORD burnt among them.

Here is,

1. The people's sin. They complained, v. 1. They were, as it were, complainers. So it is in the margin. There were some secret grudgings and discontents among them, which as yet did not break out in an open mutiny. But how great a matter did this little fire kindle! They had received from God excellent laws and ordinances, and yet no sooner were they departed from the mount of the Lord, than they began to quarrel with God himself. See in this, (1.) The sinfulness of sin, which takes occasion from the commandment to be the more provoking. (2.) The weakness of the law through the flesh, Rom. 8. 3. The law discovered sin, but could not destroy it; checked it, but could not conquer it.

They complained. Interpreters inquire what they complained of; and truly, when they were furnished with so much matter for thanksgiving, one may justly wonder where they found any matter of complaint; we may conclude, that those who complained did not all agree in the cause. Some, perhaps, complained that they were removed from mount Sinai, where they had been at rest so long, others that they did not remove sooner: some complained of the weather, others of the ways: some, perhaps, thought three days' journey was too long a march, others thought it not long enough, because it did not bring them into Canaan. When we consider how their camp was guided, guarded, graced, what good victuals they had, and good company, and what care was taken of them in their marches, that their feet should not swell, nor their clothes wear, (Deut. 8. 4.) we may ask, "What could have been done more for a people to make them easy?" And yet they complained. Note, Those that are of a fretful discontented spirit will always find something or other to quarrel with, though the circumstances of their outward condition be ever so favourable.

2. God's just resentment of the affront given to him by this sin. The Lord heard it, though it does not appear that Moses did. Note, God is acquainted with the secret frettings and murmurings of the heart, though they are industriously concealed from men. What he took notice of, he was much displeased with, and his anger was kindled. Note, Though God graciously gives us leave to complain to him when there is cause, (Ps. 142. 2.) yet he is justly provoked, and takes it very ill, if we complain of him when there is no cause; such conduct in our inferiors provokes us.

3. The judgment wherewith God chastised them for this sin. The fire of the Lord burnt among them, such flashes of fire from the cloud as had consumed Nadab and Abihu. The fire of their wrath against God burned in their minds, (Ps. 39. 3.) and justly does the fire of God's wrath fasten upon their bodies. We read of their murmurings several times, when they came first out of Egypt, Exod. 15, and 16, and 17. But we do not read of any plagues inflicted on them for their murmurings, as these were now; for now they had had great experience of God's care of them, and therefore now to distrust them was so much the more inexcusable. Now a fire was kindled against Jacob, (Ps. 78. 21.) but, to shew how unwilling God was to contend with them, it fastened on those only that were in the uttermost parts of the camp. Thus God's judgments came upon them gradually, that they might take warning.

4. Their cry to Moses, who was their tried intercessor, v. 2. When he slew them, then they sought him, and made their application to Moses to stand their friend. Note, (1.) When we complain without cause, it is just with God to give us cause to complain. (2.) Those that slight God's friends when they are in prosperity, would be glad to make them their friends when they are in distress: Father Abraham, send Lazarus.

5. The prevalency of Moses's intercession for them; when Moses prayed unto the Lord, (he was always ready to stand in the gap to turn away the wrath of God,) God had respect to him and his offering, and the fire was quenched. By this it appears that God delights not in punishing, for when he has begun his controversy, he is soon prevailed with to let it fall. Moses was one of those worthies who by faith quenched the violence of fire.

6. A new name given hereupon to the place, to perpetuate the shame of a murmuring people, and the honour of a righteous God; the place was called Taberah, a burning, (v. 3.) that others might hear and fear, and take warning not to sin as they did, lest they should smart as they did, 1 Cor. 10. 10.

4. And the mixt multitude that was among them fell a lusting: and the children of Israel also wept again, and said, Who shall give us flesh to eat? 5. We remember the fish, which we did eat in Egypt freely; the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick: 6. But now our soul is dried away: there is nothing at all, beside this manna, before our eyes. 7. And the manna was as coriander-seed, and the colour thereof as the colour of bdellium. 8. And the people went about, and gathered it, and ground it in mills, or beat it in a mortar, and baked it in pans, and made cakes of it: and the taste of it was as the taste of fresh oil. 9. And when the dew fell upon the camp in the night, the manna fell upon it. 10. Then Moses heard the people weep throughout their families, every man in the door of his tent: and the anger of the LORD was kindled greatly; Moses also was displeased. 11. And Moses said unto the LORD, Wherefore hast thou afflicted thy servant? and wherefore have I not found favour in thy sight, that thou layest the burthen of all this people upon me? 12. Have I conceived all this people? have I begotten them, that thou shouldest say unto me, Carry them in thy bosom, as a nursing-father beareth the sucking child, unto the land which thou swarest unto their fathers? 13. Whence should I have flesh to give unto all this people? for they weep unto me, saying, Give us flesh, that we may eat. 14. I am not able to bear all this people alone, because it is too heavy for me. 15. And if thou deal thus with me, kill me, I pray thee, out of hand, if I have found favour in thy sight; and let me not see my wretchedness.

These verses represent things sadly unlinged, and out of order in Israel: both the people and the prince uneasy.

1. Here is the people fretting and speaking against God himself, (as it is interpreted, Ps. 78. 19.) notwithstanding his glorious appearances both to them, and for them.

Observe, 1. Who were the criminals. (1.) The mixt multitude began, they fell a lusting, v. 4. The rabble that came with them out of Egypt, expecting only the land of promise, but not a state of probation in the way to it. They were hangers on, who took hold of the skirts of the Jews, and would not go with them, only because they knew not how to live at home, and were minded to seek their fortunes (as we say) abroad. These were the disordered sheep that infected the flock, the leaven that leavened the whole lump. Note, A few factious, discontented, ill-natured, people, may do a great deal of mischief in the best societies, if great care be not taken to discountenance them. Such as these are an untoward generation, from which it is our wisdom to save ourselves, Acts, 2. 40. (2.) Even the children of Israel took the infection, as we are informed, v. 4. The holy seed joined themselves to the people of these abominations. The mixed multitude here spoken of were not numbered with the children of Israel, but were set aside as a people God made no account of, and yet the children of Israel, forgetting their own character and distinction, herded themselves with them, and learned their way; as if the scum and outcasts of the camp were to be the privy-counsellors of it. The children of Israel, a people near to God, and highly privileged, yet drawn into rebellion against him! Oh how little honour has God in the world, when even the people which he formed for himself, to shew forth his praise, were so much a dishonour to him! Therefore let none think that their external professions and privileges will be their security, either against Satan's temptations to sin, or God's judgments for sin: see 1 Cor. 10. 1, 2, 12.

2. What was the crime; they lusted and murmured. Though they had been lately corrected for this sin, and many of them overthrown for it, as God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah, and the smell of the fire was still in their nostrils, yet they returned to it: see Prov. 27. 22.

(1.) They magnified the plenty and dainties they had had in Egypt, (v. 5.) as if God had done them a great deal of wrong in taking them thence. While they were in Egypt, they sighed by reason of their burthens, for their lives were made bitter to them with hard bondage; and yet now they talk of Egypt as if they had all lived like princes there, when this serves as a colour for their present discontent. But, with what face can they talk of eating fish in Egypt freely, or for nought, as if it cost them nothing, when they paid so dear for it with their hard service? They remember the cucumbers, and the melons, and the leeks, and the onions, and the garlick, (precious stuff indeed to be fond of!) but they do not remember the brick-kilns, and the task-masters, the voice of the oppressor, and the smart of the whip. No, these are forgotten by these ungrateful people.

(2.) They were sick of the good provision God had made for them, v. 6. It was bread from heaven, angels' food; to shew how unreasonable their complaint was, it is here described, v. 7. .9. It was good for food, and pleasant to the eye, every grain like an orient pearl; it was wholesome food, and nourishing; it was not to be called dry bread, for it tasted like fresh oil; it was agreeable (the Jews say, Wisd. 16. 20.) to every man's palate; and tasted as he would have it; and though it was still the same, yet, by the different ways of dressing it, it yielded them a grateful variety: it cost them no money nor care, for it fell in the night while they slept; and the labour of gathering it was not worth speaking of; they lived upon free quarter, and yet could talk of Egypt's cheapness, and the fish they ate there freely. Nay, which was much more valuable than all this, the manna came from the immediate power and bounty of God, not from common providence, but from special favour. It was, as God's compassion, new every morning, always fresh, not as their food who live on ship-board. While they lived on manna, they seemed to have been exempted from the curse which sin has brought on man, that in the sweat of his face should he eat bread. And yet they speak of the manna with such scorn as if it were not good enough to be meat for swine. Our soul is dried away. They speak as if God dealt hardly with them, in allowing them no better food; at first they admired it, Exod. 16. 15. What is this? "What a curious precious thing is this!" But now they despised it. Note, Peevish discontented minds will find fault with that which has no fault in it, but that it is too good for them. It is very provoking to God to undervalue his favours, and to put a but upon our common mercies. Nothing but manna. Those that might be very happy often make themselves very miserable by their discontents.

(3.) They could not be satisfied unless they had flesh to eat. They brought flocks and herds with them in great abundance out of Egypt; but either they were covetous, and could not find in their hearts to kill them, lest they should lessen their flocks; (they must have flesh as cheap as they had bread, or they would not be pleased;) or else they were curious, beef and mutton would not please them, they must have something more nice and delicate, like the fish they did eat in Egypt. Food would not serve, they must be feasted; they had feasted with God upon the peace-offerings, which they have their share of; but it seems God did not keep a table good enough for them, they must have daintier bits than any that came to his altar. Note, It is an evidence of the dominion of the carnal mind, when we are solicitous to have all the delights and satisfactions of sense wound up to the height of pleasureableness. Be not desirous of dainties, Prov. 23. 1. .3. If God give us food convenient, we ought to be thankful, though we do not eat the fat and drink the sweet.

(4.) They distrusted the power and goodness of God, as insufficient for their supply; Who will give us flesh to eat? taking it for granted that God could not. Thus this question is commented upon, (Ps. 78. 19, 20.) Can he give flesh also? Though he had given them flesh with their bread once, when he saw fit, (Exod. 16. 13.) they might have expected that he would have done it again, and in mercy, if, instead of murmuring, they had prayed. Note, It is an offence to God to let our desires go beyond our faith.

(5.) They were eager and importunate in their desires: they lusted a lust, (so the word is,) lusted greatly and greedily, till they wept again for vexation. So childish were the children of Israel, and so humoursome, they cried, because they had not what they would have, and when they would have it. They did not offer up this desire to God, but would rather be beholden to any one else than to him. We should not indulge ourselves in any desire which we cannot in faith turn into prayer, as we cannot when we ask meat for our lust, Ps. 78. 18. For this sin, the anger of the Lord was kindled greatly against them, which is written for our admonition, that we should not lust after evil things, as they lusted, 1 Cor. 10. 6.

(6.) Flesh is good food, and may lawfully be eaten, yet they are said to lust after evil things; what is lawful of itself becomes evil to us, when it is what God does not allot to us, and yet we eagerly desire it.

II. Moses himself, though so meek and good a man, is uneasy upon this occasion. Moses also was displeased. Now,

1. It must be confessed that the provocation was very great. These murmurings of their's reflected great dishonour upon God, and Moses laid to heart the reproaches cast on him. They also created great vexation to himself; they knew that he did his utmost for their good, and that he did nothing, nor could, without a divine appointment; and yet, to be thus continually teased and clamoured against by an unreasonable ungrateful people, would break in upon the temper even of Moses himself. God considered this, and therefore we do not find that he chid him for his uneasiness.

2. Yet Moses expressed himself otherwise than became him upon this provocation, and came short of his duty both to God and Israel in these expostulations. (1.) He undervalues the honour God had put upon him, in making him the illustrious minister of his power and grace, in the deliverance and conduct of that peculiar people, which might have been sufficient to balance the burthen. (2.) He complains too much of a sensible grievance, and lays too near his heart a little noise and fatigue. If he could not bear the toil of government, which was but "running with the footman," how would he bear the terrors of war, which was "contending with horses?" He might easily have furnished himself with considerations enough to enable him to slight their clamours, and make nothing of them. (3.) He magnifies his own performances, that all the burthen of the people lay upon him; whereas God himself did, in effect, ease him of all the burthen. Moses needed not to be in care to provide quarters for them, or victuals; God did all. And if any difficult case happened, he needed not to be in any perplexity while he had the oracle to consult, and, in it, the divine wisdom to direct him, the divine authority to back him and bear him out, and almighty power itself to dispense rewards and punishments. (4.) He is not so sensible as he ought to be of the obligation he lay under, by virtue of the divine commission and command, to do the utmost he could for his people, when he suggests, that, because they were not the children of his body, therefore he was not concerned to take a fatherly care of them, though God himself, who might employ him as he pleased, had appointed him to be a father to them. (5.) He takes too much to himself when he asks, Whence should I have flesh to give them? (v. 13.) as if he were the housekeeper, and not God. Moses gave them not the bread, John, 6. 32. Nor was it expected that he should give them the flesh, but as an instrument in God's hand; and if he meant, "Whence should God have it for them?" he too much limited the power of the Holy One of Israel. (6.) He speaks distrustfully of the divine grace, when he despairs of being able to bear all this people, v. 14. Had the work been much less, he could not have gone through it in his own strength; but, had it been much greater, through God strengthening him, he might have done it. (7.) It was worst of all passionately to wish for death, and desire to be killed out of hand, because just at this time his life was made a little uneasy to him, v. 15. Is this Moses? is this the meekest of all the men on the earth? The best have their infirmities, and fail sometimes in the exercise of that grace which they are most eminent for. But God graciously overlooked Moses's passion at this time, and therefore we must not be severe in our animadversions upon it, but pray, Lord, lead us not into temptation.

16. And the LORD said unto Moses, Gather unto me seventy men of the elders of Israel, whom thou knowest to be the elders of the people, and officers over them; and bring them unto the tabernacle of the congregation, that they may stand there with thee. 17. And I will come down and talk with thee there: and I will take of the spirit which is upon thee, and will put it upon them; and they shall bear the burthen of the people with thee, that thou bear it not thyself alone. 18. And say thou unto the people, Sanctify yourselves against to-morrow, and ye shall eat flesh: for ye have wept in the ears of the LORD, saying, Who shall give us flesh to eat? for it was well with us in Egypt: therefore the LORD will give you flesh, and ye shall eat. 19. Ye shall not eat one day, nor two days, nor five days, neither ten days, nor twenty days; 20. But even a whole month, until it come out at your nostrils, and it be loathsome unto you: because that ye have despised the LORD which is among you, and have wept before him, saying, Why came we forth out of Egypt? 21. And Moses said, The people, among whom I am, are six hundred thousand footmen; and thou hast said, I will give them flesh, that they may eat a whole month. 22. Shall the flocks and the herds be slain for them, to suffice them? or shall all the fish of the sea be gathered together for them, to suffice them? 23. And the LORD said unto Moses, Is the LORD's hand waxed short? thou shalt see now whether my word shall come to pass unto thee or not.

We have here God's gracious answer to both the foregoing complaints, wherein his goodness takes occasion, from man's badness, to appear so much the more illustrious.

1. Provision is made for the redress of the grievances Moses complains of. If he find the weight of government lie too heavy upon him, though he was a little too passionate in his remonstrance, yet he shall be eased, not by being discarded from the government himself, as he justly might have been, if God had been extreme to mark what he said amiss, but by having assistants appointed him, who should be, as the apostle speaks, (1 Cor. 12. 28.) helps, governments, that is, helps in government, not at all to lessen or eclipse his honour, but to make the work more easy to him, and to bear the burthen of the people with him. And, that this provision might be both agreeable and really serviceable,

1. Moses is directed to nominate the persons, v. 16. The people were too hot, and heady, and tumultuous, to be intrusted with the election; Moses must please himself in the choice, that he may not afterward complain. The number he is to choose is seventy men, according to the number of the souls that went down into Egypt. He must choose such as he knew to be elders, that is, wise and experienced men. Those that had acquitted themselves best as rulers of thousands and hundreds, (Exod. 18. 25.) purchase to themselves now this good degree. "Choose such as thou knowest to be elders indeed, and not in name only, officers that execute their office." We read of the same number of elders (Exod. 24. 1.) that went up with Moses to mount Sinai, but they were distinguished only for that occasion, these for a perpetuity; and, according to this constitution, the Sanhedrim, or great council of the Jews, which in after-ages sat at Jerusalem, and was the highest court of judgment among them, consisted of seventy men. Our Saviour seems to have had an eye to it in the choice of seventy disciples, who were to be assistants to the apostles, Luke, 10.

2. God promises to qualify them. If they were not found fit for the employ, they should be made fit, else they might prove more a hinderance than a help to Moses, v. 17. Though Moses had talked too boldly with God, yet God does not therefore break off communion with him; he bears a great deal with us, and we must with one another; I will come down (said God) and talk with thee when thou art more calm and composed; and I will take of the same spirit of wisdom, and piety, and courage, that is upon thee, and put it upon them. Not that Moses had the less of the Spirit for their sharing, nor that they were hereby made equal with him; Moses was still unequalled, (Deut. 34. 10.) but they were clothed with a spirit of government proportionable to their place, and with a spirit of prophecy to prove their divine call to it, the government being a theocracy. Note, (1.) Those whom God employs in any service, he qualifies for it, and those that are not in some measure qualified, cannot think themselves duly called. (2.) All good qualifications are from God; every perfect gift is from the Father of lights.

II. Even the humour of the discontented people shall be gratified too, that every mouth may be stopped. They are bid to sanctify themselves, (v. 18.) that is, to put themselves into a posture to receive such a proof of God's power as should be a token both of mercy and judgment. Prepare to meet thy God, O Israel, Amos, 4. 12.

1. God promises, (shall I say?) he threatens rather, that they should have their fill of flesh; that, for a month together, they should not only be fed, but feasted, with flesh, beside their daily manna; and, if they had not a better government of their appetites than now it appeared they had, they should be surfeited with it, (v. 19, 20.) Ye shall eat till it come out at your nostrils, and it become loathsome to you. See here, (1.) The vanity of all the delights of sense; they will cloy but not satisfy: spiritual pleasures are the contrary. As the world passes away, so do the lusts of it, 1 John, 2. 17. What was greedily coveted, in a little time comes to be nauseated. (2.) What brutish sins (and worse than brutish) gluttony and drunkenness are: they put a force upon nature, and make that the sickness of the body which should be its health; they are sins that are their own punishments, and yet not the worst that attend them. (3.) What a righteous thing it is with God to make that loathsome to men which they have inordinately lusted after. God could make them despise flesh as much as they had despised manna.

2. Moses objects the improbability of making good this word, v. 21, 22. It is an objection like that which the disciples made, (Mark, 8. 4.) Whence can a man satisfy these men? Some excuse Moses here, and construe what he says as only a modest inquiry which way the supply must be expected; but it savours too much of diffidence and distrust of God to be justified. He objects the number of the people, as if He, that provided bread for them all, could not, by the same unlimited power, provide flesh too. He reckons it must be the flesh either of beasts or fishes, because they are the most bulky animals, little thinking that the flesh of birds, little birds, should serve the purpose. God sees not as man sees, but his thoughts are above our's. He objects the greediness of the people's desires, in that word, to suffice them. Note, Even true and great believers sometimes find it hard to trust God under the discouragements of second causes, and against hope to believe in hope. Moses himself can scarcely forbear saying, Can God furnish a table in the wilderness? when this was become the common cry. No doubt this was his infirmity.

3. God gives a short but sufficient answer to the objection, in that question, Is the Lord's hand waxed short? v. 23. If Moses had remembered the years of the right hand of the Most High, he had not started all these difficulties, therefore God reminds him of them, intimating that this objection reflected upon the divine power, which he himself had been so often, not only the witness, but the instrument of. Had he forgotten what wonders the divine power had wrought for that people, when it inflicted the plagues of Egypt, divided the sea, broached the rock, and rained bread from heaven? Was that power abated? Was God weaker than he used to be? Or, was he tired with what he had done? Whatever our unbelieving hearts may suggest to the contrary, is certain, (1.) That God's hand is not short, his power cannot be restrained in the exerting of itself by any thing but his own will; with him nothing is impossible. That hand is not short which measures the waters, metes out the heavens, (Isa. 40. 12.) and grasps the winds, Prov. 30. 4. (2.) That it is not waxed short. He is as strong as ever he was, fainteth not, neither is weary. And this is sufficient to silence all our distrusts, when means fail us, Is any thing too hard for the Lord? God here brings Moses to this first principle, sets him back in his lesson, to learn the ancient name of God, The Lord God Almighty, and puts the proof upon the issue, Thou shalt see whether my word shall come to pass or not. This magnifies God's word above all his name, that his works never come short of it. If he speaks, it is done.

24. And Moses went out, and told the people the words of the LORD, and gathered the seventy men of the elders of the people, and set them round about the tabernacle. 25. And the LORD came down in a cloud, and spake unto him, and took of the spirit that was upon him, and gave it unto the seventy elders: and it came to pass, that, when the spirit rested upon them, they prophesied, and did not cease. 26. But there remained two of the men in the camp, the name of the one was Eldad, and the name of the other Medad: and the spirit rested upon them; and they were of them that were written, but went not out unto the tabernacle: and they prophesied in the camp. 27. And there ran a young man, and told Moses, and said, Eldad and Medad do prophesy in the camp. 28. And Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of Moses, one of his young men, answered and said, My lord Moses, forbid them. 29. And Moses said unto him, Enviest thou for my sake? Would God that all the LORD's people were prophets, and that the LORD would put his spirit upon them! 30. And Moses gat him into the camp, he and the elders of Israel.

We have here the performance of God's word to Moses, that he should have help in the government of Israel.

1. Here is the case of the seventy privy-counsellors in general. Moses though a little disturbed by the tumult of the people, yet was thoroughly composed by the communion with God, and soon came to himself again. And according as the matter was concerted, 1. He did his part, he presented the seventy elders before the Lord, round the tabernacle, (v. 24.) that they might there stand ready to receive the grace of God, in the place where he manifested himself, and that the people also might be witnesses of their solemn call. Note, Those that expect favour from God must humbly offer themselves and their service to him. 2. God was not wanting to do his part. He gave of his Spirit to the seventy elders, (v. 25.) which enabled them whose capacities and education set them but on a level with their neighbours, of a sudden to say and do that which was extraordinary, and which proved them to be under divine inspiration; they prophesied, and did not cease all that day, and (some think) only that day. They discoursed to the people of the things of God, and perhaps commented upon the law they had lately received, with admirable clearness, and fulness, and readiness, and aptness of expression, so that all who heard them might see and say, that God was with them of a truth; see 1 Cor. 14. 24, 25. Thus, long afterward, Saul was marked for the government by the gift of prophecy, which came upon him for a day and a night, 1 Sam. 10. 6, 11. When Moses was to fetch Israel out of Egypt, Aaron was appointed to be his prophet; (Exod. 7. 1.) but, now that God had called him to other work, in his room Moses has seventy prophets to attend him. Note, Those are fittest to rule in God's Israel that are well acquainted with divine things, and are apt to teach to edification.

II. Here is the particular case of two of them, Eldad and Medad, probably two brothers.

1. They were nominated by Moses to be assistants in the government, but they went not out unto the tabernacle as the rest did, v. 26. Calvin conjectures that the summons was sent them, but that it did not find them, they being somewhere out of the way, so that, though they were written, yet they were not called. Most think that they declined coming to the tabernacle, out of an excess of modesty and humility; being sensible of their own weakness and unworthiness, they desired to be excused from coming into the government. Their principle was their praise; but their practice, in not obeying order, was their fault.

2. The Spirit of God found them out in the camp, where they were hid among the stuff, and there they prophesied, that is, they exercised their gift of praying, preaching, and praising God, in some private tent. Note, The Spirit of God is not tied to the tabernacle, but, like the wind, blows where he listeth, John, 3. 8. Whither can we go from that Spirit? There was a special providence in it that these two should be absent, for thus it appeared that it was indeed a divine Spirit which the elders were actuated by, and that Moses gave them not that Spirit, but God himself. They modestly declined preferment, but God forces it upon them; nay, they have the honour of being named, which the rest have not: for they that humbled themselves shall be exalted; and those are most fit for government who are least ambitious of it.

3. Information of this is given to Moses, (v. 27.) "Eldad and Medad do prophesy in the camp; there is a conventicle in such a tent, and Eldad and Medad are holding forth there, from under the inspection and presidency of Moses, and out of the communion of the rest of the elders." Whoever the person was that brought the tidings, he seems to have looked upon it as an irregularity.

4. Joshua moves to have them silenced, (v. 28.) My lord Moses, forbid them; it is probable that Joshua himself was one of the seventy, which made him the more jealous for the honour of their order. He takes it for granted that they were not under any necessitating impulse, for the spirit of the prophets is subject to the prophets, and therefore he would have them either not to prophesy at all, or to come to the tabernacle, and prophesy in concert with the rest. He does not desire that they should be punished for what they had done, but only restrained for the future. This motion he made from a good principle, not out of any personal dislike to Eldad and Medad, but out of an honest zeal for that which he apprehended to be the unity of the church, and in concern for the honour of God and Moses.

5. Moses rejects the motion, and reproves him that made it, (v. 29.) "Euwest thou for my sake? Thou knowest not what manner of spirit thou art of." Though Joshua was Moses's particular friend and confidant, though he said this out of a respect to Moses, whose honour he was very loath to see lessened by the call of those elders, yet Moses reproves him, and in him all that shew such a spirit. (1.) We must not secretly grieve at the gifts, graces, and usefulness of others. It was the fault of John's disciples, that they envied Christ's honour, because it shaded their Master's, John, 3. 26, &c. (2.) We must not be transported into heats against the weaknesses and infirmities of others. Granting that Eldad and Medad were guilty of an irregularity, yet Joshua was too quick and too warm upon them. Our zeal must always be tempered with the meekness of wisdom; the righteousness of God needs not the wrath of man, Jam. 1. 20. (3.) We must not make the best and most useful men heads of a party. Paul would not have his name made use of to patronise a faction, 1 Cor. 1. 12, 13. (4.) We must not be forward to condemn and silence those that differ from us, as if they did not follow Christ, because they do not follow him with us, Mark, 9. 38. Shall we reject those whom Christ has owned? or restrain any from doing good, because they are not in every thing of our mind? Moses was of another spirit; so far from silencing these two, and quenching the Spirit in them, that he wishes all the Lord's people were prophets, that is, that he would put his Spirit upon them. Not that he would have any set up for prophets that were not duly qualified, or that he expected that the Spirit of prophecy should be made thus common; but thus he expresses the love and esteem he had for all the Lord's people, the complacency he took in the gifts of others, and how far he was from being displeased at Eldad's and Medad's prophesying from under his eye. Such an excellent spirit as this blessed Paul was of, rejoicing that Christ was preached, though it was by those who therein intended to add affliction to his bonds, Phil. 1. 16. We ought to be pleased that God is served and glorified, and good done, though to the lessening of our credit, and the credit of our way.

6. The elders, now newly ordained, immediately entered upon their administration; (v. 30.) when their call was sufficiently attested by their prophesying, they went with Moses to the camp, and applied themselves to business. Having received the gift, they ministered the same as good stewards. And now Moses was pleased that he had so many to share with him in his work and honour. And, (1.) Let the testimony of Moses be credited by those who desire to be in power, That government is a burthen. It is a burthen of care and trouble to those who make conscience of the duty of it; and to those who do not, it will prove a heavier burthen in the day of account, when they fall under the doom of the unprofitable servant that buried his talent. (2.) Let the example of Moses be imitated by those that are in power; let them not despise the advice and assistance of others, but desire it, and be thankful for it; not coveting to monopolize wisdom and power. In the multitude of counsellors there is safety.

31. And there went forth a wind from the LORD, and brought quails from the sea, and let them fall by the camp, as it were a day's journey on this side, and as it were a day's journey on the other side, round about the camp, and as it were two cubits high upon the face of the earth. 32. And the people stood up all that day, and all that night, and all the next day, and they gathered the quails: he that gathered least gathered ten homers: and they spread them all abroad for themselves round about the camp. 33. And while the flesh was yet between their teeth, ere it was chewed, the wrath of the LORD was kindled against the people, and the LORD smote the people with a very great plague. 34. And he called the name of that place Kibroth-hattaavah: because there they buried the people that lusted. 35. And the people journeyed from Kibroth-hattaavah unto Hazeroth; and abode at Hazeroth.

God having performed his promise to Moses, gave him assessors in the government, and proving thereby the power he has over the spirits of men, by his Spirit: he here performs his promise to the people in giving them flesh, and proving thereby his power over the inferior creatures, and his dominion in the kingdom of nature. Observe,

1. How the great people were gratified with flesh in abundance, v. 31. A wind (a south-east wind, as appears, Ps. 78, 26.) brought quails. It is uncertain what sort of animals they were; the psalmist calls them feathered fowl, or fowl of wing. The learned Bishop Patrick inclines to agree with some modern writers, who think they were locusts, a delicious sort of food well known in those parts, the rather, because they were brought with a wind, lay in heaps, and were dried in the sun for use. Whatever they were, they answered the intention, they served for a month's feast for Israel; such an indulgent Father was God to this forward family. Locusts, that had been a plague to fruitful Egypt, feeding upon the fruits, were a blessing to a barren wilderness, being themselves fed upon.

2. How greedy they were of this flesh that God sent them; they flew upon the spoil with an insatiable appetite, not regarding what Moses had told them from God, that they would surfeit upon it, v. 32. Two days and a night they were at it, gathering flesh, till every master of a family had brought home ten homers, (that was ten ass-loads,) at least. David longed for the water of the well of Bethlehem, but would not drink it, when he had it, because it was obtained by venturing; much more reason these Israelites had to refuse this flesh, which was obtained by murmuring, and which they might easily perceive, by what Moses said, was given them in anger; but those that are under the power of a carnal mind will have their lusts fulfilled, though it be to the certain damage and ruin of their precious souls.

3. How dear they paid for their feasts, when it came into their reckoning, v. 33. The Lord smote them with a very great plague; some bodily disease, which probably was the effect of their surfeit, and was the death of many of them, and those, it is likely, the ringleaders in the mutiny. Note, God often grants the desires of sinners in wrath, while he denies the desires of his own people in love. He gave them their request, but sent leanness into their soul, Ps. 106. 15. By all that was said to them they were not estranged from their lusts, and therefore, while the meat was in their mouths, the wrath of God came upon them, Ps. 78. 30, 31. What we inordinately desire, if we obtain it, (we have reason to fear,) will be some way or other a grief and cross to us. God provided for them first, and then plagued them, (1.) To save the reputation of his own power; that it might not be said, "He would not have cut them off, had he been able to suffice them." And

(2.) To shew us the meaning of the prosperity of sinners; it is their preparation for ruin, they are fed as an ox for the slaughter.

Lastly, The remembrance of this is preserved in the name given to the place, v. 34. Moses called it Kibroth-hattaavah, the graves of lusters, or of lust. And well it had been, if these graves of Israel's lusters had proved the graves of Israel's lust: the warning was designed to be so, but it had not its due effect, for it follows, (Ps. 78. 32.) For all this, they sinned still.

CHAP. XII.

In the foregoing chapter we had the vexation which the people gave to Moses; in this we have his patience tried by his own relations. I. Miriam and Aaron, his own brother and sister, affronted him, v. 1. 3. II. God called them to an account for it, v. 4. 9. III. Miriam was smitten with a leprosy for it, v. 10. IV. Aaron submits, and Moses meekly intercedes for her, v. 11. 13. V. She is healed, but put to shame for seven days, v. 14. 16. And this is recorded to shew that the best persons and families have both their follies and their crosses.

1. AND Miriam and Aaron spake against Moses because of the Ethiopian woman whom he had married: for he had married an Ethiopian woman. 2. And they said, Hath the LORD indeed spoken only by Moses? hath he not spoken also by us? And the LORD heard it. 3. (Now the man Moses was very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth.)

Here is,

1. The unbecoming passion of Aaron and Miriam, they spake against Moses, v. 1. If Moses, that received so much honour from God, yet received so many slights and affronts from men, shall any of us think such trials either strange or hard, and be either provoked or discouraged by them? But who would have thought that disturbance should be created to Moses, (1.) From those that were themselves serious and good; nay, that were eminent in religion, Miriam a prophetess, Aaron the high priest, both of them joint-commissioners with Moses for the deliverance of Israel? Mic. 6. 4. I sent before thee Moses, Aaron, and Miriam. (2.) From those that were his nearest relations, his own brother and sister, who shone so much by rays borrowed from him? Thus the spouse complains, (Cant. 1. 6.) My mother's children were angry with me; and quarrels among relations are in a special manner grievous: A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city. Yet this helps to confirm the call of Moses, and shews that his advancement was purely by the divine favour, and not by any compact or collusion with his kindred, who themselves grudged at his advancement. Neither did any of our Saviour's kindred believe on him, John, 7. 5. It should seem that Miriam began the quarrel, and Aaron, not having been employed or consulted in the choice of the seventy elders, was for the present somewhat disgusted, and so was the sooner drawn in to take his sister's part. It would grieve one to see the hand of Aaron in so many trespasses, but it shews that the law made men priests which had infirmity. Satan prevailed first with Eve, and by her with Adam; see what need we have to take heed of being drawn into quarrels by our relations, for we know not how great a matter a little fire may kindle. Aaron ought to have remembered how Moses stood his friend, when God was angry with him for making the golden calf, (Deut. 9. 20.) and not to have rendered him evil for good.

Two things they quarrelled with Moses about. [1.] About his marriage: some think a late marriage with a Cushite or Arabian; others because of Zipporah, whom, on this occasion, they called, in scorn, an Ethiopian woman; and who, they insinuated, had too great an influence upon Moses in the choice of these seventy elders; perhaps there was some private falling out between Zipporah and Miriam, which occasioned some hot words, and one peevish reflection introduced another, till Moses and Aaron came to be interested. [2.] About his government; not the mismanagement of it, but the monopolizing of it, v. 2. Hath the Lord spoken only by Moses? Must he only have the choice of the persons on whom the spirit of prophecy shall come? Hath he not spoken also by us? Might not we have had a hand in that affair, and preferred our friends, as well as Moses his? They could not deny that God had spoken by Moses, but it was plain that he had sometimes spoken also by them; and that which they intended, was, to make themselves equal with him, though God had so many ways distinguished him. Note, Striving to be greatest, is a sin which easily besets disciples themselves, and it is exceeding sinful. Even those that are well preferred, are seldom pleased if others be better preferred. Those that excel are commonly envied.

2. The wonderful patience of Moses under this provocation. The LORD heard it, (v. 2.) but Moses himself took no notice of it, for (v. 3.) he was very meek. He had a great deal of reason to resent the affront; it was ill-natured and ill-timed, when the people were disposed to mutiny, and had lately given him a great deal of vexation with their murmurings, which would be in danger of breaking out again, when thus headed and countenanced by Aaron and Miriam; but he, as a deaf man, heard not. When God's honour was concerned, as in the case of the golden calf, no man more zealous than Moses, but when his own honour was touched, no man more meek; as bold as a lion in the cause of God, but as mild as a lamb in his own cause. God's people are the meek of the earth, (Zeph. 2. 3.) but some are more remarkable than others for this grace, as Moses, who was thus fitted for the work he was called to, which required all the meekness he had, and sometimes more. And sometimes the unkindness of our friends is a greater trial of our meekness than the malice of our enemies. Christ himself records his own meekness, (Matth. 11. 29.) I am meek and lowly in heart; and the copy of meekness which Christ has set was without a blot, that of Moses was not.

4. And the LORD spake suddenly unto Moses, and unto Aaron, and unto Miriam, Come out, ye three, unto the tabernacle of the congregation. And they three came out. 5. And the LORD came down in the pillar of the cloud, and stood in the door of the tabernacle, and called Aaron and Miriam: and they both came forth. 6. And he said, Hear now my words: If there be a prophet among you, I the LORD will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream. 7. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house. 8. With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and the similitude of the LORD shall he behold: wherefore then were ye not afraid to speak against my servant Moses? 9. And the anger of the LORD was kindled against them, and he departed.

Moses did not resent the injury done him, nor complain of it to God, nor make any appeal to him, but God resented it; he hears all we say in our passion, and is a swift Witness of our hasty speeches, which is a reason why we should resolutely bridle our tongues, that we speak not ill of others, and why we should patiently stop our ears, and not take notice of it, if others speak ill of us. I heard not, for thou wilt hear, Ps. 38. 13. 15. The more silent we are in our own cause, the more is God engaged to plead it. The accused innocent needs to say little, if he knows the judge himself will be his advocate.

I. The cause is called, and the parties are summoned forthwith to attend at the door of the tabernacle, v. 4, 5. Moses had often shewed himself zealous for God's honour, and now God shewed himself jealous for his reputation; for those that honour God he will honour, nor will he ever be behind-hand with any that appear for him. Judges of old sat in the gate of the city to try causes, and so, on this occasion, the Shechinah in the cloud of glory stood at the door of the tabernacle, and Aaron and Miriam, as delinquents, were called to the bar.

II. Aaron and Miriam were made to know, that, great as they were, they must not pretend to be equal to Moses, nor set up as rivals with him, v. 6, 8. Were they prophets of the Lord? Of Moses it might be truly said, He more.

It was true that God put a great deal of honour upon the prophets; however men mocked them and misused them, they were the favourites and intimates of Heaven. God made himself known to them, either by dreams when they were asleep, or by visions when they were awake, and by them made himself known to others. And those are happy, those are great, truly great, truly happy, to whom God makes himself known. Now he does it not by dreams and visions, as of old, but by the Spirit of wisdom and revelation, who makes known those things to babes, which prophets and kings desired to see, and might not. Hence in the last days, the days of the Messiah, the sons and daughters are said to prophesy, (Joel, 2. 28.) because they shall be better acquainted with the mysteries of the kingdom of grace than even the prophets themselves were; see Heb. 1. 1, 2.

2. Yet the honour put upon Moses was far greater, (v. 7.) My servant Moses is not so, he excels them all. To recompense Moses for his meek and patient bearing of the affronts which Miriam and Aaron gave him, God not only cleared him, but praised him; and took that occasion to give him an encomium, which remains upon record to his immortal honour; and thus shall they that are reviled and persecuted for righteousness' sake, have a great reward in heaven, Christ will confess them before his Father and the holy angels. (1.) Moses was a man of great integrity and tried fidelity. He is faithful in all my house. This is put first in his character, because grace excels gifts, love excels knowledge, and sincerity in the service of God puts a greater honour upon a man, and recommends him to the divine favour, more than learning, abstruse speculations, and an ability to speach with tongues. This is that part of Moses's character which the apostle quotes, when he would shew that Christ was greater than Moses; making it out that he was so in this chief instance of his greatness, for Moses was faithful only as a servant, but Christ as a son, Heb. 3. 2, 5, 6. God intrusted Moses to deliver his mind in all things to Israel; Israel intrusted him to treat for them with God; and he was faithful to both. He said and he did every thing in the management of that great affair as became an honest good man, that aimed at nothing else but the honour of God, and the welfare of Israel. (2.) Moses was therefore honoured with clearer discoveries of God's mind, and a more intimate communication with God, than any other prophet whatsoever. He shall, [1.] Hear more from God than any other prophet, more clearly and distinctly; With him will I speak worth to mouth, or face to face, (Exod. 33. 11.) as a man speaks to his friend, whom he discourses with freely and familiarly, and without any confusion or consternation, such as sometimes other prophets were under; as Ezekiel, and Daniel, and St. John himself, when God spake to them. By other prophets God sent to his people reproofs, and predictions of good or evil, which were properly enough delivered in dark speeches, figures, types, and parables; but by Moses he gave laws to his people, and the institution of holy ordinances, which could by no means be delivered by dark speeches, but must be expressed in the plainest and most intelligible manner. [2.] He shall see more of God than any other prophet; the similitude of the Lord shall he behold, as he hath seen in Horeb, when God proclaimed his name before him. yet he saw only the similitude of the Lord, angels and glorified spirits always behold the face of our Father. Moses had the spirit of prophecy in a way peculiar to himself, and which set him far above all other prophets; yet he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he, much more does our Lord Jesus infinitely excel him, Heb. 3. 1, &c.

Now let Miriam and Aaron consider who it was that they insulted. Were ye not afraid to speak against my servant Moses? Against my servant, against Moses? so it runs in the original. "How dare you abuse any servant of mine, especially such a servant as Moses, who is a friend, a confident, and steward of the house?" How durst they speak to the grief and reproach of one whom God had so much to say in the commendation of? Might they not expect that God would resent it, and take it as an affront to himself? Note, We have reason to be afraid of saying or doing any thing against the servants of God; it is at our peril if we do, for God will plead their cause, and reckons that what touches them touches the apple of his eye. It is a dangerous thing to offend Christ's little ones, Matth. 18. 6. Those are presumptuous indeed, that are not afraid to speak evil of dignities, 2 Pet. 2. 10.

III. God, having thus shewed them their fault and folly, next shews them his displeasure, v. 9. The anger of the Lord was kindled against them, of which perhaps some sensible indications were given in the change of the colour of the cloud, or some flashes of lightning from it. But, indeed, it was indication enough of his displeasure, that he departed, and would not so much as hear their excuse, for he needed not, understanding their thoughts afar off; and thus he would shew that he was displeased. Note, The removal of God's presence from us is the surest and saddest token of God's displeasure against us. Woe unto us if he depart; and he never departs, till we by our sin and folly drive him from us.

10. And the cloud departed from off the tabernacle; and, behold, Miriam became leprous, white as snow: and Aaron looked upon Miriam, and behold she was leprous. 11. And Aaron said unto Moses, Alas, my lord, I beseech thee, lay not the sin upon us, wherein we have done foolishly, and wherein we have sinned. 12. Let her not be as one dead, of whom the flesh is half-consumed when he cometh out of his mother's womb. 13. And Moses cried unto the LORD, saying, Heal her now, O God, I beseech thee. 14. And the LORD said unto Moses, If her father had but spit in her face, should she not be ashamed seven days? let her be shut out from the camp seven days, and after that let her be received in again. 15. And Miriam was shut out from the camp seven days: and the people journeyed not till Miriam was brought in again. 15. And afterward the people removed from Hazereth, and pitched in the wilderness of Paran.

Here is,

1. God's judgment upon Miriam, v. 10. The cloud departed from off that part of the tabernacle, in token of God's displeasure, and presently Miriam became leprous; when God goes, evil comes; expect no good when God departs. The leprosy was a disease often inflicted by the immediate hand of God as the punishment of some particular sin, as on Gehazi for lying, on Uzziah for invading the priest's office, and here on Miriam for scolding, and making mischief among relations. The plague of the leprosy, it is likely, appeared in her face, so that it appeared to all that saw her that she was struck with it, with the worst of it, she was leprous as snow; not only so white, but so soft; the solid flesh losing its consistency, as that which putrefies does. Her foul tongue (says Bishop Hall) is justly punished with a foul face, and her folly in pretending to be a rival with Moses is made manifest to all men, for every one sees his face to be glorious, and her's to be leprous. While Moses needs a veil to hide his glory, Miriam needs one to hide her shame. Note, Those distempers which any way deform us ought to be construed as a rebuke to our pride, and improved for the cure of it, and under such humbling providences we ought to be very humble. It is a sign that the heart is hard indeed, if the flesh be mortified, and yet the lusts of the flesh remain unmortified. It should seem that this plague upon Miriam was designed for an exposition of the law concerning the leprosy, (Lev. 13.) for it is referred to upon the rehearsal of that law, Deut. 24. 8, 9.

Miriam was struck with a leprosy, but not Aaron, because she was first in the transgression, and God would put a difference between those that mislead and those that are misled. Aaron's office, though it saved him from God's displeasure, yet it helped to secure him from this token of his displeasure; it would not only have suspended him for the present from officiating, when (there being no priests but himself and his two sons) he could ill be spared, but it would have rendered him and his office mean, and would have been a lasting blot upon his family. Aaron as priest was to be the judge of the leprosy, and his performing that part of his office upon this occasion, when he looked upon Miriam, and, behold, she was leprous, was a sufficient mortification to him. He was struck through her side, and he could not pronounce her leprous without blushing and trembling, knowing himself to be equally obnoxious. This judgment upon Miriam is improveable by us, as a warning to take heed of putting any affront upon our Lord Jesus. If she was thus chastised for speaking against Moses, what will become of those that sin against Christ?

II. Aaron's submission hereupon; (v. 11, 12.) he humbles himself to Moses, confesses his fault, and begs pardon. He that but just now joined with his sister in speaking against Moses, here is forced for himself and his sister to make a penitent address to him, and in the highest degree to magnify him, (as if he had the power of God to forgive and heal,) whom he had so lately vilified. Note, Those that trample upon the saints and servants of God will one day be glad to make court to them; at furthest, in the other world, as the foolish virgins to the wise for a little oil, and the rich man to Lazarus for a little water; and perhaps in this world, as Job's friend to him for his prayers, and here Aaron to Moses, Rev. 3. 9. In his submission, 1. He confesses his own and his sister's sin, v. 11. He speaks respectfully to Moses, of whom he had spoken slightly, calls him his lord, and now turns the reproach upon himself, speaks as one ashamed of what he had said; We have sinned, we have done foolishly: those sin, and do foolishly, who revile and speak evil of any, especially of good people, or of those in authority. Repentance is the unsaying of that which we have said amiss; and it had better be unsaid, than that we be undone by it. 2. He begs Moses's pardon; Lay not this sin upon us. Aaron was to bring his gift to the altar, but, knowing that his brother had something against him, he, of all men, was concerned to reconcile himself to his brother, that he might be qualified to offer his gift. Some think that this speedy submission, which God saw him ready to make, was that which prevented his being struck with a leprosy as his sister was. 3. He recommends the deplorable condition of his sister to Moses's compassionate consideration; (v. 12.) Let her not be as one dead, that is, "Let her not continue so separated from conversation, defiling all she touches, and even to putrefy above ground as one dead." He describes the misery of her case to move his pity.

III. The intercession Moses made for Miriam; (v. 13.) He cried unto the Lord with a loud voice; because the cloud, the symbol of his presence, was removed, and stood at some distance, and to express his fervency in this request, Heal her now, O Lord, I beseech thee. By this he made it appear that he did heartily forgive her the injury she had done him, that he had not accused her to God, nor called for justice against her; so far from that, that when God in tenderness to his honour had chastised her insolence, he was the first that moved for reversing the judgment. By this example we are taught to pray for them that despitefully use us: and not to take pleasure in the most righteous punishment inflicted either by God or man on those that have been injurious to us. Jeroboam's withered hand was restored at the special instance and request of the prophet against whom it had been stretched out, 1 Kings, 13. 6. So Miriam here was healed by the prayer of Moses, whom she had abused, and Abimelech by the prayer of Abraham, Gen. 20. 27. Moses might have stood off, and have said, "She is served well enough, let he govern her tongue better next time;" but, not content with being able to say that he had not prayed for the inflicting of the judgment, he prays earnestly for the removal of it. This pattern of Moses, and that of our Saviour, Father, forgive them, we must study to conform to.

IV. The accommodating of this matter, so as that mercy and justice might meet together. 1. Mercy takes place, so far as that Miriam shall be healed; Moses forgives her, and God will. (See 2 Cor. 2. 10.) But, 2. Justice takes place, so far as that Miriam shall be humbled; (v. 14.) Let her be shut out from the camp seven days; that she herself might be made more sensible of her fault, and penitent for it; and that her punishment might be the more public, and all Israel might take notice of it, and take warning by it not to mutiny. If Miriam the prophetess be put under such marks of humiliation for one hasty word spoken against Moses, what may we expect for our murmurings? If this be done in a green tree, what shall be done in the dry? See how people debase and diminish themselves by sin, stain their glory, and lay their honour in the dust; when Miriam praised God, we find her at the head of the congregation, and one of the brightest ornaments of it, Exod. 15. 20. Now that she quarrelled with God, we find her expelled as the filth and off-scouring of it.

A reason is given for her being put out of the camp for seven days, because thus she ought to accept of the punishment of her iniquity. If her father, her earthly father, had but spit in her face, and so signified his displeasure against her, would she not be so troubled and concerned at it, and so sorry that she had deserved it, as to shut herself up for some time in her room, and not come into his presence, or shew her face in the family, being ashamed of her own folly and unhappiness? If such reverence as this be owing to the fathers of our flesh, when they correct us, much more ought we to humble ourselves under the mighty hand of the Father of spirits, Heb. 12. 9. Note, When we are under the tokens of God's displeasure for sin, it becomes us to take shame to ourselves, and to lie down in that shame, owning that to us belongs confusion of face. If by our own fault and folly we expose ourselves to the reproach and contempt of men, the just censures of the church, or the rebukes of the Divine Providence, we must confess that our Father justly spits in our face, and be ashamed.

V. The hindrance that this gave to the people's progress; (v. 15.) The people journeyed not till Miriam was brought in again. God did not remove the cloud, and therefore they did not remove their camp. This was intended, 1. As a rebuke to the people, who were conscious to themselves of having sinned after the similitude of Miriam's transgression, in speaking against Moses: thus far, therefore, they shall share in her punishment, that it shall retard their march forward toward Canaan. Many things oppose us, but nothing hinders us, in the way to heaven, so as sin does. 2. As a mark of respect to Miriam. If the camp had removed during the days of her suspension, her trouble and shame had been the greater; therefore, in compassion to her, they shall stay till her excommunication be taken off, and she taken in again, it is probable, with the usual ceremonies of cleansing of lepers. Note, Those that are under censure and rebuke for sin ought to be treated with a great deal of tenderness, and not be over-loaded, no not with the shame they have deserved, not counted as enemies, (2 Thess. 3. 15.) but forgiven and comforted, 2 Cor. 2. 7. Sinners must be cast out with grief, and penitents taken in with joy. When Miriam was absolved and re-admitted, the people went forward into the wilderness of Paran, which joined up to the south border of Canaan, and thither their next remove had been, if they had not put a bar in their own way.

CHAP. XIII.

It is a memorable and very melancholy story which is related in this and the following chapter, of the turning back of Israel from the borders of Canaan, when they were just ready to set foot in it, and the sentencing of them to wander and perish in the wilderness, for their unbelief and murmuring. It is referred to Ps. 95. 7, &c. and improved for warning to us Christians, Heb. 3. 7, &c. In this chapter we have, I. The sending of twelve spies before them into Canaan, v. 1. .16. II. The instructions given to these spies, v. 17. .20. III. Their executing of their commission according to their instructions, and their return from the search, v. 21. .25. IV. The report they brought back to the camp of Israel, v. 26. .33.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Send thou men, that they may search the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel: of every tribe of their fathers shall ye send a man, every one a ruler among them. 3. And Moses by the commandment of the LORD sent them from the wilderness of Paran: all those men were heads of the children of Israel. 4. And these were their names: Of the tribe of Reuben, Shammua the son of Zaccur. 5. Of the tribe of Simeon, Shaphat the son of Hori. 6. Of the tribe of Judah, Caleb the son of Jephunneh. 7. Of the tribe of Issachar, Igal the son of Joseph. 8. Of the tribe of Ephraim, Oshea the son of Nun. 9. Of the tribe of Benjamin, Palti the son of Raphu. 10. Of the tribe of Zebulun, Gaddiel the son of Sodi. 11. Of the tribe of Joseph, namely, of the tribe of Manasseh, Gaddi the son of Susi. 12. Of the tribe of Dan, Ammiel the son of Gemalli. 13. Of the tribe of Asher, Sethur the son of Michael. 14. Of the tribe of Naphtali, Nahbi the son of Vophsi. 15. Of the tribe of Gad, Geuel the son of Machi. 16. These are the names of the men which Moses sent to spy out the land. And Moses called Oshea the son of Nun, Jehoshua. 17. And Moses sent them to spy out the land of Canaan, and said unto them, Get you up this way southward, and go up into the mountain: 18. And see the land, what it is; and the people that dwelleth therein, whether they be strong or weak, few or many; 19. And what the land is that they dwell in, whether it be good or bad; and what cities they be that they dwell in, whether in tents, or in strong holds; 20. And what the land is, whether it be fat or lean, whether there be wood therein, or not. And be ye of good courage, and bring of the fruit of the land. Now the time was the time of the first-ripe grapes.

Here we have,

1. Orders given to send spies to search out the land of Canaan. It is here said, God directed Moses to send them, (v. 1, 2.) but it appears, by the repetition of the story afterward, (Deut. 1. 22.) that the motion came originally from the people; they came to Moses, and said, We will send men before us; and it was the fruit of their unbelief. They would not take God's word that it was a good land; and that he would, without fail, put them in possession of it: they could not trust the pillar of cloud and fire to shew them the way to it, but had a better opinion of their own politics than of God's wisdom. How absurd was it for them to send to spy out a land which God himself had spied out for them; to inquire the way into it, when God himself had undertaken to shew them the way! But thus we ruin ourselves, by giving more credit to the reports and representations of sense than to divine revelation; we walk by sight, not by faith; whereas, if we will receive the witness of men, without doubt, the witness of God is greater. The people making this motion to Moses, he (perhaps not aware of the unbelief at the bottom of it) consulted God in the case, who bade him gratify the people in this matter, and send spies before them; "Let them walk in their own counsels." Yet God was no way accessory to the sin that followed, for the sending of these spies was so far from being the cause of the sin, that, if the spies had done their duty, and the people their's, it might have been the confirmation of their faith, and of good service to them.

2. The persons nominated that were to be employed in this service, (v. 4, &c.) One of each tribe, that it might appear to be the act of the people in general; and rulers, persons of figure in their respective tribes, some of the rulers of thousands or hundreds, to put the greater credit upon their embassy: this was designed for the best, but it proved to have this ill effect, that the quality of the persons occasioned the evil report they brought up to be the more credited, and the people to be the more influenced by it. Some think that they are all named for the sake of two good ones that were among them, Caleb and Joshua. Notice is taken of the change of Joshua's name upon this occasion, v. 16. He was Moses's minister, but had been employed, though of the tribe of Ephraim, as general of the forces that were sent out against Amalek. The name by which he was generally called and known in his own tribe was Oshea, but Moses called him Joshua, in token of his affection to him, and power over him; and now, it should seem, he ordered others to call him so, and fixed that to be his name from henceforward. Oshea signifies a prayer for salvation, Save thou; Joshua signifies a promise of salvation, He will save; in answer to that prayer; so near is the relation between prayers and promises. Prayers prevail for promises, and promises direct and encourage prayers. Some think that Moses designed, by taking the first syllable of the name Jehovah, and prefixing it to his name, which turned Hoshea into Jehoshua, to put an honour upon him, and to encourage him in this and all his future services with the assurances of God's presence. Yet after this he is called Hoshea, Deut. 32. 44. Jesus is the same name with Joshua, and it is the name of our Lord Christ, of whom Joshua was a type, as successor to Moses, Israel's captain, and conqueror of Canaan. There was another of the same name, who was also a type of Christ, Zech. 6. 11. Joshua was the Saviour of God's people from the powers of Canaan, but Christ is their Saviour from the powers of hell.

3. The instructions given to those spies. They were sent into the land of Canaan, the nearest way, to traverse the country, and to take account of its present state, v. 17. Two heads of inquiry were given them in charge, (1.) Concerning the land itself; See what that is; (v. 18. and again, v. 19.) see whether it be good or bad, and (v. 20.) whether it be fat or lean. All parts of the earth do not share alike in the blessing of fruitfulness; some countries are blest with a richer soil than others: Moses himself was well satisfied that Canaan was a very good land, but he sent these spies to bring an account of it for the satisfaction of the people; as John Baptist sent to Jesus, to ask whether he was the Christ; not to inform himself, but to inform those he sent. They must take notice whether the air was healthful or no, what the soil was, and what the productions; and, for the better satisfaction of the people, they must bring with them some of the fruits. (2.) Concerning the inhabitants—their number, few, or many; their size and stature, whether strong able-bodied men, or weak; their habitations—whether they lived in tents, or houses, whether in open villages, or in walled towns; whether the woods were standing as in those countries that are uncultivated, through the unskillfulness and slothfulness of the inhabitants; or whether the woods were cut down, and the country made champaign, for the convenience of tillage.

These were the things they were to inquire about. Perhaps there had not been of late years such commerce between Egypt and Canaan as there was in Jacob's time, else they might have informed themselves of these things without sending men on purpose to search. Observe the advantage we may derive from books and learning, which acquaint those that are curious and inquisitive with the state of foreign countries, at a much greater distance than Canaan was now from Israel, without this trouble and expence.

Moses dismisses the spies with this charge, Be of good courage; intimating, not only that they should be themselves encouraged against the difficulties of this expedition, but that they should bring an encouraging account to the people, and make the best of every thing. It was not only a great undertaking they were put upon, which required good management and resolution, but it was a great trust that was reposed in them, which required that they should be faithful.

21. So they went up, and searched the land from the wilderness of Zin unto Rehob, as men come to Hamath. 22. And they ascended by the south, and came unto Hebron; where Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai, the children of Anak, were. (Now Hebron was built seven years before Zoan in Egypt.) 23. And they came unto the brook of Eshcol, and cut down from thence a branch with one cluster of grapes, and they bare it between two upon a staff; and they brought of the pomegranates, and of the figs. 24. The place was called the brook Eshcol, because of the cluster of grapes which the children of Israel cut down from thence. 25. And they returned from searching of the land after forty days.

We have here a short account of the survey which the spies made of the promised land. 1. They went quite through it, from Zin in the south, to Rehob, near Hamath, in the north, v. 21. See ch. 34. 3, 8. It is probable that they did not go altogether, in a body, lest they should have been suspected, and taken up; which there would be the more danger of, if the Canaanites knew (and one would think they could not but know) how near the Israelites were to them; but they divided themselves into several companies, and so passed unsuspected, as way-faring men. 2. They took particular notice of Hebron, (v. 22.) probably, because near there was the field of Machpelah, where the patriarchs were buried, (Gen. 23. 2.) whose dead bodies did, as it were, keep possession of that land for their posterity. To this sepulchre they made a particular visit, and found the adjoining city in the possession of the sons of Anak, who are here named. In that place where they expected the greatest encouragements, they met with the greatest discouragements. Where the bodies of their ancestors kept possession for them, the giants keep possession against them. We are informed that they ascended by the south, and came to Hebron, that is, "Caleb," say the Jews, "in particular," for to his being there, we find express reference, Josh. 14. 9, 12, 13. But that others of the spies were there too, appears by their description of the Anakim, v. 33. 3. They brought a bunch of grapes with them, and some other of the fruits of the land, as a proof of the extraordinary goodness of the country. Probably, they furnished themselves with these fruits when they were leaving the country and returning. The cluster of grapes was so large, and so heavy, that they hung it upon a bar, and carried it between two of them, v. 23, 24. The place whence they took it was, from this circumstance, called the valley of the cluster; that famous cluster, which was to Israel both the earnest and the specimen of all the fruits of Canaan. Such are the present comforts which we have in communion with God, foretastes of the fulness of joy we expect in the heavenly Canaan. We may see by them what heaven is.

26. And they went and came to Moses, and to Aaron, and to all the congregation of the children of Israel, unto the wilderness of Paran, to Kadesh; and brought back word unto them, and unto all the congregation, and shewed them the fruit of the land. 27. And they told him, and said, We came unto the land whither thou sentest us, and surely it floweth with milk and honey; and this is the fruit of it. 28. Nevertheless the people be strong that dwell in the land, and the cities are walled, and very great: and moreover we saw the children of Anak there. 29. The Amalekites dwell in the land of the south: and the Hittites, and the Jebusites, and the Amorites, dwell in the mountains: and the Canaanites dwell by the sea, and by the coast of Jordan. 30. And Caleb stilled the people before Moses, and said, Let us go up at once, and possess it; for we are well able to overcome it. 31. But the men that went up with him said, We be not able to go up against the people; for they are stronger than we. 32. And they brought up an evil report of the land which they had searched unto the children of Israel, saying, The land, through which we have gone to search it, is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof; and all the people that we saw in it are men of a great stature. 33. And there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants: and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight.

It is a wonder how the people of Israel had patience to stay 40 days for the return of their spies, when they were just ready to enter Canaan under all the assurances of success they could have from the divine power, and a constant series of miracles that had hitherto attended them; but they distrusted God's power and promise, and were willing to be held in suspense by their own counsels, rather than be brought to a certainty by God's covenant. How much do we stand in our own light by our unbelief! Well, at length the messengers return, but they agree not in their report.

I. The major part discourage the people from going forward to Canaan; and justly are the Israelites left to this temptation, for putting so much confidence in the judgment of men, when they had the word of God to trust to. It is a righteous thing with God to give those up to strong delusions, who will not receive his truth in the love of it. Observe their report. 1. They cannot deny but that the land of Canaan was a very fruitful land; the bunch of grapes they brought with them was an ocular demonstration of it, v. 27. God had promised them a land flowing with milk and honey, and the evil spies themselves own that it is such a land. Thus even out of the mouth of adversaries will God be glorified, and the truth of his promise attested. And yet afterward they contradict themselves, when they say, (v. 32.) It is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof; as if, though it had milk, and honey, and grapes, yet it wanted other necessary provisions; some think that there was a great plague in the country at the time that they surveyed it, which they ought to have imputed to the wisdom of the Divine Providence, which thus lessened the numbers of their enemies, to facilitate their conquests; but they invidiously imputed it to the unwholesomeness of the air, and thence took occasion to disparage the country. For this unreasonable fear of a plague in Canaan, they justly were cut off immediately by a plague in the wilderness, ch. 14. 37. But, 2. They represent the conquest of it as altogether impracticable, and that it was to no purpose to attempt it. The people are strong, (v. 28.) men of a great stature, (v. 32.) stronger than we, v. 31. The cities are represented as impregnable fortresses, they are walled, and very great, v. 23. But nothing served their ill-purpose more than a description of the giants, which they lay a great stress upon. We saw the children of Anak there, (v. 28.) and again, we saw the giants, those men of a prodigious size, the sons of Anak, which come of the giants, v. 33. They spake as if they were ready to tremble at the mention of them, as they had done at the sight of them. "Oh these tremendous giants! when we were near them we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, not only little and weak, but trembling and daunted." Compare Job, 39. 20. Canst thou make him afraid as a grasshopper? Nay, and so we were in their sight; they looked upon us with as much scorn and disdain, as we did upon them with fear and trembling." So that upon the whole matter they give it in as their judgment, We be not able to go up against them, (v. 31.) and therefore must think of taking some other course.

Now, even if they had been to judge only by human probabilities, they could not have been excused from the imputation of cowardice. Were not the hosts of Israel very numerous? Six hundred thousand effective men, well-marshalled and modelled, closely embodied, and entirely united in interest and affection, constituted as formidable an army as perhaps was ever brought into the field, many a less has done more than perhaps the conquering of Canaan was, witness Alexander's army. Moses, their commander in chief, was wise and brave; and if the people had put on resolution, and behaved themselves valiantly, what could have stood before them? It is true, the Canaanites were strong, but they were dispersed, (v. 29.) Some dwell in the south, and others in the mountains; so that by reason of their distance, they could not soon get together, and by reason of their divided interests, they could not long keep together to oppose Israel. The country being plentiful would subsist an army, and though the cities were walled, if they could beat them in the field, the strong-holds would fall of course into their hands. And, lastly, as for the giants, their overgrown stature would but make them the better mark, and the bulkiest men have not always the best mettle.

But though they deserved to be posted for cowards, that was not the worst, the scripture brands them for unbelievers. It was not any human probabilities they were required to depend upon, but, (1.) They had the manifest and sensible tokens of God's presence with them, and the engagement of his power for them. The Canaanites were stronger than Israel; suppose they were, but were they stronger than the God of Israel? We are not able to deal with them, but is not God Almighty able? Have we not him in the midst of us? Does not he go before us? And is any thing too hard for him? Were we as grasshoppers before the giants, and are not they less than grasshoppers before God? Their cities are walled against us, but can they be walled against heaven? Beside this, (2.) They had very great experience of the length and strength of God's arm, lifted up and made bare on their behalf. Were not the Egyptians as much stronger than they, as the Canaanites were? And yet, without a sword drawn by Israel, or a stroke struck, the chariots and horsemen of Egypt were quite routed and ruined; the Amalekites took them at great disadvantages, and yet they were discomfited. Miracles were at this time their daily bread; were there nothing else, an army so well victualled as their's was, so constantly, so plentifully, and all on free cost, would have a great advantage against any other force. Nay, (3.) They had particular promises made them of victory and success in their wars against the Canaanites. God had given Abraham all possible assurances that he would put his seed into possession of that land, Gen. 15. 18.—17. 8. He had expressly promised them by Moses, that he would drive out the Canaanites from before them, (Exod. 33. 2.) and that he would do it by little and little, Exod. 23. 30. And, after all this, for them to say, We be not able to go up against them, was in effect to say, "God himself is not able to make his words good." It was in effect to give him the lie, and to tell him he had undertaken more than he could perform. We have a short account of their sin, with which they infected the whole congregation, Ps. 106. 24. They despised the land, they believed not his word. Though, upon search, they had found it as good as he had said, a land flowing with milk and honey; yet they would not believe it as sure as he had said, but despaired of having it, though Eternal Truth itself had engaged it to them. And now this is the representation of the evil spies.

II. Caleb encouraged them to go forward, though he was seconded by Joshua only, v. 30. Caleb stilled the people, whom he saw already put into a ferment, even before Moses himself, whose shining face could not daunt them, when they began to grow unruly. Caleb signifies all heart, and he answered his name; was hearty himself, and would have made the people so, if they would have hearkened to him. If Joshua had begun to stem the tide, he would have been suspected of partiality to Moses, whose minister he was; and therefore he prudently left it to Caleb's management at first, who was of the tribe of Judah, the leading tribe, and therefore fittest to be heard. Caleb had seen and observed the strength of the inhabitants as much as his fellows, and, upon the whole matter, 1. He speaks very confidently of success, We are well able to overcome them, as strong as they are. 2. He animates the people to go on, and, his lot lying in the van, he speaks as one resolved to lead them on with bravery, Let us go up at once, one bold step, one bold stroke more, will do our business; it is all our own, if we have but courage to make it so; Let us go up and possess it. He does not say, "Let us go up and conquer it;" he looks upon that to be as good as done already; but, "Let us go up and possess it; there is nothing to be done but to enter, and take the possession which God our great Lord is ready to give us." Note, The righteous are bold as a lion. Difficulties, that lie in the way of salvation, dwindle and vanish before a lively active faith in the power and promise of God. All things are possible, if they be but promised, to him that believes.

CHAP. XIV

This chapter gives us an account of that fatal quarrel between God and Israel, upon which, for their murmuring and unbelief, he swore in his wrath that they should not enter into his rest. Here is, I. The mutiny and rebellion of Israel against God, upon the report of the evil spies, r. 1. .4. II. The fruitless endeavour of Moses and Aaron, Caleb and Joshua, to still the tumult, r. 5. .10. III. Their utter ruin justly threatened by an offended God, r. 11. 12. IV. The humble intercession of Moses for them, r. 13. .19. V. A mitigation of the sentence, in answer to the prayer of Moses, they shall not all be cut off, but the decree goes forth ratified with an oath, published to the people, again and again repeated, that this whole congregation should perish in the wilderness, and none of them enter Canaan, but Caleb and Joshua only, v. 20. .35. VI. The present death of the evil spies, v. 36. .39. VII. The rebuke given to those who attempted to go forward notwithstanding, v. 40. .45. And this is written for our admonition, that we fall not after the same example of unbelief.

1. AND all the congregation lifted up their voice, and cried; and the people wept that night.
2. And all the children of Israel murmured against Moses and against Aaron: and the whole congregation said unto them, Would God that we had died in the land of Egypt! or would God we had died in this wilderness! 3. And wherefore hath the LORD brought us unto this land, to fall by the sword, that our wives and our children should be a prey? were it not better for us to return into Egypt? 4. And they said one to another, Let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt.

Here we see what mischief the evil spies made by their unfair representation. We may suppose that these twelve, that were impanelled to inquire concerning Canaan, had talked it over among themselves before they brought in their report in public; and Caleb and Joshua, it is likely, had done their utmost to bring the rest over to be of their mind, and if they would but have agreed that Caleb, according to his post, should have spoken for them all, as their foreman, all had been well; but the evil spies, it should seem, wilfully designed to raise this mutiny, purely in opposition to Moses and Aaron, though they could not propose any advantage to themselves by it, unless they hoped to be captains and commanders of the retreat into Egypt they were now meditating. But what came of it? Here, in these verses, we find those whom they studied to humour put into a vexation, and, before the end of the chapter, brought to ruin.

Observe,

I. How the people fretted themselves. They lifted up their voices, and cried, (v. 1.) giving credit to the report of the spies, rather than to the word of God, and, imagining their condition desperate, they laid the reins on the neck of their passions, and could keep no manner of temper; like foolish forward children, they fall a crying, yet know not what they cried for. It had been time enough to cry out, if the enemies had beaten up their quarters, and they seen the sons of Anak at the gate of their camp; but they that cried when nothing hurt them, deserved to have something given them to cry for. And, as if all had been already gone, they sat them down and wept that night. Note, Unbelief, or distrust of God, is a sin that is its own punishment. Those that do not trust God are continually vexing themselves. The world's mourners are more than God's, and the sorrow of the world worketh death.

II. How they flew in the face of their governors; murmured against Moses and Aaron, and in them reproached the Lord, v. 2, 3. The congregation of elders began the discontent, (v. 1.) but the contagion soon spread through the whole camp, for the children of Israel murmured. Jealousies and discontents spread like wild-fire among the unthinking multitude, who are easily taught to despise dominions, and to speak evil of dignities. 1. They look back with a causeless discontent. They wish that they had died in Egypt with the first-born that were slain there; or in the wilderness with those that lately died of the plague for lusting. See the prodigious madness of unbridled passions, which makes men prodigal even of that which nature accounts most dear, life itself. Never were so many months spent so pleasantly as these which they had spent since they came out of Egypt, loaded with honours, compassed with favours, and continually entertained with something or other that was surprising; and yet, as if all these things had not made it worth their while to live, they wished they had died in Egypt. And such a light opinion they had of God's tremendous judgments executed on their neighbours for their sin, that they wished they had shared with them in their plagues, rather than run the hazard of making a descent upon Canaan. They wish rather to die criminals under God's justice, than live conquerors in his favour. Some read it, Oh that we had died in Egypt, or in this wilderness; Oh that we might die! They wish to die for fear of dying; and have not sense enough to reason as the poor lepers, when, rather than die upon the spot, they ventured into an enemy's camp, If they kill us, we shall but die, 2 Kings, 7. 4. How base were the spirits of these degenerate Israelites, who, rather than die (if it come to the worst) like soldiers in the field of honour, with their swords in their hands, desire to be like rotten sheep in the wilderness. 2. They look forward with a groundless despair, taking it for granted, (v. 3.) that, if they went on, they must fall by the sword, and pretend to lay the cause of their fear upon the great care they had for their wives and children, who, they conclude, will be a prey to the Canaanites. And here is a most wicked blasphemous reflection upon God himself, as if he had brought them hither on purpose that they might fall by the sword, and that their wives and children, those poor innocents, should be a prey. Thus do they, in effect, charge that God, who is Love itself, with the worst of malice, and Eternal Truth, with the basest hypocrisy; suggesting, that all the kind things he had said to them, and done for them, hitherto, were intended only to decoy them, and to cover a secret design carried on all along to ruin them. Daring impudence! But what will not that tongue speak against heaven, that is set on fire of hell? The Devil keeps up his interest in the hearts of men by insinuating to them ill thoughts of God, as if he desired the death of sinners, and delighted in the hardships and sufferings of his own servants, whereas he knows his thoughts to us-ward (whether we know them so or no) to be thoughts of good, and not of evil, Jer. 29. 11.

III. How they came at last to this desperate resolve, that, instead of going forward to Canaan, they would go back again to Egypt. The motion is first made by way of query only, (v. 3.) Were it not better for us to return into Egypt? But the ferment being high, and the spirits of the people being disposed to entertain any thing that was perverse, it soon ripened to a resolution, without a debate; (v. 4.) Let us make a captain, and return to Egypt; and it is lamented long after, (Neh. 9. 17.) That in their rebellion they appointed a captain to return to their bondage; for they knew Moses would not be their captain in this retreat.

Now, 1. It was the greatest folly in the world to wish themselves in Egypt, or to think, that, if they were there, it would be better with them than it was. If they durst not go forward to Canaan, yet better be as they were, than go back to Egypt. What did they want? What had they to complain of? They had plenty, and peace, and rest, were under a good government, had good company, had the tokens of God's presence with them, and enough to make them easy even in the wilderness, if they had but hearts to be content. But whither were they thus eager to go to mend themselves? To Egypt! Had they so soon forgotten the sore bondage they were in there? Would they be again under the tyranny of their task-masters, and at the drudgery of making brick? And, after all the plagues which Egypt had suffered for their sakes, could they expect any better treatment there than they had formerly, and not rather much worse? In how little time (not a year and a half) have they forgotten all the sighs of their bondage, and all the songs of their deliverance! Like brute-beasts, they mind only that which is present, and their memories, with the other powers of reason, are sacrificed to their passions. See Ps. 106. 7. We find it threatened, (Deut. 28. 68.) as the completing of their misery, that they should be brought into Egypt again, and yet that is what they here wish for. Sinners are enemies to themselves; and those that walk not in God's counsels, consult their own mischief and ruin.

2. It was a most senseless ridiculous thing to talk of returning thither through the wilderness. Could they expect that God's cloud would lead them, or his manna attend them? And if they did not, the thousands of Israel must unavoidably be lost and perish in the wilderness. Suppose the difficulties of conquering Canaan were as they imagined, those of returning to Egypt were much greater. In this let us see, (1.) The folly of discontent and impatience under the crosses of our outward condition. We are uneasy at that which is, complain of our place and lot, and we would shift; but is there any place or condition in this world that has not something in it to make us uneasy, if we are disposed to be so? The way to better our condition, is, to get our spirits into a better frame; and instead of asking, "Were it not better to go to Egypt?" ask, "Were it not better to be content, and make the best of that which is?" (2.) The folly of apostacy from the ways of God. Heaven is the Canaan set before us, a land flowing with milk and honey: those that bring up ever so ill a report of it, cannot but say that it is indeed a good land, only it is hard to get to it; strict and serious godliness is looked upon as an impracticable thing, and this deters many who began well from going on; rather than undergo the imaginary hardships of a religious life, they run themselves upon the certain fatal consequences of a sinful course; and so they transcribe the folly of Israel, who, when they were within a step of Canaan, would make a captain, and return to Egypt.

5. Then Moses and Aaron fell on their faces before all the assembly of the congregation of the children of Israel. 6. And Joshua the son of Nun, and Caleb the son of Jephunneh, which were of them that searched the land, rent their clothes: 7. And they spake unto all the company of the children of Israel, saying, The land, which we passed through to search it, is an exceeding good land. 8. If the LORD delight in us, then he will bring us into this land, and give it us; a land which floweth with milk and honey. 9. Only rebel not ye against the LORD, neither fear ye the people of the land; for they are bread for us: their defence is departed from them, and the LORD is with us: fear them not. 10. But all the congregation bade stone them with stones. And the glory of the LORD appeared in the tabernacle of the congregation before all the children of Israel.

The friends of Israel here interpose to save them, if possible, from ruining themselves, but in vain. The physicians of their state would have healed them, but they would not be healed; their warning gave them warning, but they would not take the warning, and so their blood is upon their own heads.

I. The best endeavours were used to still the tumult, and if now at last they would have understood the things that belonged to their peace, all the following mischief had been prevented.

1. Moses and Aaron did their part, v. 5. Though it was against them that they murmured, (v. 2.) yet they bravely overlooked the affront and injury done them, and approved themselves faithful friends to those who were outrageous enemies to them. The clamour and noise of the people were so great, that Moses and Aaron could not be heard; should they order any of their servants to proclaim silence, the angry multitude would perhaps be the more clamorous, and therefore, to gain audience in the sight of all the assembly, they fell on their faces, thus expressing, (1.) Their humble prayers to God to still the noise of this sea, the noise of its waves, even the tumult of the people. (2.) The great trouble and concern of their own spirits; they fell down as men astonished and even thunder-struck, amazed to see a people throw away their own mercies; to see those so ill-humoured who were so well-taught. And, (3.) Their great earnestness with the people to cease their murmurings; they hoped to work upon them by this humble posture, and to prevail with them not to persist in their rebellion; Moses and Aaron beseech them to be reconciled unto God. What they said to them, Moses relates in the repetition of this story, Deut. 1. 29, 30. Be not afraid, the Lord your God shall fight for you. Note, Those that are zealous friends to precious souls will stoop to any thing for their salvation. Moses and Aaron, notwithstanding the posts of honour they are in, prostrate themselves to the people to beg of them not to ruin themselves.

2. Caleb and Joshua did their part; they rent their clothes in a holy indignation at the sin of the people, and a holy dread of the wrath of God, which they saw ready to break out against them; it was the greater trouble to these good men, because the tumult was occasioned by those spies with whom they had been joined in commission; and therefore they thought themselves obliged to do what they could to still the storm which their fellows had raised. No reasoning could be more pertinent and pathetical than their's here, (v. 7.. 9.) and they spake as with authority. (1.) They assured them of the goodness of the land they had surveyed, and that it was worth venturing for, and not a land that ate up the inhabitants, as the evil spies had represented it. It is an exceeding good land, (v. 7.) it is very, very good; so the word is; so that they had no reason to despise this pleasant land. Note, If men were but thoroughly convinced of the desirableness of the gains of religion, they would not stick at the services of it. (2.) They made nothing of the difficulties that seemed to lie in the way of their gaining the possession of it. "Fear not the people of the land, v. 9. Whatever formidable ideas have been given you of them, the lion is not so fierce as he is painted; they are bread for us," that is, "they are set before us rather to be fed upon than to be fought with; so easily, so pleasantly, and with so much advantage to ourselves, shall we master them." Pharaoh is said to have been given them for meat, (Ps. 74. 14.) and the Canaanites will be so too. They shew, that, whatever was suggested to the contrary, the advantage was clear on Israel's side. For, [1.] Though the Canaanites dwell in walled cities, they are naked, their defence was departed from them; that common providence, which preserves the rights of nations, has abandoned them, and will be no shelter or protection to them. The other spies took notice of their strength, but these of their wickedness, and from thence inferred that God had forsaken them, and therefore their defence was departed. No people can be safe when they have provoked God to leave them. [2.] Though Israel dwell in tents, they are fortified, The Lord is with us, and his name is a strong tower; fear them not. Note, While we have the presence of God with us, we need not fear the most powerful force against us. (3.) They shewed them plainly, that all the danger they were in was from their own discontents, and that they would succeed against all their enemies, if they did not make God their enemy. On this point alone the cause would turn, (v. 8.) "If the Lord delight in us, as certainly he does, and will, if we do not provoke him, he will bring us into this good land; we shall without fail get it in possession by his favour, and the light of his countenance, (Ps. 44. 3.) if we do not forfeit his favour, and by our own follies turn away our own mercies." It is come to this issue, (v. 9.) Only rebel not ye against the Lord. Note, Nothing can ruin sinners but their own rebellion. If God leave them, it is because they drive him from them; and they die, because they will die. None are excluded the heavenly Canaan, but those that exclude themselves. And now, could the case have been made more plain? could it have been urged more closely? But what was the effect?

II. It was all to no purpose; they were deaf to this fair reasoning; nay, they were exasperated by it, and grew more outrageous, (v. 10.) All the congregation bade stone them with stones. The rulers of the congregation, and the great men, (so Bishop Patrick,) ordered the common people to fall upon them, and knock their brains out. Their case was sad indeed, when their leaders thus caused them to err. Note, It is common for those whose hearts are fully set in them to do evil, to rage at those who give them good counsel. They who hate to be reformed, hate those that would reform them, and count them their enemies, because they tell them the truth. Thus early did Israel begin to misuse the prophets, and stone those that were sent to them, and this was it that filled the measure of their sin, (Matth. 23. 37.) Stone them with stones! Why, what evil have they done? No crime can be laid to their charge; but the truth is, those two witnesses tormented them that were obstinate in their infidelity, Rev. 11. 10.

Caleb and Joshua had but just said, The Lord is with us, fear them not, (v. 9.) and if Israel will not apply those encouraging words to their own fears, they that uttered them know how to encourage themselves with them against this enraged multitude that spake of stoning them; as David in a like case, 1 Sam. 30. 6. Those that cannot prevail to edify others with their counsels and comforts, should endeavour at least to edify themselves. Caleb and Joshua knew they appeared for God and his glory, and therefore doubted not but God would appear for them and their safety. And they were not disappointed, for immediately the glory of the Lord appeared, to the terror and confusion of those that were for stoning the servants of God. When they reflected upon God, (v. 3.) his glory appeared not to silence their blasphemies; but when they threatened Caleb and Joshua, they touched the apple of his eye, and his glory appeared immediately. Note, Those who faithfully expose themselves for God are sure to be taken under his special protection, and shall be hid from the rage of men, either under heaven or in heaven.

11. And the LORD said unto Moses, How long will this people provoke me? and how long will it be ere they believe me, for all the signs which I have shewed among them? 12. I will smite them with the pestilence, and disinherit them, and will make of thee a greater nation and mightier than they. 13. And Moses said unto the LORD, Then the Egyptians shall hear it, (for thou broughtest up this people in thy might from among them;) 14. And they will tell it to the inhabitants of this land: for they have heard that thou LORD art among this people, that thou LORD art seen face to face, and that thy cloud standeth over them, and that thou goest before them, by day time in a pillar of a cloud, and in a pillar of fire by night. 15. Now if thou shalt kill all this people as one man, then the nations which have heard the fame of thee will speak, saying, 16. Because the LORD was not able to bring this people into the land which he swore unto them, therefore he hath slain them in the wilderness. 17. And now, I beseech thee, let the power of my LORD be great, according as thou hast spoken, saying, 18. The LORD is longsuffering, and of great mercy, forgiving iniquity and transgression, and by no means clearing the guilty, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation. 19. Pardon, I beseech thee, the iniquity of this people, according unto the greatness of thy mercy, and as thou hast forgiven this people, from Egypt even until now.

Here is,

I. The righteous sentence which God gave against Israel for their murmuring and unbelief, which, though afterward mitigated, shewed what was the desert of their sin, and the demand of injured justice; and what would have been done, if Moses had not interposed. When the glory of the Lord appeared in the tabernacle, we may suppose that Moses took it for a call to him immediately to come and attend there, as, before the tabernacle was erected, he went up to the mount in a like case, Exod. 32. 30. Thus, while the people were studying to disgrace him, God publicly put honour upon him, as the man of his counsel. Now here we are told what God said to him there.

1. He shewed him the great evil of the people's sin, v. 11. What passed between God and Israel went through the hand of Moses; when they were displeased with God, they told Moses of it, (v. 2.) when God was displeased with them, he told Moses too, revealing his secret to his servant the prophet, Amos, 3. 7. Two things God justly complains of to Moses, (1.) Their sin. They provoke me; or, as the word signifies, they reject, reproach, despise me, for they will not believe me. That was the bitter root which bore the gall and wormwood. It was their unbelief that made this a day of provocation in the wilderness, Heb. 3. 8. Note, Distrust of God, and his power and promise, is itself a very great provocation, and at the bottom of many other provocations. Unbelief is a great sin, (1 John, 5. 10.) and a root-sin, Heb. 3. 12. (2.) Their continuance in it: How long will they do so? Note, The God of heaven keeps an account how long sinners persist in their provocations; and the longer they do, the more he is displeased. The aggravations of their sin were, [1.] Their relation to God. This people, a peculiar people, a professing people. The nearer any are to God in name and profession, the more is he provoked by their sins, especially their unbelief. [2.] The experience they had had of God's power and goodness, in all the signs which he had shewed among them, by which, one would think, he had effectually obliged them to trust him and follow him. The more God has done for us, the greater is the provocation if we distrust him.

2. He shewed him the sentence which justice passed upon them for it, v. 12. "What remains now, but that I should make a full end of them? It will soon be done, I will smite them with the pestilence, not leave a man of them alive, but wholly blot out their name and race, and so disinherit them, and be no more troubled with them. Ah, I will ease me of mine adversaries. They wish to die; and let them die, and neither root nor branch be left of them. Such rebellious children deserve to be disinherited." And if it be asked, "What will become of God's covenant with Abraham then?" here is an answer, "It shall be preserved in the family of Moses, I will make of thee a greater nation." Thus, (1.) God would try Moses, whether he still continued that affection for Israel that he formerly expressed upon a like occasion, in preferring their interests before the advancement of his own family; and it is proved that Moses was still of the same public spirit, and could not bear the thought of raising his own name upon the ruin of the name of Israel. (2.) God would teach us that he will not be a Loser by the ruin of sinners. If Adam and Eve had been cut off and disinherited, he could have made another Adam and another Eve, and have glorified his mercy in them, as here he could have glorified his mercy in Moses, though Israel had been ruined.

II. The humble intercession Moses made for them. Their sin had made a fatal breach in the wall of their defence, at which destruction had certainly entered, if Moses had not seasonably stepped in, and made it good. Here he was a type of Christ, who interceded for his persecutors, and prayed for them that despitefully used him, leaving us an example to his own rule, Matth. 5. 44.

1. The prayer of his petition is, in one word, Pardon, I beseech thee, the iniquity of this people; (v. 19.) that is, "Do not bring upon them the ruin they deserve." This was Christ's prayer for those that crucified him, Father, forgive them. The pardon of a national sin, as such, consists in the turning away of the national punishment; and that is it for which Moses is here so earnest.

2. The pleas are many, and strongly urged.

(1.) He insists most upon the plea that is taken from the glory of God; (v. 13. .16.) with this he begins, and somewhat abruptly, taking occasion from that dreadful word, I will disinherit them; Lord, (says he,) then the Egyptians shall hear it. God's honour lay nearer to his heart than any interests of his own. Observe how he orders this cause before God. He pleads, [1.] That the eyes both of Egypt and Canaan were upon them, and great expectations were raised concerning them. They could not but have heard that thou, Lord, art among this people, v. 14. The neighbouring countries rang of it, how much this people were the particular care of Heaven, so as never any people under the sun were. [2.] That if they should be cut off, great notice would be taken of it. "The Egyptians will hear it, (v. 13.) for they have their spies among us, and they will tell it to the inhabitants of the land;" (v. 14.) for there was great correspondence between Egypt and Canaan, although not by the way of this wilderness. "If a people that have made so great a noise be all consumed, and their mighty pretensions come to nothing, but go out as a snuff, it will be told with pleasure in Gath, and published in the streets of Askelon; and what construction will they put upon it? It will be impossible to make them understand it as an act of God's justice, and, as such, redounding to God's honour; brutish men know not this, (Ps. 92. 6.) but they will impute it to the failing of God's power, and so turn it to his reproach, v. 16. They will say, He slew them in the wilderness, because he was not able to bring them to Canaan, his arm being shortened, and his stock of miracles being spent. Now, Lord, let not one attribute be glorified at the expence of another; rather let mercy rejoice against judgment, than that almighty power should be impeached." Note, The best pleas in prayer are those that are taken from God's honour; for they agree with the first petition of the Lord's Prayer, Hallowed by thy name. Do not disgrace the throne of thy glory. God pleads it with himself, (Deut. 32. 27.) I feared the wrath of the enemy; and we should use it as an argument with ourselves, to walk so in every thing as to give no occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, 1 Tim. 6. 1.

(2.) He pleads God's proclamation of his name at Horeb, (v. 17, 18.) Let the power of the Lord be great: power is here put for pardoning mercy; it is his power over his own anger. If he should destroy them, God's power would be questioned; if he should continue and complete their salvation, notwithstanding the difficulties that arose, not only from the strength of their enemies, but from their own provocations, this would greatly magnify the divine power: what cannot He do, who could make so weak a people conquerors, and such an unworthy people favourites? The more desirous we should be to see it glorified. To enforce this petition, he refers himself to the word which God had spoken, The Lord is long-suffering, and of great mercy. God's goodness had there been spoken of as his glory; God had gloried in it, Exod. 34. 6, 7. Now here he prays that upon this occasion he would glorify it. Note, We must take our encouragement in prayer from the word of God, upon which he has caused us to hope, Ps. 119. 49. "Lord, be and do according as thou hast spoken; for, hast thou spoken, and wilt thou not make it good?" Three things God had solemnly made a declaration of, which Moses here fastens upon, and improves for the enforcing of his petition. [1.] The goodness of God's nature in general; that he is long-suffering, or slow to anger, and of great mercy; not soon provoked, but tender and compassionate towards offenders. [2.] His readiness in particular to pardon sin, forgiving iniquity and transgression, sins of all sorts. [3.] His unwillingness to proceed to extremity, even when he does punish. For in this sense the following words may be read; That will by no means make quite desolate, in visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children. God had indeed said in the second commandment that he would thus visit, but here he promises not to make a full end of families, churches, and nations, at once; and so it is very applicable to this occasion, for Moses cannot beg that God would not at all punish this sin, (it would be too great an encouragement to rebellion, if he should set no mark of his displeasure upon it,) but that he would not kill all this people as one man, v. 15. He does not ask that they may not be corrected, but that they may not be disinherited. And this proclamation of God's name was the more apposite to his purpose, because it was made upon occasion of the pardoning of their sin in making the golden calf. This sin which they were now fallen into was bad enough, but it was not idolatry.

(3.) He pleads past experience, (v. 19.) As thou hast forgiven this people from Egypt. This seemed to make against him: why should they be forgiven any more, who, after they had been so often forgiven, revolted yet more and more, and seemed hardened and encouraged in their rebellion by the lenity and patience of their God, and the frequent pardons they had obtained? Among men it would have been thought impolitic to take notice of such a circumstance in a request of this nature, as it might operate to the prejudice of the petitioner: but, as in other things, so in pardoning sin, God's thoughts and ways are infinitely above our's, Isa. 55. 9. Moses looks upon it as a good plea, Lord, forgive, as thou hast forgiven. It will be no more a reproach to thy justice, nor any less the praise of thy mercy, to forgive now, than it has been formerly. Therefore the sons of Jacob are not consumed, because they have to do with a God that changes not, Mal. 3. 6.

20. And the LORD said, I have pardoned according to thy word: 21. But as truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the LORD. 22. Because all those men which have seen my glory, and my miracles, which I did in Egypt and in the wilderness, and have tempted me now these ten times, and have not hearkened to my voice; 23. Surely they shall not see the land which I swore unto their fathers, neither shall any of them that provoked me see it: 24. But my servant Caleb, because he had another spirit with him, and hath followed me fully, him will I bring into the land wherinto he went; and his seed shall possess it. 25. (Now the Amalekites and the Canaanites dwelt in the valley.) Tomorrow turn you, and get you into the wilderness by the way of the Red sea. 26. And the LORD spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, 27. How long shall I bear with this evil congregation, which murmur against me? I have heard the murmurings of the children of Israel, which they murmur against me. 28. Say unto them, As truly as I live, saith the LORD, as ye have spoken in mine ears, so will I do to you: 29. Your carcasses shall fall in this wilderness; and all that were numbered of you, according to your whole number, from twenty years old and upward, which have murmured against me, 30. Doubtless ye shall not come into the land, concerning which I swear to make you dwell therein, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun. 31. But your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, them will I bring in, and they shall know the land which ye have despised. 32. But as for you, your carcasses, they shall fall in this wilderness. 33. And your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years, and bear your whoredoms, until your carcasses be wasted in the wilderness. 34. After the number of the days in which ye searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year, shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years, and ye shall know my breach of promise. 35. I the LORD have said, I will surely do it unto all this evil congregation, that are gathered together against me: in this wilderness they shall be consumed, and there they shall die.

We have here God's answer to the prayer of Moses, which sings both of mercy and judgment. It is given privately to Moses, (v. 20. . 25.) and then directed to be made public to the people, v. 26. . 35. The frequent repetitions of the same things in it speak these resolves to be unalterable. Let us see the particulars.

I. The extremity of the sentence is recorded from v. 20. "I have pardoned, so as not to cut them off all at once, and disinherit them." See the power of prayer, and the delight God takes in putting an honour upon it. He designed a pardon, but Moses shall have the praise of obtaining it by prayer: it shall be done according to thy word; thus, as a prince, he has power with God, and prevails. See what countenance and encouragement God gives to our intercessions for others, that we may be public-spirited in prayer. Here is a whole nation rescued from ruin by the effectual fervent prayer of one righteous man. See how ready God is to forgive sin, and how easy to be entreated. Pardon, says Moses, (v. 19.) I have pardoned, says God, v. 20. David found him thus swift to shew mercy, Ps. 32, 5. He deals not with us after our sins, Ps. 103, 10.

II. The glorifying of God's name is, in the general, resolved upon, v. 21. It is said, it is sworn, All the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord. Moses in his prayer had shewed a great concern for the glory of God. "Let me alone," says God, "to secure that effectually, and to advance it, by this dispensation." All the world shall see how God hates sin even in his own people, and will reckon for it, and yet how gracious and merciful he is, and how slow to anger. Thus, when our Saviour prayed, Father, glorify thy name; he was immediately answered, I have glorified it, and will glorify it yet again, John, 12, 28. Note, Those that sincerely seek God's glory may be sure of what they seek. God having turned this prayer for the glorifying of himself into a promise, we may turn it into praise, in concert with the angels, Isa. 6, 3. The earth is full of his glory.

III. The sin of this people, which provoked God to proceed against them, is here aggravated, v. 22, 27. It is not made worse than really it was, but is shewed to be exceeding sinful. It was an evil congregation, each bad, but all together in congregation very bad. 1. They tempted God, tempted his power, whether he could help them in their straits, his goodness, whether he would, and his faithfulness, whether his promise would be performed. They tempted his justice, whether he would resent their provocations, and punish them or no. They dared him; and in effect challenged him, as God does the idols, (Isa. 41, 23.) to do good, or do evil. 2. They murmured against him. This is much insisted on, v. 27. As they questioned what he would do, so they quarrelled with him for every thing he did or had done; continually fretting and finding fault. It does not appear that they murmured at any of the laws or ordinances that God gave them, (though they proved a heavy yoke,) but they murmured at the conduct they were under, and the provision made for them. Note, It is much easier to bring ourselves to the external services of religion, and observe all the formalities of devotion, than to live a life of dependence upon, and submission to, the Divine Providence in the course of our conversation. 3. They did this after they had seen God's miracles in Egypt and the wilderness, v. 2. They would not believe their own eyes, which were witnesses for God that he was in the midst of them of a truth. 4. They had repeated the provocations ten times, that is, very often: the Jewish writers reckon this exactly the tenth time that the body of the congregation had provoked God. First at the Red sea, Exod. 14, 11. In Marah, Exod. 15, 23, 24. In the wilderness of sin, Exod. 16, 2. Twice about manna, Exod. 16, 20, 27. At Rephidim, ch. 17, 1, 2. The golden calf, Exod. 32. Then at Taberah, then at Kibroth-hattaavah, ch. 11. And so this was the tenth. Note, God keeps an account how often we repeat our provocations, and will sooner or later set them in order before us. 5. They had not hearkened to his voice, though he had again and again admonished them of their sin.

IV. The sentence passed upon them for this sin.

1. That they should not see the promised land, (v. 23.) nor come into it, v. 30. He sware in his wrath that they should not enter into his rest, Ps. 95, 11. Note, Disbelief of the promise is a forfeiture of the benefit of it. Those that despised the pleasant land shall be shut out of it. The promise of God should be fulfilled to their posterity, but not to them.

2. That they should immediately turn back into the wilderness, v. 25. Their next remove should be a retreat; they must face about, and, instead of going forward to Canaan, on the very borders of which they now were, they must withdraw toward the Red sea again. To-morrow turn you; that is, "Very shortly you shall be brought back to that vast howling wilderness which you are so weary of. And it is time to shift for your own safety, for the Amalekites lie in wait in the valley, ready to attack you, if you march forward." Of them they had been distrustfully afraid, (ch. 13, 29.) and now with them God justly frightened them. The fear of the wicked shall come upon him.

3. That all those who were now grown up to men's estate should die in the wilderness, not all at once, but by degrees. They wished that they might die in the wilderness, and God said Amen to their passionate wish, and made their sin their ruin, swared them in the words of their mouth, and caused their own tongue to fall upon them, took them at their word, and determined that their carcasses should fall in the wilderness, v. 28, 29. and again, v. 32, 35. See with what contempt they are spoken of, now that they had by their sin made themselves vile; the mighty men of valour were but carcasses, when the Spirit of the Lord was departed from them. They were all as dead men. Their fathers had such a value for Canaan, that they desired to have their dead bodies carried thither to be buried, in token of their dependence upon God's promise that they should have that land for a possession; but these, having despised that good land, and disbelieved the promise of it, shall not have the honour to be buried in it, but shall have their graves in the wilderness.

4. That, in pursuance to this sentence, they should wander to and fro in the wilderness, like travellers that have lost themselves, for forty years; that is, so long as to make it full forty years from their coming out of Egypt to their entrance into Canaan, v. 33, 34. Thus long they were kept wandering, (1.) To answer the number of the days in which the spies were searching the land. They were content to wait forty days for the testimony of men, because they could not take God's word; and therefore justly are they kept forty years waiting for the performance of God's promise. (2.) That hereby they might be brought to repentance, and find mercy with God in the other world, whatever became of them in this. Now they had time to bethink themselves, and to consider their ways; and the inconveniencies of the wilderness would help to humble them and prove them, and shew them what was in their heart, Deut. 8, 2. Thus long they bore their iniquities, feeling the weight of God's wrath in the punishment. They were made to groan under the burthen of their own sin that brought it upon them, which was too heavy for them to bear. (3.) That they might sensibly feel what a dangerous thing it is for God's covenant-people to break with him. "Ye shall know my breach of promise, both the causes of it, that it is procured by your sin," (for God never leaves any till they first leave him,) "and the consequences of it, that will produce your ruin; you are quite undone when you are thrown out of covenant." (4.) That a new generation might in this time be raised up, which could not be done all of a sudden. And the children being brought up under the tokens of God's displeasure against their fathers, and so bearing their whoredoms, that is the punishment of their sins, especially their idolatry about the golden calf, which God now remembered against them, might take warning not to tread in the steps of their fathers' disobedience. And their wandering so long in the wilderness would make Canaan at last the more welcome to them. It should seem that upon occasion of this sentence Moses penned the 90th Psalm, which is very apposite to the present state of Israel, and wherein they are taught to pray, that, since this sentence could not be reversed, it might be sanctified, and they might learn to apply their hearts unto wisdom.

V. The mercy that was mixed with this severe sentence. 1. Mercy to Caleb and Joshua; that though they should wander with the rest in the wilderness, yet they, and they only of all that were now above twenty years old, should survive the years of banishment, and live to enter Canaan. Caleb only is spoken of, v. 42.

and a particular mark of honour put upon him, both, (1.) In the character given of him, he had another spirit, different from the rest of the spies, an after-spirit, which furnished him with second thoughts, and he followed the Lord fully, kept close to his duty, and went through with it, though deserted and threatened; and, (2.) In the recompence promised to him, Him will I bring in due time into the land whereunto he went. Note, [1.] It ought to be the great care and endeavour of every one of us to follow the Lord fully. We must, in a course of obedience to God's will, and service to his honour, follow him universally without dividing, uprightly without dissembling, cheerfully without disputing, and constantly without declining; and this is following him fully. [2.] Those that would follow God fully must have another spirit, another from the spirit of the world, and another from what their own spirit has been. They must have the spirit of Caleb. [3.] Those that follow God fully in times of general apostacy, God will own and honour by singular preservations, in times of general calamity. The heavenly Canaan shall be the everlasting inheritance of those that follow the Lord fully. When Caleb is again mentioned, (v. 30.) Joshua stands with him, compassed with the same favours, and crowned with the same honours, having stood with him in the same services. 2. Mercy to the children, even of these rebels. They should have a seed preserved, and Canaan secured to that seed, v. 31. Your little ones, now under twenty years old, which ye, in your unbelief, said should be a prey, them will I bring in. They had invidiously charged God with a design to ruin their children, v. 3. But God will let them know that he can put a difference between the guilty and the innocent, and cut them off without touching their children. Thus the promise made to Abraham, though it seemed to fail for a time, was kept from failing for evermore: and though God chastened their transgressions with a rod, yet his loving kindness he would not utterly take away.

36. And the men, which Moses sent to search the land, who returned, and made all the congregation to murmur against him, by bringing up a slander upon the land; 37. Even those men that did bring up the evil report upon the land, died by the plague before the LORD. 38. But Joshua the son of Nun, and Caleb the son of Jephunneh, which were of the men that went to search the land, lived still. 39. And Moses told these sayings unto all the children of Israel: and the people mourned greatly. 40. And they rose up early in the morning, and gat them up into the top of the mountain, saying, Lo, we be here, and will go up unto the place which the LORD hath promised: for we have sinned. 41. And Moses said, Wherefore now do ye transgress the commandment of the LORD? but it shall not prosper. 42. Go not up, for the LORD is not among you; that ye be not mitten before your enemies. 43. For the Amalekites and the Canaanites are there before you, and ye shall fall by the sword: because ye are turned away from the LORD, therefore the LORD will not be with you. 44. But they presumed to go up unto the hill-top: nevertheless the ark of the covenant of the LORD, and Moses, departed not out of the camp. 45. Then the Amalekites came down, and the Canaanites which dwelt in that hill, and smote them, and discomfited them, even unto Hormah.

Here is,

I. The sudden death of the ten evil spies. While the sentence was passing upon the people, before it was published, they died of the plague before the Lord, v. 36, 37. Now, 1. God hereby shewed his particular displeasure against them who sinned and made Israel to sin. (1.) They sinned themselves in bringing up a slander upon the land of promise. Note, Those greatly provoke God who misrepresent religion, cast reproach upon it, and raise prejudices in men's minds against it, or give occasion to those to do so, who seek occasion. Those that represent the service of God as mean and despicable, melancholy and uncomfortable, hard and impracticable, needless and unprofitable, bring up an evil report upon the good land, pervert the right ways of the Lord, and in effect give him the lie. (2.) They made Israel to sin. They designedly made all the congregation murmur against God. Note, Ringleaders in sin may expect to fall under particular marks of God's wrath, who will severely reckon for the blood of souls which is thus spilt. 2. God hereby shewed what he could have done with the whole congregation, and gave an earnest of the execution of the sentence now passed upon them. He that thus cut off one of a tribe, could have cut off the whole tribes suddenly, and would do it gradually. Note, The remarkable deaths of notorious sinners are earnest of the final perdition of ungodly men, 2 Pet. 2. 5, 6. Thus the wrath of God is revealed, that sinners may hear and fear.

II. The special preservation of Caleb and Joshua, (v. 38.) They lived still. It is probable that all the twelve spies stood together, for the eyes of all Israel were now upon them; and therefore it is taken notice of as very remarkable, and which could not but be affecting to the whole congregation, that, when the ten evil spies fell down dead of the plague, a malignant infectious distemper, yet these two that stood among them lived, and were well. God hereby confirmed their testimony, and put those to confusion that spake of stoning them. He likewise gave them an assurance of their continued preservation in the wilderness, when thousands should fall on their right hand, and on their left, Ps. 91. 7. Death never misses his mark, nor takes any by oversight that were designed for life, though in the midst of those that were to die.

III. The publication of the sentence to all the people, v. 39. He told them all what the decree was which was gone forth concerning them, and which could not be reversed; that they must all die in the wilderness, and Canaan must be reserved for the next generation. It was a very great disappointment, we may well think, to Moses himself, who longed to be in Canaan, as well as to all the people: yet he acquiesced, but they wept and mourned greatly. The assurance which Moses had of God's being glorified by this sentence, gave him satisfaction, while the consciousness of their own guilt, and their having procured it to themselves, gave them the greatest vexation. They wept for nothing, (v. 1.) and now they have cause given them to weep; so justly are murmurers made mourners. If they had mourned for the sin, when they were faithfully reproved for it, (v. 9.) the sentence had been prevented; but now that they mourned for the judgment only, it came too late, and did them no service; they found no place for repentance, though they sought it carefully with tears, Heb. 12. 17. Such mourning as this there is in hell, but the tears will not quench the flames, no, nor cool the tongue.

IV. The foolish fruitless attempt of some of the Israelites to enter Canaan, notwithstanding the sentence.

1. They were now earnest to go forward toward Canaan, v. 40. They were up early, mustered all their force, got together in a body, and begged of Moses to lead them on against the enemy, and now there is no more talk among them of making a captain to return into Egypt. They confess their fault, We have sinned; they profess reformation, Lo, we be here, and will go up. They now desire the land which they had despised, and put a confidence in the promise which they had distrusted. Thus when God judges, he will overcome, and, first or last, will convince sinners of the evil of all their ungodly deeds, and hard speeches, and force them to recall their own words. But though God was glorified by this recantation of their's, they were not benefited by it, because it came too late. The decree was gone forth, the consumption was determined, they did not seek the Lord while he might be found, and now he would not be found. Oh, if men would but be as earnest for heaven while their day of grace lasts, as they will be when it is over, would be as solicitous to provide themselves with oil while the bridegroom tarries, as they will be when the bridegroom comes, how well were it for them!

2. Moses utterly disallows their motion, and forbids the expedition they were meditating, (v. 41. . 43.) Go not up. (1.) He gives them warning of the sin, it is transgressing the commandment of the Lord, who had expressly ordered them, when they did move, to move back toward the Red sea. Note, That which has been duty in its season, when it comes to be mis-timed, may be turned into sin. It is true, the command he refers to was in the nature of a punishment, but he that has not obeyed the law is obliged to submit to the penalty, for the Lord is our Judge, as well as Law-Giver. (2.) He gives them warning of the danger, "It shall not prosper, never expect it." Note, It is folly to promise ourselves success in that which we undertake contrary to the mind of God. "The Canaanites are before you to attack you, and the Lord is not among you to protect you and fight for you, and therefore look to yourselves, that ye be not smitten before your enemies." Those that are out of the way of their duty, are from under God's protection, and go at their peril. It is dangerous going where we cannot expect God should go along with us. Nay, he plainly foresees and foretells their defeat, Ye shall fall by the sword of the Amalekites and Canaanites, (who were to have fallen by their sword,) because ye are turned away from the Lord, from following the conduct of his precept and promise, therefore the Lord will not be with you. Note, God will certainly leave those that leave him; and those that are left of him, lie exposed to all misery.

3. They venture notwithstanding. Never was people so perverse, and so desperately resolved in every thing to walk contrary to God. God bid them go, and they would not; he forbid them, and they would. Thus is the caral mind enmity to God; (v. 44.) They presumed to go up unto the hill-top. Here, (1.) They struggled against the sentence of Divine Justice, and would press on in defiance of it. (2.) They slighted the tokens of God's presence, for they would go, though they left Moses and the ark of the covenant behind them. They had distrusted God's strength, and now they presume upon their own, without his.

4. The expedition speeds accordingly, v. 45. The enemy had posted themselves upon the top of the hill, to make good that pass against the invaders, and being informed by their scouts of their approach, sallied out upon them, and defeated them, and it is probable that many of the Israelites were killed. Now the sentence began to be executed, that their carcasses should fall in the wilderness. Note, That affair can never end well that begins with sin. The way to obtain peace with our friends, and success against our enemies, is, to make God our Friend, and keep ourselves in his love. The Jews, like these their ancestors, when they had rejected Christ's righteousness, attempted to establish their own, and it sped as this here.

CHAP. XV.

This choptv, which is mostly concerning sacrifice and offering, comes in between the story of two rebellions, (one, ch 14. the other, ch. 16.) to signify that these legal institutions were typical of the gifts which Christ was to receive even for the rebellious, Ps. 68. 18. In the foregoing chapter, upon Israel's provocation, God had determined to destroy them, and, in token of his wrath, had sentenced them to perish in the wilderness. But, upon Moses's intercession, he said, I have pardoned; and, in token of that mercy, in this chapter he repeats and explains some of the laws concerning offerings, to shew that he was reconciled to them, notwithstanding the severe dispensation they were under, and would not unchurch them. Here is, I. The law concerning the meat-offerings, and drink-offerings, (v. 1. . 12.) both for Israelites and for strangers, (v. 13. . 16.) and a law concerning the heave-offerings of the first of their dough, v. 17. . 21. II. The law concerning sacrifices for sins of ignorance, v. 22. . 29. III. The punishment of presumptuous sins, v. 30. . 31. and an instance given in the sabbath-breaker, v. 32. . 36. IV. A law concerning fringes, for memorandums, upon the borders of their garments, v. 37. . 41.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come into the land of your habitations, which I give unto you, 3. And will make an offering by fire unto the LORD, a burnt-offering, or a sacrifice in performing a vow, or in a freewill-offering, or in your solemn feasts, to make a sweet savour unto the LORD, of the herd, or of the flock: 4. Then shall he that offereth his offering unto the LORD bring a meat-offering of a tenth deal of flour mingled with the fourth part of an hin of oil. 5. And the fourth part of an hin of wine for a drink-offering shalt thou prepare with the burnt-offering or sacrifice, for one lamb. 6. Or for a ram, thou shalt prepare for a meat-offering two tenth deals of flour mingled with the third part of an hin of oil. 7. And for a drink-offering thou shalt offer the third part of an hin of wine, for a sweet savour unto the LORD. 8. And when thou preparest a bullock for a burnt-offering, or for a sacrifice in performing a vow, or peace-offerings unto the LORD: 9. Then shall he bring with a bullock a meat-offering of three tenth deals of flour mingled with half an hin of oil. 10. And thou shalt bring for a drink-offering half an hin of wine, for an offering made by fire of a sweet savour unto the LORD. 11. Thus shall it be done for one bullock, or for one ram, or for a lamb, or a kid. 12. According to the number that ye shall prepare, so shall ye do to every one according to their number. 13. All that are born of the country shall do these things after this manner, in offering an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD. 14. And if a stranger sojourn with you, or whosoever be among you in your generations, and will offer an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD; as ye do, so he shall do. 15. One ordinance shall be both for you of the congregation, and also for the stranger that sojourneth with you, an ordinance for ever in your generations: as ye are, so shall the stranger be before the LORD. 16. One law and one manner shall be for you, and for the stranger that sojourneth with you. 17. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 18. Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye come into the land whither I bring you, 19. Then it shall be, that, when ye eat of the bread of the land, ye shall offer up an heave-offering unto the LORD. 20. Ye shall offer up a cake of the first of your dough for an heave-offering: as ye do the heave-offering of the threshing-floor, so shall ye heave it. 21. Of the first of your dough ye shall give unto the LORD an heave-offering in your generations.

Here we have,

I. Full instructions given concerning the meat-offerings and drink-offerings, which were appendages to all the sacrifices of animals. The beginning of this law is very encouraging, When ye come into the land of your habitation which I give unto you, then ye shall do so and so, v. 2. This was a plain intimation, not only that God was reconciled to them, notwithstanding the sentence he had passed upon them, but that he would secure the promised land to their seed, notwithstanding their proneness to rebel against him. They might think some time or other they should be guilty of a misdemeanour, that would be fatal to them, and would exclude them for ever, as the last had done for one generation; but this intimates an assurance that they should be kept from provoking God to such a degree as would amount to a forfeiture; for this statute takes it for granted that there were some of them that should in due time come into Canaan. The meat-offerings were of two sorts; some were offered alone, and we have the law concerning those, Lev. 2.1, &c. Others were added to the burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, and constantly attended them, and about those direction is here given. It was requisite, since the sacrifices of acknowledgment (specified in v. 3.) were intended as the food of God's table, that there should be a constant provision of bread, oil, and wine, whatever the flesh-meat was. The caterers or purveyors for Solomon's temple provided fine flour, 1 Kings, 4. 22. And it was fit that God should keep a good house, that his table should be furnished with bread as well as flesh, and that his cup should run over. In my Father's house there is bread enough.

Now, the intent of this law is, to direct what proportion the meat-offering and drink-offering should bear to the several sacrifices to which they were annexed. If the sacrifice was a lamb, or a kid, then the meat-offering must be a tenth-deal of flour, that is an omer, which contained about five pints: this must be mingled with oil, the fourth part of a hin, (a hin contained about five quarts,) and the drink-offering must be the same quantity of wine, about a quart and a half pint, v. 3. . 5. If it was a ram, the meat-offering was doubled, two tenth-deals of flour, about five quarts and a third part of a hin of oil (which was to them as butter is to us) mingled with it; and the same quantity of wine for a drink-offering, v. 6, 7. If the sacrifice was a bullock, the meat-offering was to be trebled, three omers, with five pints of oil, and the same quantity of wine for a drink-offering, v. 8. . 10. And thus for each sacrifice, whether offered by a particular person, or at the common charge. Note, Our religious services should be governed, as by other rules, so by the rule of proportion.

II. Natives and strangers are here set upon a level, in this as in other matters, (v. 13. . 16.) "One law shall be for you and for the stranger that is proselyted to the Jewish religion." Now, 1. This was an invitation to the Gentiles to become proselytes, and to embrace the faith and worship of the true God. In civil things there was a difference between strangers and true-born Israelites, but not in the things of God; as ye are, so shall the stranger be before the Lord, for with him there is no respect of persons. See Isa. 56. 3. 2. This was an obligation upon the Jews to be kind to strangers, and not to oppress them, because they saw them owned and accepted of God. Communion in religion is a great engagement to mutual affection, and should slay all enmities. 3. It was a mortification to the pride of the Jews, who are apt to be puffed up with their birthright privileges; "We are Abraham's seed." God let them know that the sons of the stranger were as welcome to him as the sons of Jacob; no man's birth or parentage shall turn either to his advantage or his prejudice in his acceptance with God. This likewise intimated, that, as believing strangers should be accounted Israelites, so unbelieving Israelites should be accounted strangers. 4. It was a happy presage of the calling of the Gentiles, and of their admission into the church. If the law made so little difference between Jew and Gentile, much less would the gospel make, which broke down the partition-wall, and reconciled both to God in one sacrifice, without the observance of the legal ceremonies.

III. A law for the offering of the first of the dough unto the Lord. This, as the former, goes upon the comfortable supposition of their being come into the promised land, v. 13. Now that they lived upon manna, they needed not such an express acknowledgment of God's title to their daily bread, and their dependence upon him for it, the thing spoke for itself: but in Canaan, where they should eat the fruit of their own industry, God required that he should be owned as their Landlord, and their great Benefactor. They must not only offer him the first-fruits and tenths of the corn in their fields, (those had been already reserved,) but when they had it in their houses, in their kneading troughs, when it was almost ready to be set upon their tables, God must have a further tribute of acknowledgment, part of their dough (the Jews say, a fortieth part, at least, of the whole lump,) must be heaved or offered up to God, (v. 20, 21.) and the priest must have it for the use of his family. Thus they must own their dependence upon God for their daily bread, even when they had it in the house with them; they must then wait on God for the comfortable use of it; for we read of that which was brought home, and yet God did blow upon it, and it came to little, Hag. 1. 9. Christ has taught us to pray, not, Give us this year our yearly harvest, but, Give us this day our daily bread. God by this law said to the people, as the prophet long afterward said to the widow of Sarepta, (1 Kings, 17. 13.) Only make me thereof a little cake first. This offering was expressly kept up by the laws of Ezekiel's visionary temple, and it is a commandment with promise of family-mercies, (Ezek. 44. 30.) Ye shall give unto the priest the first of your dough, that he may cause the blessing to rest in thine house; for when God has had his dues out of our estates, we may expect the comfort of what falls to our share.

22. And if ye have erred, and not observed all these commandments, which the LORD hath spoken unto Moses, 23. Even all that the LORD hath commanded you by the hand of Moses, from the day that the LORD commanded Moses, and henceforward among your generations; 24. Then it shall be, if ought be committed by ignorance without the knowledge of the congregation, that all the congregation shall offer one young bullock for a burnt-offering, for a sweet savour unto the LORD, with his meat-offering, and his drink-offering, according to the manner, and one kid of the goats for a sin-offering. 25. And the priest shall make an atonement for all the congregation of the children of Israel, and it shall be forgiven them; for it is ignorance: and they shall bring their offering, a sacrifice made by fire unto the LORD, and their sin-offering before the LORD, for their ignorance: 26. And it shall be forgiven all the congregation of the children of Israel, and the stranger that sojourneth among them; seeing all the people were in ignorance. 27. And if any soul sin through ignorance, then he shall bring a she-goat of the first year for a sin-offering. 28. And the priest shall make an atonement for the soul that sinneth ignorantly, when he sinneth by ignorance before the LORD, to make an atonement for him; and it shall be forgiven him. 29. Ye shall have one law for him that sinneth through ignorance, both for him that is born among the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them.

We have here the laws concerning sacrifices for sins of ignorance: the Jews understand it of idolatry or false worship, through the error of their teachers; the case here supposed is, that ye have not observed all these commandments, v. 22, 23. If they have failed in the offerings of their acknowledgment, and had not brought them according to the law, then they must bring an offering of atonement, yea, though the omission had been through forgetfulness or mistake. If they failed in one part of the ceremony, they must make it up by the observance of another part, which was in the nature of a remedial law.

I. The case is put of a national sin, committed through ignorance, and become customary through a vulgar error, (v. 24.) the congregation, that is, the body of the people, for so it is explained, (v. 25.) All the congregation of the children of Israel. The ceremonial observances were so numerous, and so various, that, it might easily be supposed, some of them by degrees would be forgotten and disused, as particularly that immediately before concerning the heave-offering of their dough: now if, in process of time, upon consulting the law, there should appear to have been a general neglect of that or any other appointment, then a sacrifice must be offered for the whole congregation, and the oversight shall be forgiven, (v. 25, 26.) and not punished as it deserved, with some national judgment. The offering of the sacrifice according to the manner or ordinance, plainly refers to a former statute, which this is the repetition of; and the same bullock which is there called a sin-offering, (Lev. 4. 13, 21.) is here called a burnt-offering, (v. 24.) because it was wholly burnt, though not upon the altar, yet without the camp. And here is the addition of a kid of the goats for a sin-offering. According to this law, we find that Hezekiah made atonement for the errors of his father's reign, by seven bullocks, seven rams, seven lambs, and seven he-goats, which he offered as a sin-offering for the kingdom, and for the sanctuary, and for Judah, (2 Chron. 29. 21.) and for all Israel, v. 24. And we find the like done after the return out of captivity, Ezra, 8. 35.

2. It is likewise supposed to be the case of a particular person. If any soul sin through ignorance, (v. 27.) neglecting any part of his duty, he must bring his offering as was appointed, Lev. 4. 27, &c. Thus atonement shall be made for the soul that sins, when he sins through ignorance, v. 28.

Observe, (1.) Sins committed ignorantly need to have atonement made for them: for, though ignorance will in a degree excuse, it will not justify, those that might have known their Lord's will, and did it not. David prays to be cleansed from his secret faults, that is, those sins which he himself was not aware of, the errors he did not understand, Ps. 19. 12. (2.) Sins committed ignorantly shall be forgiven through Christ the great Sacrifice, who, when he offered up himself once for all upon the cross, seemed to explain the intention of his offering in that prayer, Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do. And Paul seems to allude to this law concerning sins of ignorance, (1 Tim. 1. 13.) I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly and in unbelief. And it looked favourably upon the Gentiles, that this law of atoning for sins of ignorance is expressly made to extend to those who were strangers to the commonwealth of Israel, (v. 29.) but supposed to be proselytes of righteousness. Thus the blessing of Abraham comes upon the Gentiles.

30. But the soul that doeth ought presumptuously, whether he be born in the land or a stranger, the same reproacheth the LORD; and that soul shall be cut off from among his people. 31. Because he hath despised the word of the LORD, and hath broken his commandment, that soul shall utterly be cut off; his iniquity shall be upon him. 32. And while the children of Israel were in the wilderness, they found a man that gathered sticks upon the sabbath day. 33. And they that found him gathering sticks brought him unto Moses and Aaron, and unto all the congregation. 34. And they put him in ward, because it was not declared what should be done to him. 35. And the LORD said unto Moses, The man shall be surely put to death: all the congregation shall stone him with stones without the camp. 36. And all the congregation brought him without the camp, and stoned him with stones, and he died; as the LORD commanded Moses.

Here is,

I. The general doom passed upon presumptuous sinners, 1. Those are to be reckoned presumptuous sinners that sin with a high hand, as the original phrase is, (v. 30.) that is, that avowedly confront God's authority, and set up their own lust in competition with it; that sin for sinning-sake, in contradiction to the precept of the law, and in defiance of the penalty; that fight against God, and dare him to do his worst; see Job, 15. 25. It is not only to sin against knowledge, but to sin designedly against God's will and glory. 2. Sins thus committed are exceeding sinful. He that thus breaks the commandment, (1.) Reproaches the Lord; (v. 30.) he says the worst he can of him, and most unjustly. The language of presumptuous sin, is, "Eternal truth is not fit to be believed, the Lord of all not fit to be obeyed, and almighty power not fit to be either feared or trusted." It imputes folly to Infinite Wisdom, and iniquity to the righteous Judge of heaven and earth; such is the malignity of wilful sin. (2.) He despises the word of the Lord, v. 31. There are those who, in many instances, come short of fulfilling the word, and yet have a great value for it, and count the law honourable; but presumptuous sinners despise it, thinking themselves too great, too good, and too wise, to be ruled by it. What is the Almighty that we should serve him? Whatever the sin itself is, it is contumacy that incurs the anathema. It is rebellion added to the sin, that is as witchcraft, and stubbornness as idolatry. 3. The sentence passed on such is dreadful. There remains no sacrifice for those sins, the law provided none, that soul shall be cut off from among his people, (v. 30.) utterly cut off; (v. 31.) and, that God may be for ever justified, and the sinner for ever confounded, his iniquity shall be upon him, and there needs no more to sink him to the lowest hell. Thus the Jewish doctors understand it, that the iniquity shall cleave to the soul, after it is cut off, and that man shall give an account of his sin at the great day of judgment. Perhaps the kind of offence might be such as did not expose the offender to the censure of the civil magistrate, but if it was done presumptuously, God himself would take the punishment of it into his own hands, and into them it is a fearful thing to fall. In the New Testament we find the like sentence of exclusion from all benefit by the great Sacrifice, passed upon the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost, and a total apostacy from Christianity. See Matth. 12. 32. and Heb. 10. 26. which refers to this here.

II. A particular instance of presumption in the sin of sabbath-breaking. 1. The offence was gathering sticks on the sabbath day, (v. 32.) which, it is probable, were designed to make a fire of, whereas they were commanded to bake and see what they had occasion for, the day before, Exod. 16. 23. This seemed but a small offence, but it was a violation of the law of the sabbath, and so was an implicit contempt of the Creator, to whose honour the sabbath was dedicated, and an incursion upon the whole law, which the sabbath was intended as a hedge about. And it appears by the context to have been done presumptuously, and in affront both to the law, and to the Law-Maker. 2. The offender was scened, v. 33, 34. They that found him gathering sticks, in their zeal for the honour of the sabbath, brought him to Moses and Aaron, and to all the congregation; which intimates, that, being the sabbath-day, the congregation was at that time gathered to Moses and Aaron, to receive instruction from them, and to join with them in religious worship. It seems even common Israelites, though there was much amiss among them, yet would not contentedly see the sabbath profaned, which was a good sign that they had not quite forsaken God, nor were utterly forsaken of him. 3. God was consulted, because it was not declared what should be done to him. The law had already made the profanation of the sabbath a capital crime, (Exod. 31. .14. ch. 35. 2.) but they were in doubt, either concerning the offence, whether this that he had done should be deemed a profanation or no; or concerning the punishment, what death he should die. God was the Judge, and before him they brought this cause. 4. Sentence was passed; the prisoner was adjudged a sabbath-breaker according to the intent of that law, and as such he must be put to death; and, to shew how great the crime was, and how displeasing to God, and that others might hear and fear, and not do in like manner presumptuously, that death is appointed him which was looked upon as most terrible, he must be stoned with stones, v. 35. Note, God is jealous for the honour of his sabbaths, and will not hold them guiltless, whatever men do, that profane them. 5. Execution was done pursuant to the sentence, v. 36. He was stoned to death by the congregation. As many as could were employed in the execution, that they, at least, might be afraid of breaking the sabbath, who had thrown a stone at this sabbath-breaker. This intimates that the open profanation of the sabbath is a sin which ought to be punished and restrained by the civil magistrate, who, as far as overt-acts go, is keeper of both tables. See Neh. 13. 17. One would think there could be no great harm in gathering a few sticks, on what day soever it was, but God intended the exemplary punishment of him that did so, for a standing warning to us all, to make conscience of keeping holy the sabbath.

37. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 38. Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments throughout their generations, and that they put upon the fringe of the borders a riband of blue: 39. And it shall be unto you for a fringe, that ye may look upon it, and remember all the commandments of the LORD, and do them; and that ye seek not after your own heart and your own eyes, after which ye use to go a whoring: 40. That ye may remember, and do all my commandments, and be holy unto your God. 41. I am the LORD your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: I am the LORD your God.

Provision had been just now made by the law for the pardon of sins of ignorance and infirmity; now here is an expedient provided for the preventing of such sins. They are ordered to make fringes upon the borders of their garments, which were to be memorandums to them of their duty, that they might not sin through forgetfulness.

1. The sign appointed is a fringe of silk, or thread, or worsted, or the garment itself ravelled at the bottom, and a blue riband bound on the top of it to keep it tight, v. 38. The Jews being a peculiar people, they were thus distinguished from their neighbours in their dress, as well as in their diet, and taught, by such little instances of singularity, not to be conformed to the way of the heathen in greater things. Thus likewise they proclaimed themselves Jews wherever they were, as those that were not ashamed of God and his law. Our Saviour, being made under the law, wore these fringes; hence we read of the hem or border of his garment, Matth. 9. 20. These borders the Pharisees enlarged, that they might be thought more holy and devout than other people. Yet the phylacteries were different things, those were their own invention, the fringes were a divine institution. The Jews at this day wear them, saying, when they put them on, Blessed be he who has sanctified us unto himself, and commanded us to wear fringes. 2. The intention of it was, to remind them that they were a peculiar people. They were not appointed for the trimming and adorning of their clothes, but to stir up their pure minds by way of remembrance; (2 Pet. 3. 1.) that they might look upon the fringe, and remember the commandments. Many look upon their ornaments, to feed their pride, but they must look upon these ornaments to awaken their consciences to a sense of their duty, that their religion might constantly beset them, and they might carry it about with them, as they did their clothes, wherever they went. If they were tempted to sin, the fringe would be a monitor to them, not to break God's commandments; if a duty was forgotten to be done in its season, the fringe would remind them of it. This institution, though it is not an imposition upon us, is an instruction to us always to remember the commandments of the Lord our God, that we may do them, to treasure them up in our memories; and to apply them to particular cases, as there is occasion to use them. It was intended particularly to be a preservation from idolatry, that ye seek not after your own heart, and your own eyes, in your religious worship. Yet it may extend also to the whole conversation, for nothing is more contrary to God's honour, and our own true interest, than to walk in the way of our heart, and in the sight of our eyes; for the imagination of the heart is evil, and so is the lust of the eyes.

After the repetition of some ceremonial appointments, the chapter closes with that great and fundamental law of religion, Be holy unto your God; purged from sin, and sincerely devoted to his service; and that great reason for all the commandments is again and again inculcated, I am the Lord your God. Did we more firmly believe, and more frequently and seriously consider, that God is our Lord, and our God, and Redeemer, we should see ourselves bound in duty, interest, and gratitude, to keep all his commandments.

CHAP. XVI.

The date of the history contained in this chapter is altogether uncertain. Probably, these mutinies happened after their removal back again from Kadeshbarnea, when they were fixed (if I may so speak) for their wandering in the wilderness, and began to look upon that as their settlement. Presently after new laws given, follows the story of a new rebellion, as if sin took occasion from the commandment to become more exceeding sinful. Here is, I. A daring and dangerous rebellion raised against Moses and Aaron, by Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, v. 1. .15. 1. Korah and his accomplices contend for the priesthood against Aaron, v. 3. Moses reasons with them, and appeals to God for a decision of the controversy, v. 4. .11. 2. Dathan and Abiram quarrel with Moses, and refuse to obey his summons, which greatly grieves him, v. 12. .15. II. A solemn appearance of the pretenders to the priesthood before God, according to order, and a public appearance of the glory of the Lord, which would have consumed the whole congregation, if Moses and Aaron had not interceded, v. 16. .22. III. The deciding of the controversy, and the crushing of rebellion, by the cutting off of the rebels. 1. Those in their tents were buried alive, v. 23. .31. 2. Those at the door of the tabernacle were consumed by fire, (v. 35.) and their censers preserved for a memorial, v. 37. .40. IV. A new insurrection of the people, v. 41. .43. 1. God stayed the insurrection by a plague, v. 45. 2. Aaron stayed the plague by offering incense, v. 46. .50. The manner and method of recording this story, plainly denotes the ferment to have been very great.

1. NOW Korah, the son of Izhar, the son of Kohath, the son of Levi, and Dathan and Abiram, the sons of Eliab, and On the son of Peleth, sons of Reuben, took men: 2. And they rose up before Moses, with certain of the children of Israel, two hundred and fifty princes of the assembly, famous in the congregation, men of renown: 3. And they gathered themselves together against Moses and against Aaron, and said unto them, Ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congregation are holy, every one of them, and the LORD is among them: wherefore then lift ye up yourselves above the congregation of the LORD? 4. And when Moses heard it, he fell upon his face: 5. And he spake unto Korah and unto all his company, saying, Even to-morrow the LORD will shew who are his, and who is holy; and will cause him to come near unto him: even him whom he hath chosen will he cause to come near unto him. 6. This do: Take you censers, Korah, and all his company; 7. And put fire therein, and put incense in them before the LORD to-morrow: and it shall be that the man whom the LORD doth choose, he shall be holy: ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi. 8. And Moses said unto Korah, Hear, I pray you, ye sons of Levi: 9. Seemeth it but a small thing unto you, that the God of Israel hath separated you from the congregation of Israel, to bring you near to himself to do the service of the tabernacle of the LORD, and to stand before the congregation to minister unto them? 10. And he hath brought thee near to him, and all thy brethren the sons of Levi with thee: and seek ye the priesthood also? 11. For which cause both thou and all thy company are gathered together against the LORD: and what is Aaron, that ye murmur against him?

Here is,

1. An account of the rebels, who and what they were, not, as formerly, the mixed multitude, and the dregs of the people, who are therefore never named, but men of distinction and quality, that made a figure. Korah was the ring-leader, he formed and headed the faction, therefore it is called the gainsaying of Korah, Jude, 11. He was cousin-german to Moses, they were brothers' children, yet the nearness of the relation could not restrain him from being insolent and rude to Moses. Think it not strange if a man's foes be they of his own house. With him joined Dathan and Abiram, chief men of the tribe of Reuben, the eldest son of Jacob. Probably, Korah was disgusted both at the preferment of Aaron to the priesthood, and the constituting of Elizaphan to the head of the Kohathites; (ch. 3. 30.) and perhaps the Reubenites were angry that the tribe of Judah had the first post of honour in the camp. On is mentioned, (v. 1.) as one of the heads of the faction, but never after, in the whole story; either because, as some think, he repented and left them, or because he did not make himself so remarkable as Dathan and Abiram did. The Kohathites encamped on the same side of the tabernacle that the Reubenites did, which perhaps gave Korah an opportunity of drawing them in: whence the Jews say, Woe to the wicked man, and woe to his neighbour, who is in danger of being infected by him. And these being themselves men of renown, they seduced into the conspiracy two hundred and fifty princes of the assembly; (v. 2.) probably they were first-born, or at least heads of families, who, before the elevation of Aaron, had themselves ministered in holy things. Note, the pride, ambition, and emulation, of great men, have always been the occasion of a great deal of mischief both in churches and states. God by his grace make great men humble, and so give peace in our time, O Lord! Famous men, and men of renown, as these here are described to be, were the great sinners of the old world, Gen. 6. 4. The fame and renown which they had did not content them, they were high, but would be higher, and thus the famous men became infamous.

II. The rebels' remonstrance, v. 3. That which they quarrel with, is, the settlement of the priesthood upon Aaron and his family, which they think an honour too great for Moses to give, and Aaron to accept, and so they are both charged with usurpation. Ye take too much upon you; or, Let it suffice you to be upon a level with your neighbours, who are all holy, all as good as you, and therefore ought to be as great." Or, "Let it suffice you to have domineered thus long, and now think of resigning your places to those who have as good a title to them, and are as well able to manage them." 1. They proudly boast of the holiness of the congregation, and the presence of God in it. "They are holy, every one of them, and as fit to be employed in offering sacrifice as Aaron is, and as masters of families formerly were, and the Lord is among them, to direct and own them." Small reason they had to boast of the people's purity, or of God's favour, as the people had been so frequently and so lately polluted with sin, and were now under the marks of God's displeasure, which should have made them thankful for priests to mediate between them and God; but, instead of that, they envy them. 2. They unjustly charge Moses and Aaron with taking the honour they had to themselves, whereas it was evident, beyond contradiction, that they were called of God to it, Heb. 5. 4. So that they would either have no priests at all, nor any government, none to preside either in civil or sacred things, none over the congregation, none above it; or, they would not acquiesce in that constitution of the government which God had appointed. See here, (1.) What spirit levellers are of, and those that despise dominions, and resist the powers that God has set over them; they are proud, envious, ambitions, turbulent, wicked, and unreasonable, men. (2.) What usage even the best and most useful men may expect, even from those they have been serviceable to. If they be represented as usurpers that have the best titles, and they as tyrants that govern best, let them recollect that Moses and Aaron were thus abused.

III. Moses's conduct when this remonstrance was published against him. How did he take it? 1. He fell on his face, (v. 4.) as before, ch. 14. 5. Thus he shewed how willing he would have been to yield to them, and how gladly he would have resigned his government, if it would have consisted with his duty to God, and his fidelity to the trust reposed in him. Thus also he applied himself to God by prayer, for direction what to say and to do upon this sad occasion. He would not speak to them till he had thus humbled and composed his own spirit, (which could not but begin to be heated,) and had received instruction from God. The heart of the wise, in such a case, studies to answer, and asks counsel at God's mouth. 2. He agrees to refer the case to God, and leave it to him to decide it, as one well-assured of the goodness of his title, and yet well-content to resign, if God thought fit to gratify this discontented people with another nomination. An honest cause fears not a trial, fears not a second trial, fears not a speedy trial; even to-morrow let it be brought on, v. 5. . 7. Let Korah and his partisans bring their censers, and offer incense before the Lord, and if he testify his acceptance of them, well and good; Moses is now as willing that all the Lord's people should be priests, if God so pleased, as before that they should all be prophets, ch. 11. 29. But if God, upon an appeal to him, determine (as no doubt he will) for Aaron, they would find it highly dangerous to make the experiment: and therefore he puts it off till to-morrow, to try whether, when they had slept upon it, they would desist, and let fall their pretensions. 3. He argues the case fairly with them, to still the mutiny with fair reasoning, if possible, before the appeal came to God's tribunal, for then he knew it would end in the confusion of the complainants.

(1.) He calls them the sons of Levi, v. 7. and again, v. 8. They were of his own tribe, nay, they were of God's tribe; it was therefore the worse in them thus to mutiny, both against God, and against him. It was not long since the sons of Levi had appeared on God's side, in the matter of the golden calf, and got immortal honour by it; and shall they, that were then the only innocents, now be the leading criminals, and lose all the honour they had won? Could there be such chaff on God's floor? Levites, and yet rebels? (2.) He retorts their charge upon themselves; they had unjustly charged Moses and Aaron with taking too much upon them, though they had done no more than what God put upon them; nay, says Moses, Ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi. Note, They that take upon them to controul and contradict God's appointment, take too much upon them. It is enough for us to submit, it is too much to prescribe. (3.) He shews them the privilege they had as Levites, which was sufficient for them, they needed not to aspire to the honour of the priesthood, v. 9, 10. He reminds them how great the honour was to which they were preferred as Levites. [1.] They were separated from the congregation of Israel, distinguished from them, dignified above them; instead of complaining that Aaron's family was advanced above their's, they ought to have been thankful that their tribe was advanced above the rest of the tribes, though they had been in all respects upon the level with them. Note, It will help to keep us from envying those that are above us, duly to consider how many there are below us. Instead of fretting that any are preferred before us in honour, power, estate, or interest, in gifts, graces, or usefulness, we have reason to bless God, if we, who are less than the least, are not put among the very last. Many, perhaps, who deserve better, are not preferred so well. [2.] They were separated to very great and valuable honours; First, To draw near to God, nearer than the common Israelites, though they also were a people near unto him; the nearer any are to God, the greater is their honour. Secondly, To do the service of the tabernacle. It is honour enough to bear the vessels of the sanctuary, and to be employed in any part of the service of the tabernacle. God's service is not only perfect freedom, but high preferment. Thirdly, To stand before the congregation to minister unto them. Note, Those are truly great that serve the public, and it is the honour of God's ministers to be the church's ministers; nay, which adds to the dignity put upon them, [3.] It was the God of Israel himself that separated them. It was his act and deed to put them into their place, and therefore they ought not to have been discontented; and he it was likewise that put Aaron into his place, and therefore they ought not to have envied him. (4.) He convicts them of the sin of undervaluing these privileges, Seemeth it a small thing unto you? As if he had said, "It ill becomes you of all men to grudge Aaron the priesthood, when, at the same time that he was advanced to that honour, you were designed for another honour dependent upon it, and shine with rays borrowed from him." Note, [1.] The privilege of drawing near to the God of Israel is not a small thing in itself, and therefore must not appear small to us. To those who neglect opportunities of drawing near to God, who are careless and formal in it, to whom it is a task and not a pleasure, we may properly put this question; "Seemeth it a small thing to you, that God has made you a people near unto him?" [2.] Those who aspire after and usurp the things forbidden them, put a great contempt upon the honours allowed them. We have each of us as a good share of reputation as God sees fit for us, and sees us fit for, and much better than we deserve; and we ought to rest satisfied with it, and not, as these here, exercise ourselves in things too high for us; Seek ye the priesthood also? They would not own that they sought it, but Moses saw that they had this in their eye; the law had provided very well for those that served at the altar, and therefore they would put in for the office. (5.) He interprets their mutiny to be a rebellion against God; (v. 11.) while they pretended to assert the holiness and liberty of the Israel of God, they really look up arms against the God of Israel, Ye are gathered together against the Lord. Note, Those that strive against God's ordinances and providences, whatever they pretend, and whether they are aware of it or no, do indeed strive with their Maker. These resist the prince, who resist those that are commissioned by him: for, alas! says Moses, What is Aaron, that ye murmur against him? If murmurers and complainers would consider that the instruments they quarrel with are but instruments whom God employs, and that they are but what he makes them, and neither more nor less, better nor worse, they would not be so bold and free in their censures and reproaches as they are. They that found the priesthood, as it was settled, a blessing, must give all the praise to God; but if any found it a burthen, they must not therefore quarrel with Aaron, who is but what he is made, and does but as he is bidden. Thus he interested God in the cause, and so might be sure of speeding well in his appeal.

12. And Moses sent to call Dathan and Abiram, the sons of Eliab: which said, We will not come up: 13. Is it a small thing that thou hast brought us up out of a land that floweth with milk and honey, to kill us in the wilderness, except thou make thyself altogether a prince over us? 14. Moreover, thou hast not brought us into a land that floweth with milk and honey, or given us inheritance of fields and vineyards: wilt thou put out the eyes of these men? We will not come up. 15. And Moses was very wroth, and said unto the Lord, Respect not thou their offering: I have not taken one ass from them, neither have I hurt one of them. 16. And Moses said unto Korah, Be thou and all thy company before the Lord, thou, and they, and Aaron, to-morrow: 17. And take every man his censer, and put incense in them, and bring ye before the Lord every man his censer, two hundred and fifty censers: thou also, and Aaron, each of you his censer. 18. And they took every man his censer, and put fire in them, and laid incense thereon, and stood in the door of the tabernacle of the congregation with Moses and Aaron. 19. And Korah gathered all the congregation against them unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: and the glory of the Lord appeared unto all the congregation. 20. And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, 21. Separate yourselves from among this congregation, that I may consume them in a moment. 22. And they fell upon their faces, and said, O God, the God of the spirits of all flesh, shall one man sin, and wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation?

Here is,

I. The insolence of Dathan and Abiram, and their treasonable remonstrance. Moses had heard what Korah had to say, and had answered it; now he summons Dathan and Abiram to bring in their complaints, (v. 12.) but they would not obey his summons; either because they could not for shame say that to his face which they were resolved to say, and then it is an instance of some remains of modesty in them; or rather, because they would not so far own his authority, and then it is an instance of the highest degree of impudence. They spoke the language of Pharaoh himself, who set Moses at defiance, but they forgot how dear he paid for it. Had not their heads been wretchedly heated, and their hearts hardened, they might have considered, that, if they regarded not these messengers, Moses could soon in God's name send messengers of death for them. But thus the God of this world blinds the minds of them that believe not. But by the same messengers they send their articles of impeachment against Moses; and the charge runs very high. 1. They charge him with having done them a great deal of wrong in bringing them out of Egypt, invidiously calling that a land flowing with milk and honey, v. 13. Onions, and garlick, and fish, they had indeed plenty of in Egypt, but it never pretended to milk and honey; only they would thus banter the promise of Canaan. Ungrateful wretches, to represent that as an injury to them, which was really the greatest favour that ever was bestowed upon any people! 2. They charge him with a design upon their lives, that he intended to kill them in the wilderness, though they were so well-provided for. And if they were sentenced to die in the wilderness, they must thank themselves. Moses would have healed them, and they would not be healed. 3. They charge him with a design upon their liberties, that he meant to enslave them, by making himself a prince over them. A prince over them! Was he not a tender father to them; nay, their devoted servant for the Lord's sake? Had they not their properties secured, their order preserved, and justice impartially administered? Did they not live in ease and honour? And yet they complain as if Moses's yoke were heavier than Pharaoh's. And did Moses make himself a prince? Far from it. How gladly would he have declined the office at first! How gladly would he have resigned it many a time since! And yet he is thus put under the blackest characters of a tyrant, and a usurper. 4. They charge him with cheating them, (v. 14.) Thou hast not brought us, as thou promisedst us, into a land that floweth with milk and honey; and pray, whose fault was that? He had brought them to the borders of it, and was just ready, under God, to put them in possession of it; but they thrust it away from them, and shut the door against themselves; so that it was purely their own fault that they were not now in Canaan, and yet Moses must bear the blame. Thus when the foolishness of man perverteth his way, his heart fretteth against the Lord, Prov. 19. 3. 5. They charge him in the general with unfair dealing, that put out the eyes of these men, and then meant to lead them blindfold as he pleased. The design of all he did for them, was, to open their eyes, and yet they insinuate that he intended to put out their eyes, that they might not see themselves imposed upon. Note, The wisest and best cannot please every body, nor gain the good word of all. Those often fall under the heaviest censures, who have merited the highest applause. Many a good work Moses had shewed them from the Father, and for which of these do they reproach him?

II. Moses's just resentment of their insolence, v. 15. Moses, though the meekest man, yet, finding God reproached in him, was very wroth; he could not bear to see the people ruining themselves, for whose salvation he had done so much. In this discomposure, 1. He appeals to God concerning his own integrity; whereas they basely reflected upon him as ambitious, covetous, and oppressive, in making himself a prince over them. God was his Witness, (1.) That he never got any thing by them; I have not taken one ass from them, not only, not by way of bribery and extortion, but not by way of recompence or gratuity for all the good offices he had done them; he never took the pay of a general, or salary of a judge, much less the tribute of a prince. He got more in his estate when he kept Jethro's flock, than when he came to be king in Jeshurun. (2.) That they never lost any thing by him, neither have I hurt any one of them, no not the least, no not the worst, no not those that have been most peevish and provoking to him; he never abused his power to the support of wrong. Note, Those that have never blemished themselves need not fear being slurred by others: when men condemn us, we may be easy if our own hearts condemn us not. 2. He begs of God to plead his cause, and clear him, by shewing his displeasure at the incense which Korah and his company were to offer, with whom Dathan and Abiram were in confederacy. Lord, says he, Respect not thou their offering. Wherein he seems to refer to the history of Cain, lately written by his own hand, of whom it is said, that to him and his offering God had not respect, Gen. 4. 5. These that followed the gainsaying of Korah, walked in the way of Cain, (these are put together, Jude, 11.) and therefore he prays that they might be frowned upon as Cain was, and put to the same confusion.

III. Issue joined between Moses and his accusers. 1. Moses challenges them to appear with Aaron next morning, at the time of offering up the morning incense, and refer themselves to God's judgment, v. 16, 17. Since he could not convince them by his calm and affectionate reasoning, he is ready to enter into bonds to stand God's award, not doubting but that God would appear to decide the controversy. This reference he had agreed to before, (v. 6, 7.) and here adds only one clause, which speaks his great condescension to the plaintiffs, that Aaron, against whose advancement they excepted, though now advanced by the divine institution to the honour of burning incense within the tabernacle, yet, upon this trial, should put himself into the place of a probationer, and stand upon the level with Korah, at the door of the tabernacle; nay, and Moses would himself stand with them, so that the complainant shall have all the fair dealing he can desire; and thus every mouth shall be stopped. 2. Korah accepts the challenge, and makes his appearance with Moses and Aaron at the door of the tabernacle, to make good his pretensions, v. 18, 19. If he had not had a very great stock of impudence, he could not have carried on the matter thus far. Had not he lately seen Nadab and Abihu, the consecrated priests, struck dead for daring to offer incense with unhallowed fire; and could he and his accomplices expect to fare any better in offering incense with unhallowed hands? Yet, to confront Moses and Aaron, in the height of his pride, he thus bids defiance to Heaven, and pretends to demand the divine acceptance without a divine warrant; thus wretchedly is the heart hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. They took every man his censor. Perhaps these were some of the censers which these heads of families had made use of at their family-altars, before this part of religious service was confined to the priesthood, and the altar in the tabernacle; (and they would bring them into use and reputation again;) or they might be common chafing-dishes, which were for their ordinary use. Now, to attend the solemn trial, and to be witness of the issue, one would have thought Moses should have gathered the congregation against the rebels, but it seems Korah gathered them against Moses, (v. 19.) which intimates that a great part of the congregation sided with Korah, were at his beck, and wished him success; and that Korah's hopes were very high of carrying the point against Aaron; for, had he suspected the event, he would not have coveted to make the trial thus public: but little did he think that he was now calling the congregation together to be the witnesses of his own confusion! Note, Proud and ambitious men, while they are projecting their own advancement, often prove to have been hurrying on their own shameful fall.

IV. The judgment set, and the Judge taking the tribunal, and threatening to give sentence against the whole congregation. 1. The glory of the Lord appeared, v. 19. The same glory that appeared to install Aaron in his office at first, (Lev. 9. 23.) now appeared to confirm him in it, and to confound those that oppose him, and set up themselves in competition with him. The Shechinah, or Divine Majesty, the glory of the Eternal Word, which ordinarily dwelt between the cherubims within the veil, now was publicly seen over the door of the tabernacle, to the terror of the whole congregation; for though they saw no manner of similitude, yet, probably, the appearances of the light and fire were such as plainly shewed God to be angry with them; as when he appeared, ch. 14. 10. Nothing is more terrible to those who are conscious of guilt, than the appearances of divine glory; for such a glorious Being must needs be a formidable Enemy. 2. God threatened to consume them all in a moment, and, in order to that, bade Moses and Aaron stand from among them, v. 21. God thus shewed what their sin deserved, and how very provoking it was to him. See what a dangerous thing it is to have fellowship with sinners, and in the least to partake with them. Many of the congregation, it is likely, came only for company, following the crowd, or for curiosity to see the issue, yet not coming, as they ought to have done, to bear their testimony against the rebels, and openly to declare for God and Moses, they had like to have been all consumed in a moment. If we follow the herd into which the Devil is entered, it is at our peril.

V. The humble intercession of Moses and Aaron for the congregation, v. 22. 1. Their posture was importuning; they fell on their faces, prostrating themselves before God, as supplicants in good earnest, that they might prevail for sparing mercy. Though the people had treacherously deserted them, and struck in with those that were in arms against them, yet they approved themselves faithful to the trusts reposed in them, as shepherds of Israel, which were to stand in the breach when they saw the flock in danger. Note, If others fail in their duty to us, that does not discharge us from our duty to them, nor take off the obligations we lie under to seek their welfare. 2. Their prayer was a pleading prayer, and it proved a prevailing one. Now God had destroyed them, if Moses had not turned away his wrath; (Ps. 106. 23.) yet far be it from us to imagine that Moses was more considerate or more compassionate than God, in such a case as this; but God saw fit to shew his just displeasure against the sin of sinners, by the sentence, and at the same time to shew his gracious condescension to the prayers of saints, by the revocation of the sentence at the intercession of Moses. Observe in the prayer, (1.) The title they give to God, The God of the spirits of all flesh. See what man is; he is a spirit in flesh, a soul embodied; a creature wonderfully compounded of heaven and earth. See what God is; He is the God of the spirits of all mankind. He forms the spirits, Zech. 12. 1. He fathers it, Heb. 12. 9. He has an ability to fashion it, (Ps. 33. 15.) and authority to dispose of it, for he has said, All souls are mine, Ezek. 18. 4. They insinuate hereby, that though, as the God of the spirits of all flesh, he might in sovereignty consume this congregation in a moment, yet it was to be hoped that he would in mercy spare them, not only because they were the work of his own hands, and he had a propriety in them, but because, being the God of spirits, he knew their frame, and could distinguish between the leaders and the led; between those who sinned maliciously, and those who were drawn in by their wiles, and would make a difference accordingly in his judgments. (2.) The argument they insist on; it is much the same with that which Abraham urged in his intercession for Sodom, (Gen. 18. 23.) Wilt thou destroy the righteous with the wicked? Such is the plea here, Shall one man sin, and wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation? Not but that it was the sin of them all to join in this matter, but the great transgression was his that first hatched the treason. Note, Whatever God may do in sovereignty and strict justice, we have reason to hope that he will not destroy a congregation for the sin of one, but that righteousness and peace having kissed each other in the undertaking of the Redeemer, mercy shall rejoice against judgment. Moses knew that all the congregation must perish in the wilderness by degrees, yet he is thus earnest in prayer, that they might not be consumed at once, and would reckon it a favour to obtain a reprieve. Lord, let it alone this year.

23. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 24. Speak unto the congregation, saying, Get you up from about the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. 25. And Moses rose up, and went unto Dathan and Abiram; and the elders of Israel followed him. 26. And he spake unto the congregation, saying, Depart, I pray you, from the tents of these wicked men, and touch nothing of their's, lest ye be consumed in all their sins. 27. So they gat up from the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, on every side: and Dathan and Abiram came out, and stood in the door of their tents, and their wives, and their sons, and their little children. 28. And Moses said, Hereby ye shall know that the LORD hath sent me to do all these works; for I have not done them of mine own mind. 29. If these men die the common death of all men, or if they be visited after the visitation of all men; then the LORD hath not sent me. 30. But if the LORD make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up, with all that appertain unto them, and they go down quick into the pit; then ye shall understand that these men have provoked the LORD. 31. And it came to pass, as he had made an end of speaking all these words, that the ground clave asunder that was under them: 32. And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their houses, and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods. 33. They, and all that appertained to them, went down alive into the pit, and the earth closed upon them: and they perished from among the congregation. 34. And all Israel that were round about them fled at the cry of them: for they said, Lest the earth swallow us up also.

We have here the determining of the controversy with Dathan and Abiram, who rebelled against Moses; as, in the next paragraph, the determining of the controversy with Korah and his company, who would be rivals with Aaron. It should seem that Dathan and Abiram had set up a spacious tabernacle in the midst of the tents of their families, where they kept court, met in council, and hung out their flag of defiance against Moses: it is here called the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, v. 24, 27. There, as in the place of rendezvous, Dathan and Abiram staid, when Korah and his friends went up to the tabernacle of the Lord, waiting the issue of their trial; but here we are told how they had their business done before that trial was over, for God will take what method he pleases in his judgments.

I. Public warning is given to the congregation to withdraw immediately from the tents of the rebels. 1. God bids Moses speak to this purport, v. 24. This was in answer to Moses's prayer; he had begged that God would not destroy the whole congregation; "Well," says God, "I will not, provided they be so wise as to shift for their own safety, and get out of the way of danger. If they will quit the rebels, well and good, they shall not perish with them; otherwise, let them take what follows." Note, We cannot expect to reap benefit by the prayers of our friends for our salvation, unless we ourselves be diligent and faithful in making use of the means of salvation; for God never promised to save by miracles those that would not save themselves by means. Moses, that had prayed for them, must preach this to them, and warn them to flee from this wrath to come. 2. Moses accordingly repairs to the head-quarters of the rebels, leaving Aaron at the door of the tabernacle, v. 25. Dathan and Abiram had contumaciously refused to come up to him, (v. 12.) yet he humbly condescends to go down to them, to try if he could yet convince and reclaim them. Ministers must thus with meekness instruct those that oppose themselves; and not think it below them to stoop to those that are most stubborn, for their good. Christ himself stretches out his hand to a rebellious and gainsaying people. The seventy elders of Israel attend Moses as his guard, to secure him from the insolence of the rabble, and, by their presence, to put an honour upon him, and, if possible, to strike an awe upon the rebels. It is our duty to contribute all we can to the countenance and support of injured innocency and honour. 3. Proclamation is made that all manner of persons, as they tendered their own safety, should forthwith depart from the tents of these wicked men, (v. 26.) and thus should signify that they deserted their cause and interest, detested their crimes and counsels, and dreaded the punishment coming upon them. Note, Those that would not perish with sinners must come out from among them, and be separate. In vain do we pray, Gather not our souls with sinners, if we save not ourselves from the un-toward generation. Gods people are called out of Babylon, lest they share both in her sins and in her plagues, Rev. 18.4.

II. The congregation takes the warning, but the rebels themselves continue obstinate, v.27. 1. God, in mercy, inclined the people to forsake the rebels. They gat up from the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram: both those whose lot it was to pitch near them, who doubtless with themselves removed their families and all their effects, and those also who were come from all parts of their camp to see the issue. It was in answer to the prayer of Moses that God thus stirred up the hearts of the congregation to shift for their own preservation. Note, To those whom God will save he gives repentance, that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the Devil. Grace to separate from evil-doers, is one of the things that accompany salvation. 2. God, in justice, left the rebels to the obstinacy and hardness of their own hearts, whough they saw themselves abandoned by all their neighbours, and set up as a mark to the arrows of God's justice, yet, instead of falling down and humbling themselves before God and Moses, owning their crime, and begging pardon, instead of fleeing, and dispersing themselves, to seek for shelter in the crowd, they impudently stood in the doors of their tents, as if they would out-face God himself, and dare him to do his worst. Thus were their hearts hardened to their own destruction, and they were fearless when their case was most fearful. But what a pity was it that their little children, who were not capable of guilt or fear, should, by the presumption of their parents, be put in this audacious posture! Happy they who are taught betimes to bow before God, and not, as those unhappy little ones, to stand out against him!

III. Sentence is solemnly pronounced upon them by Moses, in the name of the Lord, and the decision of the controversy is put upon the execution of that sentence by the almighty power of God. Moses, by divine instinct and direction, when the eyes of all Israel were fastened upon him, waiting the event, moved with a just and holy indignation at the impudence of the rebels, boldly puts the whole matter to a surprising issue, v.28. .30. 1. If the rebels die a common death, he will be content to be called and counted an impostor; not only if they die a natural death, but if they die by any sort of judgment that has formerly been executed on other malefactors; if they die by the plague, or by fire from heaven, or by the sword, then say, "God has disowned Moses;" but, 2. "If the earth open and swallow them up," (a punishment without precedent,) "then let all the house of Israel know assuredly that I am God's servant, sent by him, and employed for him, and that those that fight against me fight against him." The judgment itself would have been proof enough of God's displeasure against the rebels, and would have given all men to understand that they had provoked the Lord; but, when it was thus solemnly foretold, and appealed to by Moses beforehand, when there was not the least previous indication of it from without, the convincing evidence of it was much the stronger, and it was put beyond dispute that he was not only a servant but a favourite of Heaven, who was so intimately acquainted with the divinations, and could obtain such extraordinary appearances of the divine power in his vindication.

IV. Execution is immediately done. It appeared that God and his servant Moses understood one another very well; for, as soon as ever Moses had spoken the word, God did the work, the earth clave asunder, (v.31.) opened her mouth, and swallowed them all up, them and their's, (v.32.) and then closed upon them, v.33. This judgment was, 1. Unparalleled. God, in it, created a new thing, did what he never did before; for he has many arrows in his quiver; and there are diversities of operations in wrath as well as mercy. Dathan and Abiram thought themselves safe, because they were at a distance from the Shechinah, whence the fire of the Lord had sometimes issued, qui procul à Jove, (they say,) procul à fulmine—he who is far from Jove, is far from the thunderbolt. But God made them to know that he was not tied up to one way of punishing; the earth, when he pleases, shall serve his justice as effectually as the fire. 2. It is very terrible to the sinners themselves to go down alive into their own graves; dead and buried in an instant; to go down thus to the bars of the pit, when they were in their full strength, wholly at ease and quiet. 3. It was severe upon their poor children, who, for the greater terror of the judgment, and fuller indication of the divine wrath, perished as part of their parents; in which, though we cannot particularly tell how bad they might be to deserve it, or how good God might be otherwise to them to compensate it, yet of this we are sure, in the general, that infinite Justice did them no wrong. Far be it from God that he should do iniquity. 4. It was altogether miraculous. The cleaving of the earth was as wonderful, and as much above the power of nature, as the cleaving of the sea; and the closing of the earth again more so than the closing of the waters. God has all the creatures at his command, and can make any of them, when he pleases, instruments of his justice; nor will any of them be our friends, if he be our Enemy. God now confirmed to Israel what Moses had lately taught them in that prayer of his, Ps.90.11. Who knows the power of thine anger? He has, when he pleases, strange punishments for the workers of iniquity, Job,31.3. Let us therefore conclude, Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God? 5. It was very significant. They set their mouths against the heavens, and their throat was an open sepulchre; justly therefore does the earth open her mouth upon them, and swallow them up. They made a rent in the congregation, justly therefore is the earth rent under them. Presumptuous sinners, that hate to be reformed, are a burthen to the earth, the whole creation groans under them, which here was signified by this, that the earth sunk under these rebels, as weary of bearing them, and being under them. And, considering how the earth is still in like manner loaded with the weight of iniquity, we have reason to wonder that this was the only time it ever sunk under its load. Lastly, It was typical of the eternal ruin of sinners who die impenitent, who, perhaps in allusion to this, are said to sink down into the pit, (Ps.9.15.) and to go down quick into hell, Ps.55.15. But David, even when he sinks in deep mire, yet prays in faith, Let not the pit shut her mouth upon me, as it does on the damned, between whom and life there is a gulf fixed, Ps.69.2. .15. His case was bad, but not, like this, desperate.

V. All Israel is alarmed at the judgment, v.34. They fled at the cry of them. They cried for help when it was too late; their doleful shrieks, instead of fetching their neighbours in to their relief, drove them so much the further off; for, knowing their own guilt, and one another's, they hastened one another, saying, Lest the earth swallow us up also. Note, Others' ruins should be our warnings. Could we by faith hear the outcries of those that are gone down to the bottomless pit, we should give more diligence than we do to escape for our lives, lest we also come into that condemnation.

35. And there came out a fire from the LORD, and consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense. 36. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 37. Speak unto Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest, that he take up the censers out of the burning, and scatter thou the fire yonder; for they are hallowed. 38. The censers of these sinners against their own souls, let them make them broad plates for a covering of the altar: for they offered them before the LORD, therefore they are hallowed: and they shall be a sign unto the children of Israel. 39. And Eleazar the priest took the brazen censers, wherewith they that were burnt had offered; and they were made broad plates for a covering of the altar: 40. To be a memorial unto the children of Israel, that no stranger, which is not of the seed of Aaron, come near to offer incense before the LORD; that he be not as Korah, and as his company: as the LORD said to him by the hand of Moses.

We must now look back to the door of the tabernacle, where we left the pretenders to the priesthood, with their censers in their hands, ready to offer incense; and here we find,

I. Vengeance taken on them, v. 35. It is probable, that, when the earth opened in the camp to swallow up Dathan and Abiram, a fire went out from the Lord, and consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense, while Aaron, that stood with them, was preserved alive. This punishment was not, indeed, so new a thing as the former, for Nadab and Abihu thus died; but it was no less strange or dreadful; and it appeared, 1. That our God is a consuming Fire. Is thunder a sensible indication of the terror of his voice? Lightning is also the power of his hand. We must see in this his fiery indignation which devours the adversaries, and infer from it what a fearful thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God, Heb. 10. 27. . 31. 2. That it is at our peril if we meddle with that which does not belong to us. God is jealous of the honour of his own institutions, and will not have them invaded. It is most probable that Korah himself was consumed with these 250 that pretended to offer incense; for the priesthood was the thing that he aimed at, and therefore we have reason to think that he would not quit his post at the door of the tabernacle. But, behold, they are made sacrifices to the justice of God, who flattered themselves with the hopes of being priests. Had they been content with their office as Levites, which was sacred and honourable, and better than they deserved, they might have lived and died with joy and reputation: but, like the angels that sinned, leaving their first estate, and aiming at the honours that were not appointed them, they were thrust down to Hades, their censers struck out of their hands, and their breath out of their bodies, by a burning which typified the vengeance of the eternal fire.

II. Care is taken to perpetuate the remembrance of this vengeance. No mention is made of the taking up of their carcases, the scripture leaves them as dung upon the face of the earth; but orders are given about the censers, 1. That they be secured, because they are hallowed; Eleazar is charged with this, v. 37. Those invaders of the priesthood had proceeded so far, by the divine patience and submission, as to kindle their incense with fire from off the altar, which they were suffered to use by way of experiment: but, as soon as they had kindled their fire, God kindled another, which put a fatal, final, period to their pretensions; now Eleazar is ordered to scatter the fire, with the incense that was kindled with it, in some unclean place without the camp, to signify God's abhorrence of their offering as a polluted thing; The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord. But he is to gather up the censers out of the mingled burning, God's fire, and their's; because they are hallowed. Having been once put to a holy use, and that by God's own order, (though only for trial,) they must not return to common service; so some understand it: rather, they are devoted; they are an anathema; and therefore, as all devoted things, they must be made, some way or other, serviceable to the glory of God. 2. That they be used in the service of the sanctuary, not as censers, that would rather have put honour upon the usurpers, whose disgrace was intended; nor was there occasion for brazen censers, the golden altar was served with golden ones; but they must be beaten into broad plates for a covering of the brazen altar, v. 38. . 40. These pretenders thought to have ruined the altar, by laying the priesthood in common again; but, to shew that Aaron's office was so far from being shaken by their impotent malice, that it was rather confirmed by it, their censers, which offered to rival his, were used both for the adorning and for the preserving of the altar at which he ministered. Yet this was not all; this covering of the altar must be a memorial to the children of Israel, throughout their generations, of this great event. Though there was so much in it astonishing, and though Moses was to record it in his history, yet there was a danger of its being forgotten in process of time; impressions that seem deep are not always durable; therefore it was necessary to appoint this record of the judgment, that the Levites, who attended this altar, and had their inferior services appointed them, might learn to keep within their bounds, and be afraid of transgressing them, lest they should be made like Korah and his company, who were Levites, and would have been priests. These censers were preserved in terrore—that others might hear, and fear, and do no more presumptuously. Thus God has provided that his wonderful works, both in mercy and judgment, should be had in everlasting remembrance, that the end of them may be answered, and they may serve for instruction and admonition to those on whom the ends of the world are come.

41. But on the morrow all the congregation of the children of Israel murmured against Moses and against Aaron, saying, Ye have killed the people of the LORD. 42. And it came to pass, when the congregation was gathered against Moses and against Aaron, that they looked toward the tabernacle of the congregation: and, behold, the cloud covered it, and the glory of the LORD appeared. 43. And Moses and Aaron came before the tabernacle of the congregation. 44. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 45. Get you up from among this congregation, that I may consume them as in a moment. And they fell upon their faces. 46. And Moses said unto Aaron, Take a censer, and put fire therein from off the altar, and put on incense, and go quickly unto the congregation, and make an atonement for them: for there is wrath gone out from the LORD; the plague is begun. 47. And Aaron took as Moses commanded, and ran into the midst of the congregation; and, behold, the plague was begun among the people: and he put on incense, and made an atonement for the people. 48. And he stood between the dead and the living; and the plague was stayed. 49. Now they that died in the plague were fourteen thousand and seven hundred, beside them that died about the matter of Korah. 50. And Aaron returned unto Moses unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: and the plague was stayed.

Here is,

I. A new rebellion, raised the very next day, against Moses and Aaron. Be astonished, O heavens, at this, and wonder, O earth! Was there ever such an instance of the incurable corruption of sinners? v. 41. On the morrow the body of the people mutinied; 1. Though they were so lately terrified by the sight of the punishment of the rebels, the shrieks of those sinking sinners, those sinners against their own souls, were yet sounding in their ears, the smell of the fire yet remained, and the gaping earth was scarce thoroughly closed, and yet the same sins are re-acted, and all these warnings slighted. 2. Though they were so lately saved from sharing in the same punishment, and the survivors were as brands plucked out of the burning, yet they fly in the face of Moses and Aaron, to whose intercession they owed their preservation. Their charge runs very high, Ye have killed the people of the Lord. Could any thing have been said more unjustly and maliciously? They canonize the rebels, calling them the people of the Lord, who died in arms against him; they stigmatize divine justice itself; it was plain enough that Moses and Aaron had no hand in their death, they did what they could to save them; so that, in charging them with murder, they did, in effect, charge God himself with it. The continued obstinacy of this people, notwithstanding the terrors of God's law, as it was given on mount Sinai, and the terrors of his judgments, as they were here executed on the disobedient, shews how necessary the grace of God is to the effectual change of men's hearts and lives, without which the most likely means will never attain the end. Love will do what fear could not.

II. God's speedy appearing against the rebels. When they were gathered against Moses and Aaron, perhaps with a design to depose or murder them, they looked toward the tabernacle, as if their misgiving consciences expected some frowns from thence, and, behold, the glory of the Lord appeared, (v. 42.) for the protection of his servants, and confusion of his and their accusers and adversaries. Moses and Aaron thereupon came before the tabernacle, partly for their own safety; there they took sanctuary from the strife of tongues, (Ps. 27. 5.—31. 20.) and partly for advice, to know what was the mind of God upon this occasion, v. 43. Justice hereupon declares that they deserve to be consumed in a moment, v. 45. Why should they live another day who hate to be reformed, and whose rebellions are their daily practices? Let just vengeance take place and do its work, and the trouble with them will soon be over; only Moses and Aaron must first be secured.

III. The intercession which Moses and Aaron made for them. Though they had as much reason, one would think, as Elias had to make intercession against Israel, (Rom. 11. 2.) yet they forgive and forget the indignities offered them, and are the best friends their enemies have. 1. They both fell on their faces, humbly to intercede with God for mercy, knowing how great their provocation was. This they had done several times before, upon similar occasions; and, though the people had basely requited them for it, yet, God having graciously accepted them, they still have recourse to the same method. This is praying always. 2. Moses, perceiving that the plague was begun in the congregation of the rebels, that is, that body of them which was gathered together against Moses, sends Aaron, by an act of his priestly office, to make atonement for them, v. 46. And Aaron readily went, and burned incense between the living and the dead, not to purify the infected air, but to pacify an offended God, and so stayed the progress of the judgment.

By this it appeared, (1.) That Aaron was a very good man, and a man that had true love for the children of his people, though they hated and envied him. Though God was now avenging his quarrel, and pleading the cause of his priesthood, yet he interposes to turn away God's wrath. Nay, forgetting his age and gravity, he ran into the midst of the congregation to help them. He did not say, "Let them smart awhile, and then when I come I shall be the more welcome;" but, as one tender of the life of every Israelite, he makes all possible speed into the gap at which death was entering. Moses and Aaron, who had been charged with killing the people of the Lord, might justly have upbraided them now; could they expect those to be their saviours whom they had so invidiously called their murderers? But those good men have taught us here, by their example, not to be sullen toward those that are peevish with us, nor to take the advantage which men give us, by their provoking language, to deny them any real kindness which it is in the power of our hands to do them. We must render good for evil. (2.) That Aaron was a very bold man; bold, to venture into the midst of an enraged rabble, that were gathered together against him, and who, for aught he knew, might be the more exasperated by the plague that was begun; bold, to venture into the midst of the infection, where the arrows of death flew thickest, and hundreds, nay thousands, were falling on his right and left hand. To save their lives, he put his own into his hand, not counting it dear to him, so he might but fulfil his ministry. (3.) That Aaron was a man of God, and ordained for men, in things pertaining to God. This call to the priesthood was hereby abundantly confirmed, and set above all contradiction; God had not only saved his life, when the intruders were cut off, but now made him an instrument for saving Israel. Compare the censer of Aaron here with the censers of those sinners against their own souls. Those provoked God's anger, this pacified it; those destroyed men's lives, this saved them; no room, therefore, is left to doubt of Aaron's call to the priesthood. Note, Those make out the best title to public honours that lay out themselves the most for the public good, and obtain mercy of the Lord to be faithful and useful. If any man will be great, let him make himself the servant of all. (4.) That Aaron was a type of Christ, who came into the world to make an atonement for sin, and to turn away the wrath of God from us, and who, by his mediation and intercession, stands between the living and the dead, to secure his chosen Israel to himself, and save them out of the midst of a world infected with sin and the curse.

IV. The result and issue of the whole matter. 1. God's justice was glorified in the death of some. Great execution the sword of the Lord did in a very little time. Though Aaron made all the haste he could, yet, before he could reach his post of service, there were 14,700 men laid dead upon the spot, v. 49. There were but few comparatively that died about the matter of Korah, the ring-leaders only were made examples, but, the people not being led to repentance by the patience and forbearance of God with them, justice is not now so sparing of the blood of Israelites. They cried out of the death of a few hundreds as an unmerciful slaughter made among the people of the Lord, but here God silences that complaint by the slaughter of many thousands. Note, Those that quarrel with lesser judgments prepare greater for themselves; for when God judges he will overcome. 2. His mercy was glorified in the preservation of the rest; God shewed them what he could do by his power, and what he might do in justice, but then shewed them what he would do in his love and pity, he would preserve them a people to himself, notwithstanding all this, in and by a mediator. The cloud of Aaron's incense, coming from his hand, stayed the plague. Note, It is much for the glory of God's goodness, that many a time, even in wrath, he remembers mercy; and, even when judgments have been begun, prayer puts a stop to them; so ready is he to forgive, and so little pleasure does he take in the death of sinners.

CHAP. XVII.

Enough had been done in the chapter before to quash all pretensions of the families of the tribe of Levi that would set up in competition with Aaron, and to make it appear that Aaron was the head of that tribe; but it seems, when that matter was settled, the princes of the rest of the tribes began to murmur: if the head of a tribe must be a priest, why not the head of some other tribe than that of Levi? He that searches the heart knew this thought to be in the breast of some of them, and, before it broke out into any overt-act, graciously anticipated it, to prevent bloodshed; and it is done by miracle in this chapter, not a miracle of wrath, as before, but of grace. I. The matter is put upon trial by the bringing of twelve rods, one for each prince, before the Lord, v. 1. 5. II. Upon trial, the matter is determined by the miraculous blossoming of Aaron's rod, v. 8, 9. The decision of the controversy is registered by the preservation of the rod, v. 10, 11. IV. The people acquiesce in it with some reluctance, v. 12, 13.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Speak unto the children of Israel, and take of every one of them a rod according to the house of their fathers, of all their princes according to the house of their fathers twelve rods: write thou every man's name upon his rod. 3. And thou shalt write Aaron's name upon the rod of Levi: for one rod shall be for the head of the house of their fathers. 4. And thou shalt lay them up in the tabernacle of the congregation before the testimony, where I will meet with you. 5. And it shall come to pass, that the man's rod, whom I shall choose, shall blossom: and I will make to cease from me the murmurings of the children of Israel, whereby they murmur against you. 6. And Moses spake unto the children of Israel, and every one of their princes gave him a rod apiece, for each prince one, according to their fathers' houses, even twelve rods: and the rod of Aaron was among their rods. 7. And Moses laid up the rods before the LORD in the tabernacle of witness.

Here we have,

1. Orders given for the bringing in of a rod for every tribe, (which was peculiarly significant, for the word here used for a rod sometimes signified a tribe, as particularly ch. 34. 13.) that God, by a miracle wrought on purpose, might make it known on whom he had conferred the honour of the priesthood. (1.) It seems, then, the priesthood was a preferment worth seeking and striving for, even by the princes of the tribes. It is an honour to the greatest of men to be employed in the service of God. Yet, perhaps, these contended for it rather for the sake of the profit and power that attended the office, than for the sake of that in it which was divine and sacred. (2.) It seems likewise, after all that had been done to settle this matter, there were those who would be ready upon any occasion to contest it. They would not acquiesce in the divine appointment, but would make an interest in opposition to it. They strive with God for the dominion, and the question is, whose will shall stand? God will rule, but Israel will not be ruled, and that is the quarrel. (3.) It is an instance of the grace of God, that, having wrought divers miracles to punish sin, he would work one more on purpose to prevent it. God has effectually provided that the obstinate shall be left inexcusable, and every mouth shall be stopped. Israel was very prone to murmur, both against God, and against their governors; "Now," said God, "I will make to cease from me the murmurings of the children of Israel, v. 5. If any thing will convince them, they shall be convinced; and if this will not convince them, nothing will." This was to be to them, as Christ said the sign of the prophet Jonas, that is, his own resurrection, should be to the men of that generation, the highest proof of his mission that should be given them.

The directions are, [1.] That twelve rods or staves should be brought in; it is probable that they were not now fresh cut out of a tree, for then the miracle had not been so great; but that they were the staves which the princes ordinarily used as ensigns of their authority; of which we read, (ch. 21. 18.) old dry staves, that had no sap in them, and it is probable that they were all made of the almond-tree. It should seem, they were but twelve in all, with Aaron's, for when Levi comes into the account, Ephraim and Manasseh make but one, under the name of Joseph. [2.] That the name of each prince should be written upon his rod, that every man might know his own, and to prevent contests. Writing is often a good preservative against strife, for what is written may be appealed to. [3.] That they should be laid up in the tabernacle, for one night before the testimony, that is, before the ark, which, with its mercy-seat, was a symbol, token, or testimony, of God's presence with them. [4.] They were to expect, being told it before, that the rod of the tribe, or prince, whom God chose to the priesthood, should bud and blossom, v. 5. It was requisite that they should be told of it, that it might appear not to be casual, but according to the counsel and will of God.

2. The preparing of the rods accordingly. The princes brought them in, some of them perhaps fondly expecting that the choice would fall upon them, and all of them thinking it honour enough to be competitors with Aaron, and to stand candidates, even for the priesthood; (v. 7.) and Moses laid them up before the Lord. He did not object that the matter was sufficiently settled already, and enough done to convince those that were not invincibly hardened in their prejudices. He did not undertake to determine the controversy himself, though it might easily have been done, nor did he suggest that it would be to no purpose to offer satisfaction to a people that were willingly blind; but, since God will have it so, he did his part, and lodged the case before the Lord, to whom the appeal was made by consent, and left it with him.

8. And it came to pass, that on the morrow Moses went into the tabernacle of witness; and, behold, the rod of Aaron for the house of Levi was budded, and brought forth buds, and bloomed blossoms, and yielded almonds. 9. And Moses brought out all the rods from before the LORD unto all the children of Israel: and they looked, and took every man his rod. 10. And the LORD said unto Moses, Bring Aaron's rod again before the testimony, to be kept for a token against the rebels; and thou shalt quite take away their murmurings from me, that they die not. 11. And Moses did so: as the LORD commanded him, so did he. 12. And the children of Israel spake unto Moses, saying, Behold, we die, we perish, we all perish. 13. Whosoever cometh any thing near unto the tabernacle of the LORD shall die: shall we be consumed with dying?

Here is,

1. The final determination of the controversy concerning the priesthood, by a miracle, v. 8, 9. The rods, or staves, were brought out from the most holy place, where they were laid up, and publicly produced before the people; and, while all the rest of the rods remained as they were, Aaron's rod only, of a dry stick, became a living branch, budded, and blossomed, and yielded almonds. In some places there were buds, in others blossoms, in others fruit, at the same time; this was miraculous, and took away all suspicion of a fraud, as if in the night Moses had taken away Aaron's rod, and put a living branch of an almond-tree in the room of it; for no ordinary branch would have buds, blossoms, and fruits, upon it, all at once. Now, 1. This was a plain indication to the people that Aaron was chosen to the priesthood, and not any other of the princes or tribes. Thus he was distinguished from them, and manifested to be under the special blessing of heaven, which sometimes yields increase where there is neither planting nor watering by the hand of man. Bishop Hall here observes, that fruitfulness is the best evidence of a divine call, and that the plants of God's setting, and the boughs cut off from them, will flourish: see Ps. 92. 12. 14. The trees of the Lord, though they seem dry trees, are full of sap. 2. It was a very proper sign to represent the priesthood itself, which was hereby confirmed to Aaron, (1.) That it should be fruitful and serviceable to the church of God. It produced not only blossoms, but almonds; for the priesthood was designed, not only for an honour to Aaron, but for a blessing to Israel. Thus Christ ordained his apostles and ministers that they should go and bring forth fruit, and that their fruit should remain, John, 15. 16. (2.) That there should be a succession of priests; here were not only almonds for the present, but buds and blossoms promising more hereafter. Thus has Christ provided in his church, that a seed should serve him from generation to generation. (3.) That yet this priesthood should not be perpetual, but, in process of time, like the branches and blossoms of a tree, should fail and with. The flourishing of the almond-tree is mentioned as one of the signs of old age, Eccl. 12. 5. This character was betimes put upon the priesthood, which soon became old and ready to vanish away, Heb. 8. 13. It was a type and figure of Christ and his priesthood: for he is the Man, the Branch, (Zech. 6. 12.) that is to be a Priest upon his throne, as it follows there; and was to grow up before God, as this before the ark, like a tender plant, and a root out of a dry ground, Isa. 53. 2.

II. The record of this determination, by the preserving of the rod before the testimony, in perpetuam rei memoriam—that it might be had in perpetual remembrance, v. 10, 11. It is probable that the buds, and blossoms, and fruit, continued fresh; the same divine power that produced them in a night, preserved them for ages, at least so long as it was necessary for a token against the rebels. So it was a standing miracle, and the continuance of it was an undeniable proof of the truth of it. Even the leaf of God's trees shall not wither, Ps. 1. 3. This rod was preserved, as the censers were, to take away their murmurings, that they die not. Note, 1. The design of God, in all his providences, both mercies and judgments, and in the memorials of them, is, to take away sin, and to prevent it. These things are done, these things written, that we sin not, 1 John, 2. 1. Christ was manifested to take away sin. 2. What God does for the taking away of sin, is done in real kindness to us, that we die not. All the bitter potions he gives, and all the sharp methods he uses with us, are for the cure of a disease which otherwise would certainly be fatal. Bishop Hall observes here, that the tables of the law, the pot of manna, and Aaron's rod, were preserved together in or about the ark, (the apostle takes notice of them all three together, Heb. 9. 4.) to shew to after-ages how the ancient church was taught, and fed, and ruled; and infers how precious the doctrine, sacraments, and government of the church are to him, and should be to us. The rod of Moses was used in working many miracles, yet we do not find that this was preserved, for the keeping of it would serve only to gratify men's curiosity; but the rod of Aaron, that which carried its miracle along with it, was carefully preserved, because that would be of standing use to convince men's consciences, to silence all disputes about the priesthood, and to confirm the faith of God's Israel in his institutions. Such is the difference between the sacraments which Christ has appointed for edification, and the relics which men have devised for superstition.

III. The outcry of the people hereupon; (v. 12, 13.) Behold we die, we perish, we all perish: shall we be consumed with dying? This may be considered as the language, either, 1. Of a repining people quarrelling with the judgments of God, which, by their own pride and obstinacy, they had brought upon themselves. They seem to speak despairingly, as if God was a hard Master, that sought advantage against them, and took all occasions to pick quarrels with them, so that if they trod ever so little awry, if they stepped ever so little beyond their bounds, they must die, they must perish, they must all perish, basely insinuating that God would never be satisfied with their blood and ruin till he had made an end of them all, and they were consumed with dying. Thus they seem to be like a wild bull in a net, full of the fury of the Lord, (Isa. 51. 20.) fretting that God was too hard for them, and that they were forced to fall under, only because they could not help it. Note, It is a very wicked thing to fret against God, when we are in affliction, and in our distress thus to trespass yet more. If we die, if we perish, it is long of ourselves, and the blame will lie upon our own heads. Or, 2. Of a repenting people; many interpreters take it as bespeaking their submission. "Now we see it is the will of God that we should keep our distance, and it is at our peril if we draw nearer than is appointed; we submit to the divine will in this appointment, we will not contend any more, lest we all perish:" and they engage Moses to intercede for them, that they might not be all consumed with dying. Thus the point was gained, and in this matter God quite took away their murmurings, and from henceforward they acquiesced. Note, When God judges, he will overcome, and, one way or other, will oblige the most obstinate gainsayers to confess their folly sooner or later, and that wherein they dealt proudly he was above them. Vicisti Galilee—O Galilæan, thou hast conquered.

CHAP. XVIII.

Aaron being now fully established in the priesthood, abundantly to his own satisfaction, and to the satisfaction of the people, (which was the good that God brought out of the evil opposition made to him,) in this chapter God gives him full instructions concerning his office; or rather repeats those which he had before given him. He tells him, I. What must be his work, and the care and charge committed to him; and what assistance he should have from the Levites in that work, v. 1. . 7. II. What should be his wages, and the Levites', for this work. 1. The perquisites or fees peculiar to the priests, v. 8. . 19. 2. The settled maintenance of the Levites, v. 20. . 24. III. The portion which must be paid to the priests out of the Levites' maintenance, v. 25. . 32. Thus every one knew what he had to do, and what he had to live upon.

1. AND the LORD said unto Aaron, Thou and thy sons and thy father's house with thee shall bear the iniquity of the sanctuary: and thou and thy sons with thee shall bear the iniquity of your priesthood. 2. And thy brethren also of the tribe of Levi, the tribe of thy father, bring thou with thee, that they may be joined unto thee, and minister unto thee: but thou and thy sons with thee shall minister before the tabernacle of witness. 3. And they shall keep thy charge, and the charge of all the tabernacle: only they shall not come nigh the vessels of the sanctuary and the altar, that neither they, nor ye also, die. 4. And they shall be joined unto thee, and keep the charge of the tabernacle of the congregation, for all the service of the tabernacle: and a stranger shall not come nigh unto you. 5. And ye shall keep the charge of the sanctuary, and the charge of the altar: that there be no wrath any more upon the children of Israel. 6. And I, behold, I have taken your brethren the Levites from among the children of Israel: to you they are given as a gift for the LORD, to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation. 7. Therefore thou and thy sons with thee shall keep your priest's office for every thing of the altar, and within the veil; and ye shall serve: I have given your priest's office unto you as a service of gift: and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.

The coherence of this chapter with that foregoing is very observable.

I. The people, in the close of that chapter, had complained of the difficulty and peril that there were in drawing near to God, which put them under some dreadful apprehensions, that the tabernacle in the midst of them, which they hoped would have been their joy and glory, would rather be their terror and ruin; now, in answer to this complaint, God here gives them to understand by Aaron, that the priests should come near for them as their representatives; so that though the people were obliged to keep their distance, yet that should not at all redound to their disgrace or prejudice, but their comfortable communion with God should be kept up by the interposition of the priests.

2. A great deal of honour God had now lately put upon Aaron; his rod had budded and blossomed, when the rods of the rest of the princes remained dry, and destitute both of fruit and ornament: now lest Aaron should be puffed up with the abundance of the favours that were done him, and the miracles that were wrought for the support of him in his high station, God comes to him to remind him of the burthen that was laid upon him, and the duty required from him as a priest. He would see reason not to be proud of his preferment, but to receive the honours of his office with reverence and holy trembling, when he considered how great the care and charge were that devolved upon him, and how hard it would be for him to give a good account of his conduct in this office. Be not high-minded, but fear.

(1.) God tells us the danger that attended his dignity, v. 1. [1.] That both the priests and Levites (Thou, and thy sons, and thy father's house) should bear the iniquity of the sanctuary; that is, if the sanctuary were profaned by the intrusion of strangers, or persons in their uncleanness, the blame should lie upon the Levites and priests, who ought to have kept them off. Though the sinner that thrust in presumptuously should die in his iniquity, yet his blood should be required at the hands of the watchmen. Or, it may be taken more generally, "If any of the duties or offices of the sanctuary be neglected, if any service be not done in its season, or not according to the law, if any thing be lost or misplaced in the removal of the sanctuary, you shall be accountable for it, and answer it at your peril." [2.] That the priests should themselves bear the iniquity of the priesthood; that is, if they either neglected any part of their work, or permitted any other persons to invade their office, and take their work out of their hands, they should bear the blame of it. Note, The greater the trust is of work, and power that is committed to us, the greater is our danger of contracting guilt, by falsifying and betraying that trust. This is a good reason why we should neither be envious at others' honours, nor ambitious ourselves of high places, because great dignity exposes us to great iniquity. Those that are intrusted with the charge of the sanctuary will have a great deal to answer for. Who would covet the care of souls, who considers the account that must be given of that care?

(2.) He tells him of the duty that attended his dignity. [1.] That he and his sons must minister before the tabernacle of witness, (v. 2.) that is, (as Bishop Patrick explains it,) before the most holy place, in which the ark was; on the outside of the vail of that tabernacle, but within the door of the tabernacle of the congregation; they were to attend the golden altar, the table, and candlestick, which no Levite might approach to. Ye shall serve, (v. 7.) not "Ye shall rule;" it was never intended that they should lord it over God's heritage, but "Ye shall serve God and the congregation." Note, The priesthood is a service. If any desire the office of a bishop, he desires a good work. Ministers must remember that they are ministers, that is, servants; of whom it is required that they be humble, diligent, and faithful. [2.] That the Levites must assist him and his sons, and minister to them in all the service of the tabernacle, (v. 2.. 4.) though they must by no means come nigh the vessels of the sanctuary, nor at the altar meddle with the great services of burning the fat and sprinkling the blood. Aaron's family was very small, and as they increased, the rest of the families of Israel would increase likewise, so that their hands neither were now, nor were likely to be, sufficient for all the service of the tabernacle, therefore (says God) the Levites shall be joined to thee, v. 2. and again, v. 4. where there seems to be an allusion to the name of Levi, which signifies joined. Many of the Levites had of late set themselves against Aaron, but from henceforward God promises that they should be heartily joined to him in interest and affection, and should no more contest with him. It was a good sign to Aaron that God owned him, when he inclined the hearts of those concerned to own him too. The Levites are said to be given as a gift to the priests, v. 6. Note, We are to value it as a great gift of the divine bounty to have those joined to us, that will be helpful and serviceable to us in the service of God. [3.] That both priests and Levites must carefully watch against the profanation of sacred things: The Levites must keep the charge of the tabernacle, that no stranger (that is, none who upon any account was forbidden to come) might come nigh, (v. 4.) and that upon pain of death, v. 7. And the priests must keep the charge of the sanctuary, (v. 5.) must instruct the people and admonish them concerning the due distance they were to keep, and not suffer them to break the bounds set them, as Korah's company had done, that there be no wrath any more upon the children of Israel. Note, The preventing of sin is the preventing of wrath; and the mischief sin has done, should be a warning to us for the future, to watch against it both in ourselves and others.

8. And the LORD spake unto Aaron, Behold, I also have given thee the charge of mine heave-offerings of all the hallowed things of the children of Israel; unto thee have I given them by reason of the anointing, and to thy sons, by an ordinance for ever. 9. This shall be thine of the most holy things, reserved from the fire: every oblation of their's, every meat-offering of their's, and every sin-offering of their's, and every trespass-offering of their's, which they shall render unto me, shall be most holy for thee and for thy sons. 10. In the most holy place shalt thou eat it; every male shall eat it: it shall be holy unto thee. 11. And this is thine; the heave-offering of their gift, with all the wave-offerings of the children of Israel: I have given them unto thee, and to thy sons and to thy daughters with thee, by a statute for ever: every one that is clean in thy house shall eat of it. 12. All the best of the oil, and all the best of the wine, and of the wheat, the first-fruits of them which they shall offer unto the LORD, them have I given thee. 13. And whatsoever is first ripe in the land, which they shall bring unto the LORD, shall be thine: every one that is clean in thine house shall eat of it. 14. Every thing devoted in Israel shall be thine. 15. Every thing that openeth the matrix in all flesh, which they bring unto the LORD, whether it be of men or beasts, shall be thine; nevertheless the first-born of man shalt thou surely redeem, and the firstling of unclean beasts shalt thou redeem. 16. And those that are to be redeemed from a month old shalt thou redeem, according to thine estimation, for the money of five shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary, which is twenty gerahs. 17. But the firstling of a cow, or the firstling of a sheep, or the firstling a goat, thou shalt not redeem; they are holy: thou shalt sprinkle their blood upon the altar, and shalt burn their fat for an offering made by fire, for a sweet savour unto the LORD. 18. And the flesh of them shall be thine, as the wave-breast and as the right shoulder are thine. 19. All the heave-offerings of the holy things, which the children of Israel offer unto the LORD, have I given thee, and thy sons and thy daughters with thee, by a statute for ever: it is a covenant of salt for ever before the LORD unto thee and to thy seed with thee.

The priests' service is called a warfare; and who goes a warfare at his own charges? As they were well-employed, so they were well-provided for, and well-paid. None shall serve God for nought. All believers are spiritual priests, and God has promised to take care of them; they shall dwell in the land, and verily they shall be fed, and shall not want any good thing. Godliness has the promise of the life that now is. And, from this plentiful provision here made for the priests, the apostle infers that it is the duty of Christian churches to maintain their ministers; they that served at the altar lived upon the altar. So they that preach the gospel should live upon the gospel, and live comfortably, 1 Cor. 9. 13, 14. Scandalous maintenance makes scandalous ministers. Now observe, 1. That much of the provision that was made for them arose out of the sacrifices which they themselves were employed to offer. They had the skins of almost all the sacrifices, which they might sell, and they had a considerable share out of the meat-offerings, sin-offerings, &c. They that had the charge of the offerings had the benefit, v. 8. Note, God's work is its own wages, and his service carries its recompence along with it. Even in keeping of God's commandments there is great reward. The present pleasures of religion are part of its pay. 2. That they had not only a good table kept for them, but money likewise in their pockets for the redemption of the first-born, and those firstlings of cattle which might not be offered in sacrifice. Thus their maintenance was such as left them altogether disentangled from the affairs of this life; they had no grounds to occupy, no land to till, no vineyards to dress, no cattle to tend, no visible estate to take care of, and yet had a more plentiful income than any other families whatsoever. Thus God ordered it, (1.) That they might be the more entirely addicted to their ministry, and not diverted from it, or disturbed in it, by any worldly care or business. The ministry requires a whole man. (2.) That they might be examples of living by faith, not only in God's providence, but in his ordinance. They lived from hand to mouth, that they might learn to take no thought for the morrow; sufficient for the day would be the provision thereof; and they had no estates to leave their children, that they might by faith leave them to the care of that God who had fed them all their lives long. 3. Of the provision that was made for their tables, some is said to be most holy, (v. 9, 10.) which was to be eaten by the priests themselves, and in the court of the tabernacle only but other perquisites were less holy, of which their families might eat, at their own houses, provided they were clean, v. 11. . 13. See Lev. 22. 10, &c. It is commanded that the best of the oil, and the best of the wine and wheat, should be offered for the first fruits unto the Lord, which the priests were to have, v. 12. Note, We must always serve and honour God with the best we have, for he is the Best, and best deserves it; he is the First, and therefore must have the first ripe. Those that think to save charges, by putting God off with the refuse, do but deceive themselves, for God is not mocked. 5. All this is given to the priests, by reason of the anointing, v. 8. It was not for the sake of their personal merits above other Israelites, that they had these tributes paid to them, be it known unto them; but purely for the sake of the office to which they were anointed. Thus, all the comforts that are given to the Lord's people, are given them by reason of the anointing, which they have received. It is said to be given them by an ordinance for ever, (v. 8.) and it is a covenant of salt for ever, v. 19. As long as the priesthood should continue, this should continue to be the maintenance of it, that this lamp might not go out for want of oil to keep it burning. Thus provision is made that a gospel ministry should continue till Christ comes, by an ordinance for ever. Lo, I am with you (that is their maintenance and support) always, even to the end of the world. Thanks be to the Redeemer, & it is the word which he has commanded to a thousand generations.

20. And the LORD spake unto Aaron, Thou shalt have no inheritance in their land, neither shall thou have any part among them: I am thy part and thine inheritance among the children of Israel. 21. And, behold I have given the children of Levi all the tenth in Israel for an inheritance, for their service which they serve, even the service of the tabernacle of the congregation. 22. Neither must the children of Israel henceforth come nigh the tabernacle of the congregation, lest they bear sin, and die. 23. But the Levites shall do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they shall bear their iniquity: It shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations, that among the children of Israel they have no inheritance. 24. But the tithes of the children of Israel, which they offer as an heave-offering unto the LORD, I have given to the Levites to inherit: therefore I have said unto them, Among the children of Israel they shall have no inheritance. 25. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 26. Thus speak unto the Levites, and say unto them, When ye take of the children of Israel the tithes which I have given you from them for your inheritance, then ye shall offer up an heave-offering of it for the LORD, even a tenth part of the tithe. 27. And this your heave-offering shall be reckoned unto you, as though it were the corn of the threshing-floor, and as the fulness of the wine-press. 28. Thus ye also shall offer an heave-offering unto the LORD of all your tithes, which ye receive of the children of Israel; and ye shall give thereof the LORD's heave-offering to Aaron the priest. 29. Out of all your gifts ye shall offer every heave-offering of the LORD, of all the best thereof, even the hallowed part thereof out of it. 30. Therefore thou shalt say unto them, When ye have heaved the best thereof from it, then it shall be counted unto the Levites as the increase of the threshing-floor, and as the increase of the wine-press. 31. And ye shall eat it in every place, ye and your households: for it is your reward for your service in the tabernacle of the congregation. 32. And ye shall bear no sin by reason of it, when ye have heaved from it the best of it: neither shall ye pollute the holy things of the children of Israel, lest ye die.

Here is a further account of the provision that was made both for the Levites and for the priests, out of the country.

1. They must have no inheritance in the land; only cities to dwell in were afterward allowed them, but no ground to occupy; Thou shalt not have any part among them, v. 20. It is repeated again, v. 23, and again, v. 24. Among the children of Israel they shall have no inheritance, either by purchase or descent. God would have them comfortably provided for, but would not have their families over-rich, lest they should think themselves above that work which their wages supposed, and obliged them constantly to attend upon. As Israel was a peculiar people, and not to be numbered among the nations; so Levi was a peculiar tribe, and not to be settled as the rest of the tribes, but in all respects distinguished from them. A good reason is given, why they must have no inheritance in the land, for, says God, I am thy Part, and thine Inheritance. Note, Those that have God for their Inheritance and their Portion for ever, ought to look with a holy contempt and indifference upon the inheritances of this world, and not covet their portion in it. "The Lord is my Portion, therefore will I hope in him, and not depend upon any thing I have on this earth," Lam. 3. 24. The Levites shall have no inheritance, and yet they shall live very comfortably and plentifully—to teach us that Providence has various ways of supporting those that live in a dependence upon it; the fowls reap not, and yet are fed, the lilies spin not, and yet are clothed; the Levites have no inheritance in Israel, and yet live better than any other tribe. The repetition of that caution, that no Israelite should approach the tabernacle, comes in suitably, though somewhat abruptly, v. 22. It seems set in opposition to that order concerning the priests and Levites, that they should have no inheritance in Israel; to show how God dispenses his favours variously. The Levites have the honour of attending the tabernacle, which is denied the Israelites; but then the Israelites have the honour of inheritances in Canaan, which is denied the Levites; thus each is kept from either envying or despising the other, and both have reason to rejoice in their lot. The Israelites must not come nigh the tabernacle, but then the Levites must have no inheritance in the land; if ministers expect that people should keep in their sphere, and not intermeddle with sacred offices, let him keep in their's, and not entangle themselves in secular affairs.

II. But they must both have tithes of the land. Beside the first-fruits which were appropriated to the priests, which, the Jews say, were to be a fiftieth part, or, at least, a sixtieth, the tithes also was appropriated.

1. The Levites had the tithes of the people's increase, v. 21. I have given (whose the whole is) all the tenth in Israel, of all the productions of the land, to the children of Levi, to be divided among them in just proportions, for their service which they serve. The Levites were the smallest tribe of the twelve, and yet, beside all other advantages, they had a tenth part of the yearly profits, without the trouble and expense of plowing and sowing; such care did God take of those that were devoted to his service; not only that they might be well maintained, but that they might be honoured with a national acknowledgment of the good services they did to the public, and owned as God's agents and receivers; for that which was a heave-offering, or an offering lifted heavenward unto the Lord, was by him consigned to the Levites.

2. The priests had the tenths of the Levites' tithes settled upon them. The order for this Moses is directed to give to the Levites, whom God would have to pay it with cheerfulness, rather than the priests to demand it with authority. Speak to the Levites, that it be offered by them, rather than levied upon them. Now observe, (1.) The Levites were to give God his dues out of their tithes, as well as the Israelites out of their increase. They were God's tenants, and rent was expected from them, nor were they exempted by their office. Thus now, ministers must be charitable out of what they receive; and the more freely they have received, the more freely they must give, and be examples of liberality, (v. 26.) Ye shall offer a heave-offering to the Lord. Those that are employed to assist the devotions of others, must be sure to pay their own, as a heave-offering to the Lord. Prayers and praises lifted up to God, or rather the heart lifted up in them, are now our heave-offerings. This (says God) shall be reckoned to you, as though it were the corn of the threshing-floor; that is, though it was not the fruit of their ground, nor of their own labour, as the tithes of other Israelites were, yet being of such as they had, it should be accepted, to the sanctifying of all the rest. (2.) This was to be given to Aaron the priest, (v. 28.) and to his successors the high priests, to be divided and disposed of in such proportions as they should think fit, among the inferior priests. Most of the profits of the priests' office, which were appointed in the former part of the chapter, arising from the sacrifices, those priests had the benefit of, who constantly attended at the altar; but forasmuch as there were many priests employed in the country to teach and rule, those tithes taken by the Levites, it is probable, were directed by the high priest to their maintenance. It is the probable conjecture of the learned Bishop Patrick, that the tenth of this last tenth was reserved for the high priest himself, to support his state and dignity: for otherwise we read not of any peculiar provision made for him. (3.) When the Levites had thus paid the tenth of their income, as a heave-offering to the Lord, they had themselves the comfortable enjoyment of the other nine parts; (v. 30.) when ye have thus heaved the best from it, (for still God's part must be the best,) then ye shall eat the rest, not as a holy thing, but with the same freedom that the other Israelites eat their part with, in every place, ye and your households. v. 31. See here what is the way to have the comfort of all our worldly possessions, so as to bear no sin by reason of them, as it follows, v. 32. [1.] We must be sure that what we have be got honestly, and in the service of God. It is your reward for your service: that meat is best eaten, that is first earned; but if any will not work, neither shall he eat, 2 Thess. 3. 10. And that seems to be spoken of, as having a particular comfort and satisfaction in it, which is the reward of faithful service done in the tabernacle of the congregation. [2.] We must be sure that God has his dues out of it. Then we have the comfort of our substance, when we have honoured the Lord with it. Then ye shall bear no sin by reason of it, when ye have heaved the best from it. This intimates that we must never feed ourselves without fear, lest our table become a snare, and we bear sin by reason of it; and that therefore we are concerned to give alms of such things as we have, that all may be clean and comfortable to us.

CHAP. XIX.

This chapter is only concerning the preparing and using of the ashes which were to impregnate the water of purification. The people had complained of the strictness of the law, which forbade their near approach to the tabernacle, ch. 17. 13. In answer to which complaint, they are here directed to purify themselves, so as that they might come as far as they had occasion, without fear. Here is, I. The method of preparing these ashes, by the burning of a red heifer, with a great deal of ceremony, v. 1. .10. II. The way of using them. 1. They were designed to purify persons from the pollution contracted by a dead body, v. 11. .16. 2. They were to be put in to running water (a small quantity of them,) with which the person to be cleansed must be purified, v. 17. .22. And that this ceremonial purification was a type and figure of the cleansing of the consciences of believers from the pollutions of sin, appears by the apostle's discourse, Heb. 9. 13, 14. where he compares the efficacy of the blood of Christ with the sanctifying virtue that was in the ashes of a heifer sprinkling the unclean.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, and unto Aaron, saying, 2. This is the ordinance of the law which the LORD hath commanded, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, that they bring thee a red heifer without spot, wherein is no blemish, and upon which never came yoke: 3. And ye shall give her unto Eleazar the priest, that he may bring her forth without the camp, and one shall slay her before his face: 4. And Eleazar the priest shall take of her blood with his finger and sprinkle of her blood directly before the tabernacle of the congregation seven times: 5. And one shall burn the heifer in his sight; her skin, and her flesh, and her blood, with her dung, shall he burn: 6. And the priest shall take cedar-wood, and hyssop, and scarlet, and cast it into the midst of the burning of the heifer. 7. Then the priest shall wash his clothes, and he shall bathe his flesh in water, and afterward he shall come into the camp, and the priest shall be unclean until the even. 8. And he that burneth her shall wash his clothes in water, and bathe his flesh in water, and shall be unclean until the even. 9. And a man that is clean shall gather up the ashes of the heifer, and lay them up without the camp in a clean place, and it shall be kept for the congregation of the children of Israel for a water of separation: it is a purification for sin. 10. And he that gathereth the ashes of the heifer shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even: and it shall be unto the children of Israel, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among them, for a statute for ever.

We have here the divine appointment concerning the solemn burning of a red heifer to ashes, and the preserving of the ashes, that of them might be made, not a beautifying, but a purifying, water, for that was the utmost the law reached to; it offered not to adorn as the gospel does, but to cleanse only. This burning of the heifer, though it was not properly a sacrifice of expiation, being not performed at the altar, yet was typical of the death and sufferings of Christ, by which he intended not only to satisfy God's justice, but to purify and pacify our consciences, that we may have peace with God, and also peace in our own bosoms: to prepare for which Christ died, not only like the bulls and goats at the altar, but like the heifer without the camp.

I. There was a great deal of care employed in the choice of the heifer that was to be burnt, much more than in the choice of any other offering, v. 2. It must not only be without blemish, typifying the spotless purity and sinless perfection of the Lord Jesus, but it must be a red heifer, because of the rarity of the colour, that it might be the more remarkable: the Jews say, "If but two hairs were black or white, it was unlawful." Christ, as man, was the Son of Adam, red-earth; and we find him red in his apparel, red with his own blood, and red with the blood of his enemies. And it must be one on which never came yoke, which was not insisted on in other sacrifices, but thus was typified the voluntary offer of the Lord Jesus, when he said, Lo, I come. He was bound and held with no other cords than those of his own love. This heifer was to be provided at the expense of the congregation, because they were all to have a joint-interest in it; and so all believers have in Christ.

II. There was to be a great deal of ceremony in the burning of it. The care of doing it was committed to Eleazar, not to Aaron himself, because it was not fit that he should do any thing to render himself ceremonially unclean, no, not so much as till the even; (v. 8.) yet it being an affair of great concern, especially in the significancy of it, it was to be performed by him that was next to Aaron in dignity. The chief priests of that time had the principal hand in the death of Christ. Now,

1. The heifer was to be slain without the camp, as an impure thing, which bespeaks the insufficiency of the methods prescribed by the ceremonial law to take away sin; so far were they from cleansing effectually, that they were themselves unclean; as if the pollution that was laid upon them, continued to cleave to them. Yet, to answer this type, our Lord Jesus, being made sin and a curse for us, suffered without the gate, Heb. 13. 12.

2. Eleazar was to sprinkle the blood directly before the door of the tabernacle, and looking steadfastly towards it, v. 4. This made it in some sort an expiation; for the sprinkling of the blood before the Lord was the chief solemnity in all the sacrifices of atonement; therefore though this was not done at the altar, yet being done toward the sanctuary, it was intimated that the virtue and validity of it depended upon the sanctuary, and were derived from it. This signified the satisfaction that was made to God by the death of Christ, our great High Priest, who by the eternal Spirit (and the Spirit is called the finger of God, as Ainsworth observes, Luke, 11. 20.) offered himself without spot unto God: he did, as it were, sprinkle his own blood directly before the sanctuary, when he said, Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit: it also signifies how necessary it was to the purifying of our hearts, that satisfaction should be made to Divine Justice. This sprinkling of the blood put virtue into the ashes.

3. The heifer was to be wholly burnt, v. 5. This typified the extreme sufferings of our Lord Jesus, both in soul and body, as a Sacrifice made by fire. The priest was to cast into the fire, while it was burning, cedar-wood, hyssop, and scarlet, which were used in the cleansing of lepers, (Lev. 14. 6, 7.) that the ashes of these might be mingled with the ashes of the heifer, because they were designed for purification.

4. The ashes of the heifer (separated as well as they could from the ashes of the wood wherewith it was burnt) were to be carefully gathered up by the hand of a clean person, and (as the Jews say) pounded and sifted, and so laid up for the use of the congregation, as there was occasion, (v. 9.) not only for that generation, but for posterity; for the ashes of this one heifer were sufficient to season as many vessels of water as the people of Israel would need for many ages. The Jews say that this one served till the captivity, near 1000 years, and that there was never another heifer burnt till Ezra's time, after their return; to which tradition of their's, I ground (I suppose) only upon the silence of their old records, I see no reason we have to give credit, since in the later times of their church, which they had more full records of, they find eight burnt between Ezra's time and the destruction of the second temple, which was about 500 years. These ashes are said to be laid up here as a purification for sin, because, though they were intended only to purify from ceremonial uncleanness, yet they were a type of that purification for sin which our Lord Jesus made by his death. Ashes mixed with water are used in scouring, but these had their virtue purely from the divine institution, and their accomplishment and perfection in Christ, who is the End of this law for righteousness. Now observe, (1.) That the water of purification was made so by the ashes of a heifer, whose blood was sprinkled before the sanctuary; so that which cleanses our consciences, is, the abiding virtue of the death of Christ; it is his blood that cleanses from all sin, 1 John, 1. 7. (2.) That the ashes were sufficient for all the people; there needed not to be a fresh heifer slain for every person or family that had occasion to be purified, but this one was enough for all, even for the strangers that sojourned among them; (v. 10.) so there is virtue enough in the blood of Christ for all that repent and believe the gospel, for every Israelite; and not for their sins only, but for the sins of the whole world, 1 John, 2. 2. (3.) That these ashes were capable of being preserved without waste to many ages. No bodily substance is so incorruptible as ashes are, which (says Bishop Patrick) made these a very fit emblem of the everlasting efficacy of the sacrifice of Christ. He is able to save, and, in order to that, able to cleanse, to the uttermost, both of persons and times. (4.) These ashes were laid up as a stock or treasure, for the constant purification of Israel from their pollutions; so the blood of Christ is laid up for us in the word and sacraments, as an inexhaustible fountain of merit, to which by faith we may have recourse daily, for the purging of our consciences; see Zech. 13. 1.

5. All those that were employed in this service were made ceremonially unclean by it; even Eleazar himself, though he did but sprinkle the blood, v. 7. He that burned the heifer was unclean, (v. 8.) and he that gathered up the ashes; (v. 10.) so all that had a hand in putting Christ to death contracted guilt by it; his betrayer, his prosecutors, his judge, his executioner, all did what they did with wicked hands, though it was by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God; (Acts, 2. 23.) yet some of them were, and all might have been, cleansed by the virtue of that same blood which they had brought themselves under the guilt of. Some make this to signify the imperfection of the legal services, and their insufficiency to take away sin; inasmuch as those who prepared for the purifying of others were themselves polluted by the preparation. The Jews say, this is a mystery which Solomon himself did not understand, that the same thing should pollute those that were clean, and yet purify those that were unclean. But (says Bishop Patrick) it is not strange to those who consider that all the sacrifices which were offered for sin, were therefore looked upon as impure, because the sins of men were laid upon them, as all our sins were upon Christ, who therefore is said to be made sin for us, 2 Cor. 5. 21.

11. He that toucheth the dead body of any man shall be unclean seven days. 12. He shall purify himself with it on the third day, and on the seventh day he shall be clean: but if he purify not himself the third day, then the seventh day he shall not be clean. 13. Whosoever toucheth the dead body of any man that is dead, and purified not himself, defileth the tabernacle of the LORD; and that soul shall be cut off from Israel: because the water of separation was not sprinkled upon him, he shall be unclean; his uncleanness is yet upon him. 14. This is the law, when a man dieth in a tent: all that come into the tent, and all that is in the tent, shall be unclean seven days. 15. And every open vessel, which hath no covering bound upon it, is unclean. 16. And whosoever toucheth one that is slain with a sword in the open fields, or a dead body, or a bone of a man, or a grave, shall be unclean seven days. 17. And for an unclean person they shall take of the ashes of the burnt heifer of purification for sin, and running water shall be put thereto in a vessel: 18. And a clean person shall take hyssop, and dip it in the water, and sprinkle it upon the tent, and upon all the vessels, and upon the persons that were there, and upon him that touched a bone, or one slain, or one dead, or a grave: 19. And the clean person shall sprinkle upon the unclean on the third day, and on the seventh day: and on the seventh day he shall purify himself, and wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and shall be clean at even. 20. But the man that shall be unclean, and shall not purify himself, that soul shall be cut off from among the congregation, because he hath defiled the sanctuary of the LORD: the water of separation hath not been sprinkled upon him; he is unclean. 21. And it shall be a perpetual statute unto them, that he that sprinkleth the water of separation shall wash his clothes; and he that toucheth the water of separation shall be unclean until even. 22. And whatsoever the unclean person toucheth shall be unclean; and the soul that toucheth it shall be unclean until even.

Directions are here given concerning the use and application of the ashes, which were prepared for purification. They were laid up to be laid out; and therefore, though now one place would serve to keep them in, while all Israel lay so closely encamped, yet it is probable that afterward, when they came to Canaan, some of these ashes were kept in every town, for there would be daily use of them. Observe,

I. In what cases there needed a purification with these ashes. No other is mentioned here than the ceremonial uncleanness that was contracted by the touch of a dead body, or of the bone or grave of a dead man, or being in the tent or house where a dead body lay, v. 11, 14, 16. This I look upon to be one of the greatest burthens of the ceremonial law, and one of the most unaccountable. He that touched the carcass of an unclean beast, or any living man under the greatest ceremonial uncleanness, was made unclean by it only till the even, and needed only common water to purify himself with; but he that came near the dead body of man, woman, or child, must bear the reproach of his uncleanness seven days, must twice be purified with the water of separation, which he could not obtain without trouble and charge, and, till he is purified, must not come near the sanctuary, upon pain of death. This was strange, considering, 1. That whenever any died, (and we are in deaths oft,) several persons must unavoidably contract this pollution, the body must be stripped, washed, wound up, carried out, and buried, and this could not be done without many hands, and yet all defiled; which signifies, that in our corrupt and fallen state there is none that lives and sins not; we cannot avoid being polluted by the defiling world we pass through, and we offend daily, yet the impossibility of our being sinless does not make sin the less polluting. 2. That taking care of the dead, to see them decently buried, is not only necessary, but a very good office, and an act of kindness, both to the honour of the dead, and the comfort of the living, and yet uncleanness was contracted by it; which intimates that the pollutions of sin mix with and cleave to our best services. There is not a just man upon earth that doeth good and sinneth not; we are apt some way or other to do amiss even in our doing good. 3. That this pollution was contracted by what was done privately in their own houses, which intimates (as Bishop Patrick observes) that God sees what is done in secret, and nothing can be concealed from the Divine Majesty. 4. This pollution might be contracted, and yet a man might never know it, as by the touch of a grave which appeared not, of which our Saviour says, They that walk over it are not aware of it; (Luke, 11. 44.) which intimates the defilement of the conscience by sins of ignorance, and the cause we have to cry out, "Who can understand his errors?" and to pray, "Cleanse us from secret faults, faults which we ourselves do not see ourselves guilty of."

But why did the law make a dead corpse such a defiling thing? (1.) Because death is the wages of sin, entered into the world by it, and reigns by the power of it. Death to mankind is another thing from what it is to other creatures, it is a curse, it is the execution of the law, and therefore the defilement of death signifies the defilement of sin. (2.) Because the law could not conquer death, nor abolish it and alter the property of it, as the gospel does by bringing life and immortality to light, and so introducing a better hope. Since our Redeemer was dead and buried, death is no more destroying to the Israel of God, and therefore dead bodies are no more defiling; but while the church was under the law, to shew that it made not the comers thereunto perfect, the pollution contracted by dead bodies could not but form in their minds melancholy and uncomfortable notions concerning death, while believers now through Christ can triumph over it. O grave, where is thy victory? Where is thy pollution?

II. How the ashes were to be used and applied in these cases.

1. A small quantity of the ashes must be put into a cup of spring water, and mixed with the water, which thereby was made, as it is here called, a water of separation, because it was to be sprinkled on those who were separated or removed from the sanctuary by their uncleanness. As the ashes of the heifer signified the merit of Christ, so the running water signified the power and grace of the blessed Spirit, who is compared to rivers of living water; and it is by his operation that the righteousness of Christ is applied to us for our cleansing. Hence we are said to be washed, that is, sanctified and justified, not only in the name of the Lord Jesus, but by the Spirit of our God, 1 Cor. 6. 11. 1 Pet. 1. 2. Those that promise themselves benefit by the righteousness of Christ, while they submit not to the grace and influence of the Spirit, do but deceive themselves, for we cannot put asunder what God has joined, nor be purified by the ashes otherwise than in the running water.

2. This water must be applied by a bunch of hyssop dipped in it, with which the person or thing to be cleansed must be sprinkled, (v. 18.) in allusion to which, David prays, Purge me with hyssop. Faith is the bunch of hyssop wherewith the conscience is sprinkled and the heart purified. Many might be sprinkled at once, and the water with which the ashes were mingled, might serve for many sprinklings, till it was all spent; and a very little lighting upon a man served to purify him, if done with that intention. In allusion to this application of the water of separation by sprinkling, the blood of Christ is said to be the blood of sprinkling, (Heb. 12. 24.) and with it we are said to be sprinkled from an evil conscience, (Heb. 10. 22.) that is, we are freed from the uneasiness that arises from a sense of our guilt. And it is foretold, that Christ, by his baptism, shall sprinkle many nations, Isa. 52. 15.

3. The unclean person must be sprinkled with this water on the third day after his pollution, and on the seventh day, v. 12. . 19. The days were reckoned (we may suppose) from the last time of his touching or coming near the dead body; for he would not begin the days of his cleansing, while he was still under a necessity of repeating the pollution; but when the dead body was buried, so that there was no further occasion of meddling with it, then he began to reckon his days. Then and then only we may with comfort apply Christ's merit to our souls, when we have forsaken sin, and cease all fellowship with the unfruitful works of death and darkness. The repetition of the sprinkling teaches us often to renew the actings of repentance and faith: wash, as Naaman, seven times; we need to do that often, which is so necessary to be well done.

4. Though the pollution contracted was only ceremonial, yet the neglect of the purification prescribed would turn into moral guilt; He that shall be unclean, and shall not purify himself, that soul shall be cut off, v. 20. Note, It is a dangerous thing to contemn divine institutions, though they may seem minute. A slight wound, if neglected, may prove fatal; a sin we call little, if not repented of, will be our ruin, when great sinners that repent shall find mercy. Our uncleanness separates us from God, but it is our being unclean and not purifying ourselves, that will separate us for ever from him; it is not the wound that is fatal, so much as the contempt of the remedy.

5. Even he that sprinkled the water of separation, or touched it, or touched the unclean person, must be unclean, till the even, that is, must not come near the sanctuary on that day, v. 21, 22. Thus God would shew them the imperfection of those services, and their insufficiency to purify the conscience, that they might look for the Messiah, who, in the fulness of time, should by the eternal Spirit offer himself without spot unto God, and so purge our consciences from dead works, (that is, from sin, which defiles like a dead body, and is therefore called a body of death;) that we may have liberty of access to the sanctuary, to serve the living God with living sacrifices.

CHAP. XX.

At this chapter begins the history of the fortieth year (which was the last year) of the Israelites' wandering in the wilderness. And since the beginning of their second year, when they were sentenced to perform their quarantine in the desert, there to wear away the tedious revolutions of forty years, there is little recorded concerning them till this last year, which brought them to the borders of Canaan, and the history of this year is almost as large as the history of the first year. This chapter gives an account of, I. The death of Miriam, v. 1. II. The fetching of water out of the rock. In which observe, 1. The distress Israel was in for want of water, v. 2. 2. Their discontent and murmuring in that distress, v. 3. . 5. 3. God's pity and power engaged for their supply with water out of the rock, v. 6. . 9, 11. 4. The infirmity of Moses and Aaron upon this occasion, v. 10. 5. God's displeasure against them, v. 12, 13. III. The treaty with the Edomites. Israel's request, (v. 14. . 17.) and the repulse the Edomites gave them, v. 18. . 21. IV. The death of Aaron the high priest upon mount Hor, the instalment of Eleazar in his room, and the people's mourning for him, v. 22. . 29.

1. THEN came the children of Israel, even the whole congregation, into the desert of Zin, in the first month: and the people abode in Kadesh; and Miriam died there, and was buried there. 2. And there was no water for the congregation: and they gathered themselves together against Moses and against Aaron. 3. And the people chode with Moses, and spake, saying, Would God that we had died when our brethren died before the LORD! 4. And why have ye brought up the congregation of the LORD into this wilderness, that we and our cattle should die there? 5. And wherefore have ye made us to come up out of Egypt, to bring us in unto this evil place? It is no place of seed, or of figs, or of vines, or of pomegranates; neither is there any water to drink. 6. And Moses and Aaron went from the presence of the assembly unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they fell upon their faces: and the glory of the LORD appeared unto them. 7. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 8. Take the rod, and gather thou the assembly together, thou, and Aaron thy brother, and speak ye unto the rock before their eyes; and it shall give forth his water, and thou shalt bring forth to them water out of the rock: so thou shalt give the congregation and their beasts drink. 9. And Moses took the rod from before the LORD, as he commanded him. 10. And Moses and Aaron gathered the congregation together before the rock, and he said unto them, Hear now, ye rebels; must we fetch you water out of this rock? 11. And Moses lifted up his hand, and with his rod he smote the rock twice: and the water came out abundantly, and the congregation drank, and their beasts also. 12. And the LORD spake unto Moses and Aaron, Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them. 13. This is the water of Meribah; because the children of Israel strove with the LORD, and he was sanctified in them.

After thirty-eight years' tedious marches, or rather tedious rests, in the wilderness, backward toward the Red sea, the armies of Israel now at length set their faces toward Canaan again, and are come not far off from the place where they were, when, by the righteous sentence of Divine Justice, they were made to begin their wanderings. Hitherto they had been led about as in a maze or labyrinth, while execution was doing upon the rebels that were sentenced; but they were now brought into the right way again; they abode in Kadesh, (v. 1.) not Kadesh-barnea, which was near the borders of Canaan, but another Kadesh on the confines of Edom, further off from the land of promise, yet in the way to it from the Red sea, to which they had been hurried back. Now,

I. Here Miriam dies, the sister of Moses and Aaron, and, as it should seem, elder than either of them. She must be so, if she was that sister that was set to watch Moses, when he was put into the ark of bulrushes, Exod. 2.4. Miriam died there, v.1. She was a prophetess, and had been an instrument of much good to Israel, Mic. 6.4. When Moses and Aaron with their rod went before them to work wonders for them, Miriam with her timbrel went before them in praising God for these wondrous works, (Exod. 15.20.) and therein did them real service; yet she had once been a murmurer, (ch. 12.1.) and must not enter Canaan.

II. Here there is another Meribah; one place we met with before of that name, in the beginning of their march through the wilderness, which was so called, because of the chiding of the children of Israel, Exod. 17.7. And now we have another place, at the latter end of their march, which bears the same name, and for the same reason: this is the water of Meribah, v.13. What was there done was here re-acted.

1. There was no water for the congregation, v.2. The water out of the rock of Rephidim had followed them while there was need of it; but it is probable that for some time they had been in a country where they were supplied in an ordinary way, and, when common providence supplied them, it was fit that the miracle should cease; but in this place it fell out that there was no water, or not sufficient for the congregation. Note, We live in a wanting world, and, wherever we are, must expect to meet with some inconvenience or other. It is a great mercy to have plenty of water, a mercy which, if we found the want of, we should own the worth of.

2. Hereupon they murmured; mutinied, (v.2.) gathered themselves together, and took up arms against Moses and Aaron. They chid with them, (v.3.) spake the same absurd and brutish language that their fathers had done before them; (1.) They wished they had died as malefactors by the hands of Divine Justice, rather than thus seem for a while neglected by the Divine Mercy. Would God that we had died when our brethren died before the Lord! Instead of giving God thanks, as they ought to have done, for sparing them, they not only despise the mercy of their reprieve, but quarrel with it, as if God had done them a great deal of wrong, in giving them their lives for a prey, and snatching them as brands out of the burning. But they need not wish that they had died with their brethren, they are here taking the ready way to die like their brethren in a little while. Woe unto them that desire the day of the Lord, Amos, 5.18. (2.) They are angry that they were brought out of Egypt, and led through this wilderness, v.4,5. They quarrelled with Moses for that which they knew was the Lord's doing; they represent that as an injury which was the greatest favour that ever was done to any people. They prefer slavery before liberty; the house of bondage before the land of promise; and though the present want was of water only, yet, now that they are disposed to find fault, it shall be looked upon as an insufferable hardship put upon them, that they have not vines and figs. It was an aggravation of their crime, [1.] That they had smarted so long for the discontents and distrusts of their fathers. They had borne their whoredoms now almost forty years in the wilderness; (ch.14.33.) and yet they venture in the same steps, and, as is charged upon Belshazzar, humble not their hearts, though they knew all this, Dan. 5.22. [2.] That they had such long and constant experience of God's goodness to them; and of the tenderness and faithfulness of Moses and Aaron. [3.] That Miriam was now lately dead; and, having lost one of their leaders, they ought to have been more respectful to those that were left; but, as if they were resolved to provoke God to leave them as sheep without any shepherd, they grow outrageous against them; instead of condoling with Moses and Aaron for the death of their sister, they add affliction to their grief.

3. Moses and Aaron made them no reply, but retired to the door of the tabernacle, to know God's mind in this case, v.6. There they fell on their faces, as formerly on the like occasion, to deprecate the wrath of God, and to entreat direction from him. Here is no mention of any thing they said, they knew that God heard the murmurings of the people, and before him they humbly prostrate themselves, making intercession with groanings that cannot be uttered. There they lay waiting for orders. Speak, Lord, for thy servants hear.

4. God appeared to determine the matter; not on his tribunal of justice, to sentence the rebels according to their deserts, no, he will not return to destroy Ephraim, (Hosea, 11.9.) will not always chide; see Gen. 8.21. But he appeared, (1.) On his throne of glory, to silence their unjust murmuring, v.6. The glory of the Lord appeared, to still the tumult of the people, by striking an awe upon them. Note, A believing sight of the glory of the Lord would be an effectual check to our lusts and passions, and would keep our mouths as with a bridle. (2.) On his throne of grace, to satisfy their just desires. It was requisite that they should have water, and therefore, though the manner of their petitioning for it was irregular and disorderly, yet God did not take that advantage against them to deny it them, but gave immediate orders for their supply, v.8. Moses must a second time in God's name command water out of a rock for them, to shew that God is as able as ever to supply his people with good things, even in their greatest straits, and the utmost failure of second causes. Almighty power can bring water out of a rock, has done it, and can again, for his arm is not shortened. Lest it should be thought that there was something peculiar in the former rock itself, some secret spring which nature hid before in it, God here bids him broach another, and does not, as then, direct him which he must apply to, but lets him make use of which he pleased, or the first he came to; all alike to Omnipotence. [1.] God bids him take the rod, that famous rod with which he summoned the plagues of Egypt, and divided the sea, that, having that in his hand, both he and the people might be reminded of the great things God had formerly done for them, and might be encouraged to trust in him now. This rod, it seems, was kept in the tabernacle, (v.9.) for it was the rod of God, the rod of his strength, as the gospel is called, (Ps. 110.2.) perhaps in allusion to it. [2.] God bids him gather the assembly, not the elders only, but the people, to be witness of what was done, that by their own eyes they might be convinced, and made ashamed of their unbelief. There is no fallacy in God's works of wonder, and therefore they shun not the light, nor the inspection and inquiry of many witnesses. [3.] He bids him speak to the rock, which would do as it was bidden, to shame the people who had been so often spoken to, and would not hear or obey. Their hearts were harder than this rock, not so tender, not so yielding, not so obedient. [4.] He promises that the rock should give forth water, (v.8.) and it did so, (v.11.) The water came out abundantly. This is an instance not only of the power of God, that he could thus fetch honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock, but of his mercy and grace, that he would do it for such a provoking people. This was a new generation, (most of the old stock were by this time worn off,) yet they were as bad as those that went before them; murmuring ran in the blood, yet the entail of the divine favour was not cut off; but, in this instance of it, the divine patience shines as bright as the divine favour. He is God, and not man, in sparing and pardoning; nay, he not only here gave them the drink which they drank of in common with their beasts, (v.8,11.) but in it he made them to drink spiritual drink, which typified spiritual blessings, for that rock was Christ.

5. Moses and Aaron acted improperly in the management of this matter; so much so, that God in displeasure told them immediately that they should not have the honour of bringing Israel into Canaan, v.10,12. This is a strange passage of story, yet very instructive. (1.) It is certain that God was greatly offended, and justly, for he is never angry without cause. Though they were his servants, and had obtained mercy to be faithful, though they were his favourites, and such as he had highly honoured, yet, for something they thought, or said, or did, upon this occasion, he put them under the disgrace and mortification of dying as other unbelieving Israelites did, short of Canaan. And, no doubt, the crime deserved the punishment. (2.) Yet it is uncertain what it was, in this management, that was so provoking to God. The fault was complicated; [1.] They did not punctually observe their orders, but in some things varied from their commission; God bid them speak to the rock, and they spake to the people, and smote the rock, which at this time they were not ordered to do, but they thought speaking would not do. When, in distrust of the power of the word, we have recourse to the secular power in matters of pure conscience, we do, as Moses here, smite the rock which we should only speak to. [2.] They assumed too much of the glory of this work of wonder to themselves; Must we fetch water? As if it were done by some power or worthiness of their's. Therefore it is charged upon them, (v. 12.) that they did not sanctify God, that is, they did not give him that glory of this miracle which was due unto his name. [3.] Unbelief was the great transgression, (v. 12.) Ye believed me not; nay, it is called rebellling against God's commandment, ch. 27. 14. The command was to bring water out of the rock, but they rebelled against this command, by distrusting it, and doubting whether it would take effect or no. They speak doubtfully, Must we fetch water? And, probably, they did some other ways discover an uncertainty in their own minds, whether water would come or no for such a rebellious generation as this was. And perhaps they the rather questioned it, though God had promised it, because the glory of the Lord did not appear before them upon this rock, as it had done upon the rock in Rephidim, Exod. 17. 6. They would not take God's word without a sign. Dr. Lightfoot's notion of their unbelief, is, that they doubted whether now at last, when the forty years were expired, they should enter Canaan, and whether they must not, for the murmurings of the people, be condemned to another period of toil, because a new rock was now opened for their supply, which they took for an indication of their longer stay. And if so, justly were they kept out of Canaan themselves, while the people entered at the time appointed. [4.] They said and did all in heat and passion; this is the account given of the sin, (Ps. 106. 33.) They provoked his spirit, so that he spake unadvisedly with his lips. It was in his passion that he called them rebels; it is true, they were so, God had called them so; and Moses afterward, in the way of a just reproof, (Deut. 9. 24.) calls them so without offence, but now it came from a provoked spirit, and was spoken unadvisedly: it was too much like Raca, and, Thou fool. His smiting of the rock twice (it should seem, not waiting at all for the eruption of the water upon the first stroke) shews that he was in a heat. The same thing, said and done with meekness, may be justifiable, which, when said and done in anger, may be highly culpable; see Jam. 1. 20. [5.] That which aggravated all the rest, and made it the more provoking, was, that it was public, before the eyes of the children of Israel, to whom they should have been examples of faith, and hope, and meekness. We find Moses guilty of sinful distrust, ch. 11. 22, 23. That was private between God and him, and therefore was only checked; but this was public, it dishonoured God before Israel, as if he grudged them his favours, and discouraged the people's hope in God, and therefore this was severely punished, and the more, because of the dignity and eminency of them that offended.

From the whole, we may learn, First, That the best of men have their failings, even in those graces that they are most eminent for. The man Moses was very meek, and yet here he sinned in passion; wherefore let him that thinks he stands, take heed lest he fall. Secondly, That God judges not as man judges concerning sins; we might think that there was not much amiss in what Moses said and did, yet God saw cause to animadvert severely upon it. He knows the frame of men's spirits, what temper they are of, and what temper they are in, upon particular occasions; and from what thoughts and intents words and actions do proceed; and we are sure that therefore his judgment is according to truth, when it agrees not with our's. Thirdly, That God not only takes notice of, and is displeased with, the sins of his people, but that the nearer any are to him, the more offensive are their sins, Amos, 3. 2. It should seem, the Psalmist refers to this sin of Moses and Aaron, (Ps. 99. 8.) Thou wast a God that forgavest them, though thou tookest vengeance on their inventions. As many are spared in this life, and punished in the other, so many are punished in this life, and spared in the other. Fourthly, That when our heart is hot within us, we are concerned to take heed that we offend not with our tongue. Yet, Fifthly, It is an evidence of the sincerity of Moses, and his impartiality in writing, that he himself left this upon record concerning himself, and drew not a veil over his own infirmity; by which it appeared that in what he wrote, as well as what he did, he sought God's glory more than his own.

Lastly, The place is hereupon called Meribah, v. 13. It is called Meribah-Kadesh (Deut. 32. 51.) to distinguish it from the other Meribah. It is the water of strife; to perpetuate the remembrance of the people's sin, and Moses's, and yet of God's mercy, who supplied them with water, and owned and honoured Moses notwithstanding. Thus he was sanctified in them, as the Holy One of Israel, so he is called when his mercy rejoices against judgment, Hos. 11. 9. Moses and Aaron did not sanctify God as they ought in the eyes of Israel, (v. 12.) but God was sanctified in them; for he will not be a Loser in his honour by any man. If he be not glorified by us, he will be glorified upon us.

14. And Moses sent messengers from Kadesh unto the king of Edom, Thus saith thy brother Israel, Thou knowest all the travel that hath befallen us: 15. How our fathers went down into Egypt, and we have dwelt in Egypt a long time; and the Egyptians vexed us, and our fathers: 16. And when we cried unto the LORD, he heard our voice, and sent an angel, and hath brought us forth out of Egypt: and, behold, we are in Kadesh, a city in the uttermost of thy border: 17. Let us pass, I pray thee, through thy country: we will not pass through the fields, or through the vineyards, neither will we drink of the water of the wells: we will go by the king's high way, we will not turn to the right hand nor to the left, until we have passed thy borders. 18. And Edom said unto him, Thou shalt not pass by me, lest I come out against thee with the sword. 19. And the children of Israel said unto him, We will go by the highway: and if I and my cattle drink of thy water, then I will pay for it: I will only, without doing any thing else, go through on my feet. 20. And he said, Thou shalt not go through. And Edom came out against him with much people, and with a strong hand. 21. Thus Edom refused to give Israel passage through his border: wherefore Israel turned away from him.

We have here the application made by Israel to the Edomites; the nearest way to Canaan, from the place where Israel now lay encamped, was through the country of Edom. Now,

1. Moses sends ambassadors to treat with the king of Edom for leave to pass through his country, and gives them instructions what to say, v. 14. . 17. (1.) They are to claim kindred with the Edomites. Thus saith thy brother Israel. Both nations descended from Abraham and Isaac, their common ancestors; Esau and Jacob, the two fathers of their several nations, were twin-brothers; and therefore, for relation-sake, they might reasonably expect this kindness from them; nor needed the Edomites to fear that their brother Israel had any ill design upon them, or would take any advantages against them. (2.) They are to give a short account of the history and present state of Israel, which, they take it for granted, the Edomites were no strangers to. And in this there was a double plea; [1.] Israel had been abused by the Egyptians, and therefore ought to be pitied and succoured by their relations; "The Egyptians vexed us, and our fathers, but we may hope our brethren the Edomites will not be so vexatious." [2.] Israel had been wonderfully saved by the Lord, and therefore ought to be countenanced and favoured; (v.16.) "We cried unto the Lord, and he sent an angel, the Angel of his presence, the Angel of the covenant, the eternal Word, who has brought us forth out of Egypt, and led us hither." It was therefore the interest of the Edomites to ingratiate themselves with a people that had so great an interest in heaven, and were so much its favourites, and it was at their peril if they offered them any injury. It is our wisdom and duty to be kind to those whom God is pleased to own, and to take his people for our people. Come in, thou blessed of the Lord. (3.) They are humbly to beg a passport through their country. Though God himself, in the pillar of cloud and fire, was Israel's Guide, in following which they might have justified their passing through any man's ground against all the world; yet God would have this respect paid to the Edomites, to shew that no man's property ought to be invaded under colour of religion. Dominion is founded in providence, not in grace. Thus when Christ was to pass through a village of the Samaritans, to whom his coming was likely to be offensive, he sent messengers before his face to ask leave, Luke, 9. 52. Those that would receive kindness must not disdain to request it. (4.) They are to give security for the good behaviour of the Israelites in this march; that they would keep in the king's high road, that they would commit no trespass upon any man's property, either in ground or water, that they would not so much as make use of a well, without paying for it, and that they would make all convenient speed, as fast as they could well go on their feet, v.17, 19. Nothing could be offered more fair and neighbourly.

2. The ambassadors returned with a denial, v.18. Edom, that is, the king of Edom, as protector of his country, said, Thou shalt not pass by me; and when the ambassadors urged it further, he repeated the denial, (v.20.) and threatened if they offered to enter his country, it should be at their peril; he raised his trained bands to oppose them. Thus Edom refused to give Israel passage. This was owing, (1.) To their jealousy of the Israelites; they feared they should receive damage by them, and would not trust their promises. And truly had this numerous army been under any other discipline than that of the righteous God himself, who would no more suffer them to do wrong, than to take wrong, there might have been cause for this jealousy; but what could they fear from a nation that had statutes and judgments so righteous? (2.) It was owing to the old enmity which Esau bore to Israel. If they had no reason to fear damage by them, yet they were not willing to shew so much kindness to them. Esau hated Jacob because of the blessing, and now the hatred revived, when the blessing was ready to be inherited. God would hereby discover the ill-nature of the Edomites to their shame, and try the good-nature of the Israelites to their honour, they turned away from him, and did not take this occasion to quarrel with him. Note, We must not think it strange if the most reasonable requests be denied by unreasonable men, and if those be affronted by men whom God favours. I as a deaf man heard not. After this indignity which the Edomites offered to Israel, God gave them a particular caution not to abhor an Edomite, (Deut. 23. 7.) though the Edomites had shewed such an abhorrence of them, to teach us in such cases not to meditate revenge.

22. And the children of Israel, even the whole congregation, journeyed from Kadesh, and came unto mount Hor. 23. And the LORD spake unto Moses and Aaron in mount Hor, by the coast of the land of Edom, saying, 24. Aaron shall be gathered unto his people: for he shall not enter into the land which I have given unto the children of Israel, because ye rebelled against my word at the water of Meribah. 25. Take Aaron and Eleazar his son, and bring them up unto mount Hor: 26. And strip Aaron of his garments, and put them upon Eleazar his son: and Aaron shall be gathered unto his people, and shall die there. 27. And Moses did as the LORD commanded: and they went up into mount Hor, in the sight of all the congregation. 28. And Moses stripped Aaron of his garments, and put them upon Eleazar his son; and Aaron died there in the top of the mount: and Moses and Eleazar came down from the mount. 29. And when all the congregation saw that Aaron was dead, they mourned for Aaron thirty days, even all the house of Israel.

The chapter began with the funeral of Miriam, and it ends with the funeral of her brother Aaron. When death comes into a family, it often strikes double. Israel had not improved the former affliction they were under, by the death of the prophetess, and therefore, soon after, God took away their priest, to try if they would lay that to heart. This happened at the very next stage, when they removed to mount Hor, fetching a compass round the Edomites' country, leaving it on their left hand. Wherever we go, death attends us, and the graves are ready for us.

1. God bids Aaron die, v.24. God takes Moses and Aaron aside, and tells them, Aaron shall be gathered to his people; these two dear brothers are told that they must part, Aaron the elder must die first, but Moses is not likely to be long after him, so that it is but for a while, a little while, that they are parted. 1. There is something of displeasure in these orders. Aaron must not enter Canaan, because he had failed in his duty at the waters of strife. The mention of this, no doubt, went to the heart of Moses, who knew himself, perhaps, at that time, to be the guiltier of the two. 2. There is much of mercy in them. Aaron, though he dies for his transgression, is not put to death as a malefactor, by a plague, or fire from heaven, but dies with ease, and in honour. He is not cut off from his people, as the expression usually is concerning those that die by the hand of Divine Justice, but he is gathered to his people, as one that died in the arms of divine grace. 3. There is much of type and significancy in them. Aaron must not enter Canaan, to shew that the Levitical priesthood could make nothing perfect, that must be done by the bringing of a better hope. Those priests could not continue, by reason of sin and death, but the priesthood of Christ, being undefiled, is unchangeable; and to this, which abides for ever, Aaron must resign all his honour, Heb. 7. 23. . 25.

11. Aaron submits, and dies in the method and manner appointed, and, for aught that appears, with as much cheerfulness as if he had been going to bed. 1. He puts on his holy garments to take his leave of them, and goes up with his brother and son to the top of mount Hor, and probably some of the elders of Israel with him, v.27. They went up in the sight of all the congregation, who, it is likely, were told on what errand they went up; by this solemn procession, Aaron lets Israel know that he is neither afraid nor ashamed to die, but, when the bridegroom comes, can trim his lamp, and go forth to meet him. His going up the hill to die, signified that the death of saints (and Aaron is called the saint of the Lord) is their ascension; they rather go up than go down to death. 2. Moses, whose hands had first clothed Aaron with his priestly garments, now strips him of them; for, in reverence to the priesthood, it was not fit that he should die in them. Note, Death will strip us; naked we came into the world, and naked we must go out. We shall see little reason to be proud of our clothes, our ornaments, or marks of honour, if we consider how soon death will strip us of our glory, divest us of all our offices and honours, and take the crown off from our head. 3. Moses immediately puts the priestly garments upon Eleazar his son, clothes him with his father's robe, and strengthens him with his girdle, Isa. 22. 21. Now, (1.) This was a great comfort to Moses, by whose hand the law of the priesthood was given, to see that it should be kept up in a succession, and that a lamp was ordained for the anointed, which should not be extinguished by death itself. This was a happy earnest and indication to the church of the care God would take, that, as one generation of ministers and Christians (spiritual priests) passes away, another generation shall come up instead of it. (2.) It was a great satisfaction to Aaron, to see his son, who was dear to him, thus preferred, and his office, which was dearer, thus preserved and secured; and especially to see in this a figure of Christ's everlasting priesthood, in which alone his would be perpetuated; now, Lord, might Aaron say, Let thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation. (3.) It was a great kindness to the people. The installing of Eleazar, before Aaron was dead, would prevent those who bore ill-will to Aaron's family from attempting to set up another upon his death, in competition with his son. What could they do when the matter was already settled? It would likewise encourage those among them that feared God, and be a token for good to them, that he would not leave them, nor suffer his faithfulness to fail. 4. Aaron died there. Quickly after he was stripped of his priestly garments, he laid him down and died contentedly; for a good man would desire, if it were the will of God, not to outlive his usefulness. Why should we covet to continue any longer in this world, than while we may do God and our generation some service in it? 5. Moses and Eleazar, with those that attended them, buried Aaron there where he died, as appears by Deut. 10. 16. and then came down from the mount. And now, when they came down, and had left Aaron behind, it might be proper for them to think that he was rather gone up to the better world, and had left them behind. 6. All the congregation mourned for Aaron thirty days, v. 29. Though the loss was well made up in Eleazar, who, being in the prime of life, was fitter for public service than Aaron would have been if he had lived, yet it was a debt owing to their deceased high priest to mourn for him. While he lived, they were murmuring at him upon all occasions, but, now that he was dead, they mourned for him. Thus many are taught to lament the loss of those mercies which they would not learn to be thankful for the enjoyment of. Many good men have had more honour done to their memories than ever they had to their persons; witness those that were persecuted while they lived, but, when they were dead, had their pulchres garnished.

CHAP. XXI.

The armies of Israel now begin to emerge out of the wilderness, and to come into a land inhabited; to enter into action, and to take possession of the frontiers of the land of promise. A glorious campaign this chapter gives us the history of, especially in the latter part of it. Here is, I. The defeat of Arad the Canaanite, v. 1. 3. II. The chastisement of the people with fiery serpents for their murmurings, and the relief granted them upon their submission by a brazen serpent, v. 4. 9. III. Several marches forward, and some occurrences by the way, v. 10. 20. IV. The celebrated conquest of Sihon king of the Amorites, (v. 21. 32.) and of Og king of Bashan, (v. 33. 35.) and possession taken of their land.

1. AND when king Arad the Canaanite, which dwelt in the south, heard tell that Israel came by the way of the spies; then he fought against Israel, and took some of them prisoners. 2. And Israel vowed a vow unto the LORD, and said, If thou wilt indeed deliver this people into my hand, then I will utterly destroy their cities. 3. And the LORD hearkened to the voice of Israel, and delivered up the Canaanites; and they utterly destroyed them and their cities: and he called the name of the place Hormah.

Here is, 1. The descent which Arad the Canaanite made upon the camp of Israel, hearing that they came by the way of the spies; for though the spies, which Moses had sent thirty-eight years before, then passed and repassed unobserved, yet their coming, and their errand, it is likely, were afterward known to the Canaanites, gave them an alarm, and induced them to keep an eye upon Israel, and get intelligence of all their motions. Now, when they understood that they were facing about toward Canaan, this Arad, thinking it policy to keep the war at a distance, made an onset upon them, and fought with them. But it proved that he meddled to his own hurt; had he sitten still, his people might have been last destroyed of all the Canaanites, but now they were the first. Thus they that are overmuch wicked, die before their time, Eccl. 7. 17. 2. His success at first in this attempt. His advance-guards picked up some straggling Israelites, and took them prisoners, v. 1. This, no doubt, puffed him up, and he began to think that he should have the honour of crushing this formidable body, and saving his country from the ruin which it threatened. It was likewise a trial to the faith of the Israelites, and a check to them for their distrusts and discontents. 3. Israel's humble address to God upon this occasion, v. 2. It was a temptation to them to murmur as their fathers did, and to despair of getting possession of Canaan; but God, who thus tried them by his providence, enabled them by his grace to quit themselves well in the trial, and to trust in God for relief against this fierce and powerful assailant. They, by their elders, in prayer for success, vowed a vow. Note, When we are desiring and expecting mercy from God, we should bind our souls with a bond that we will faithfully do our duty to him, particularly that we will honour him with the mercy we are in the pursuit of. Thus Israel here promised to destroy the cities of these Canaanites, as devoted to God, and not to take the spoil of them to their own use. If God would give them victory, he should have all the praise, and they would not make a gain of it to themselves. When we are in this frame, we are prepared to receive mercy. 4. The victory which the Israelites obtained over the Canaanites, v. 3. A strong party was sent out, probably under the command of Joshua, which not only drove back these Canaanites, but followed them to their cities, which probably lay on the edge of the wilderness, and utterly destroyed them, and so returned to the camp. Vincimur in prælio, sed non in bello—We lose a battle, but we finally triumph. What is said of the tribe of Gad is true of all God's Israel, a troop may overcome them, but they shall overcome at the last. The place was called Hormah, as a memorial of the destruction, for the terror of the Canaanites, and probably for warning to posterity not to attempt the rebuilding of these cities which were destroyed, as devoted to God, and sacrifices to divine justice. And it appears, from the instance of Jericho, that the law concerning such cities, was, that they should never be rebuilt. There seems to be an allusion to this name in the prophecy of the fall of the New Testament Babylon, (Rev. 16. 16.) where its forces are said to be gathered together to a place called Armageddon; the destruction of a troop.

4. And they journeyed from mount Hor by the way of the Red sea, to compass the land of Edom: and the soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way. 5. And the people spake against God, and against Moses, Wherefore have ye brought us up out of Egypt to die in the wilderness? For there is no bread, neither is there any water; and our soul loatheth this light bread. 6. And the LORD sent fiery serpents among the people, and they bit the people; and much people of Israel died. 7. Therefore the people came to Moses, and said, We have sinned, for we have spoken against the LORD, and against thee; pray unto the LORD, that he take away the serpents from us. And Moses prayed for the people. 8. And the LORD said unto Moses, Make thee a fiery serpent, and set it upon a pole: and it shall come to pass, that every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it, shall live. 9. And Moses made a serpent of brass, and put it upon a pole, and it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived.

Here is,

I. The fatigue of Israel by a long march round the land of Edom, because they could not obtain passage through it the nearest way, (v. 4.) The soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way. Perhaps the way was rough and uneven, or foul and dirty; or it fretted them to go far about, and that they were not permitted to force their passage through the Edomites' country. Those that are of a fretful discontented spirit, will never want something or other to make them uneasy.

II. Their unbelief and murmuring upon this occasion, v. 5. Though they had just now obtained a glorious victory over the Canaanites, and were going on conquering and to conquer; yet they speak very discontentedly of what God had done for them, and distrustfully of what he would do, vexed that they were brought out of Egypt, that they had not bread and water as other people had by their own care and industry, but by miracle, they knew not how. They have bread enough and to spare; and yet they complain there is no bread, because, though they eat angels' food, yet they are weary of it; manna itself is loathed, and called light bread, fit for children, not for men and soldiers. What will they be pleased with, whom manna will not please? They that are disposed to quarrel, will find fault where there is no fault to be found. Thus those that have long enjoyed the means of grace, are apt to surfeit even on the heavenly manna, and to call it light bread. But let not the contempt which some cast upon the word of God, make us to value it the less; it is the bread of life, substantial bread, and will nourish those who, by faith, feed upon it to eternal life, whoever calls it light bread.

III. The righteous judgment which God brought upon them for their murmuring, v. 6. He sent fiery serpents among them, which bit or stung many of them to death. The wilderness, through which they had passed, was all along infested with those fiery serpents, as appears, Deut. 8. 15. But hitherto God had wonderfully preserved his people from receiving hurt from them, till now that they murmured; to chastise them for which, these animals, which hitherto had shunned their camp, now invade it. Justly are those made to feel God's judgments that are not thankful for his mercies. These serpents are called fiery, either from their colour, or from their rage, or from the effects of their bitings, inflaming the body, putting it immediately into a high fever, scorching it with an insatiable thirst. They had unjustly complained for want of water; (v. 5.) to chastise them for which God sends upon them this thirst, which no water would quench. They that cry without cause, have justly cause given them to cry out. They distrustfully concluded that they must die in the wilderness, and God took them at their word, chose their delusions, and brought their unbelieving fears upon them; many of them did die. They had impudently flown in the face of God himself, and the poison of asps was under their lips, and now these fiery serpents (which, it should seem, were flying serpents, Isa. 14. 29.) flew in their faces and poisoned them. They in their pride had lifted themselves up against God and Moses, and now God humbled and mortified them, by making these despicable animals a plague to them. That artillery is now turned against them, which had formerly been made use of in their defence against the Egyptians. He that brought quails to feast them, let them know that he would bring serpents to bite them; the whole creation is at war with those that are in arms against God.

IV. Their repentance and supplication to God under this judgment, v. 7. They confess their fault, we have sinned; they are particular in the confession, we have spoken against the Lord, and against thee; it is to be feared that they would not have owned the sin, if they had not felt the smart; but they relent under the rod; when he slew them, then they sought him. They beg the prayers of Moses for them, as conscious to themselves of their own unworthiness to be heard, and convinced of the great interest which Moses had in heaven. How soon is their tone altered! They who had just before quarrelled with him as their worst enemy, now make their court to him as their best friend, and choose him for their advocate with God. Afflictions often change men's sentiments concerning God's people, and teach them to value those prayers which, at a former period, they had scorned. Moses, to shew that he had heartily forgiven them, blesses them who had cursed him, and prays for them who had despitefully used him. Herein he was a type of Christ, who interceded for his persecutors, and a pattern to us to go and do likewise, and thus to shew that we love our enemies.

V. The wonderful provision which God made for their relief. He did not employ Moses in summoning the judgment, but, that he might recommend him to the good affection of the people, he made him instrumental in their relief, v. 8, 9. God ordered Moses to make the representation of a fiery serpent, which he did in brass, and set it up on a very long pole, so that it might be seen from all parts of the camp, and every one that was stung with a fiery serpent was healed by looking up to that serpent of brass. The people prayed that God would take away the serpents from them, (v. 7.) but God saw fit not to do that: for he gives effectual relief in the best way, though not in our way. Thus those who did not die for their murmuring, yet were made to smart for it, that they might the more feelingly repent and humble themselves for it; they were likewise made to receive their cure from God, by the hand of Moses, that they might be taught, if possible, never again to speak against God and Moses.

This method of cure was altogether miraculous, and the more wonderful if what some naturalists say were true, that looking upon bright and burnished brass is hurtful to those that are stung with fiery serpents. God can bring about his purposes by contrary means. The Jews themselves say that it was not the sight of the brazen serpent that cured them, but in looking up to it, they looked up to God as the Lord that healed them. But there was much of gospel in this appointment. Our Saviour has told us so, (John, 3. 14, 15.) that as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so the Son of man must be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish. Observe then a resemblance,

1. Between their disease and our's. The Devil is the old serpent, a fiery serpent, hence he appears, (Rev. 12. 3.) as a great red dragon. Sin is the biting of this fiery serpent, it is painful to the startled conscience, and poisonous to the seared conscience. Satan's temptations are called his fiery darts, Eph. 6. 16. Lust and passion inflame the soul, so do the terrors of the Almighty, when they set themselves in array. At the last, sin bites like a serpent, and stings like an adder; and even its sweets are turned into the gall of asps.

2. Between their remedy and our's. (1.) It was God himself that devised and prescribed this antidote against the fiery serpents; so our salvation by Christ was the contrivance of Infinite Wisdom; God himself has found the ransom. (2.) It was a very unlikely method of cure; so our salvation by the death of Christ is to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness. It was Moses that lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so the law is a schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, and Moses wrote of him, John, 5. 46. Christ was lifted up by the rulers of the Jews, who were the successors of Moses. (3.) That which cured was shaped in the likeness of that which wounded. So Christ, though perfectly free from sin himself, yet was made in the likeness of sinful flesh; (Rom. 8. 3.) so like, that it was taken for granted, this man was a sinner, John, 9. 24. (4.) The brazen serpent was lifted up; so was Christ—He was lifted up upon the cross, (John, 12. 33, 34.) for he was made a spectacle to the world. He was lifted up by the preaching of the gospel. The word here used for a pole, signifies a banner, or ensign, for Christ crucified stands for an ensign of the people, Isa. 11. 10. Some make the lifting up of the serpent to be a figure of Christ's triumphing over Satan, the old serpent, whose head he bruised, when in his cross he made an open shew of the principalities and powers which he had spoiled and destroyed, Col. 2. 15.

3. Between the application of their remedy and our's. They looked and lived, and we, if we believe, shall not perish; it is by faith that we look unto Jesus, Heb. 12. 2. Look unto me, and be ye saved, Isa. 45. 22. We must be sensible of our wound, and of our danger: by it, receive the record which God has given concerning his Son, and rely upon the assurance he has given us, that we shall be healed and saved by him, if we resign ourselves to his conduct. The brazen serpent's being lifted up would not cure, if it was not looked upon. If any pored on their wound, and would not look up to the brazen serpent, they inevitably died. If they slighted this method of cure, and had recourse to natural medicines, and trusted to them, they justly perished; so, if sinners either despise Christ's righteousness, or despair of benefit by it, their wound will, without doubt, be fatal; but whoever looked up to this healing sign, though from the outmost part of the camp, though with a weak and weeping eye, was certainly healed; so whosoever believes in Christ, though as yet but weak in faith, shall not perish. There are weak brethren, for whom Christ died. Perhaps, for some time after the serpent was set up, the camp of Israel was molested by the fiery serpents; and it is the probable conjecture of some, that they carried this brazen serpent along with them through the rest of their journies, and set it up wherever they encamped, and, when they settled in Canaan, fixed it somewhere within the borders of the land; for it is not likely that the children of Israel went so far off as this was, into the wilderness, to burn incense to it, as we find they did, 2 Kings, 18. 4. Even those that are delivered from the eternal death which is the wages of sin, yet must expect to feel the pain and smart of it, as long as they are here in this world; but, if it be not our own fault, we may have the brazen serpent to accompany us, to be still looked up to upon all occasions, by bearing about with us continually the dying of the Lord Jesus.

10. And the children of Israel set forward, and pitched in Oboth. 11. And they journeyed from Oboth, and pitched at Ije-abarim, in the wilderness which is before Moab, toward the sun-rising. 12. From thence they removed, and pitched in the valley of Zared. 13. From thence they removed, and pitched on the other side of Arnon, which is in the wilderness that cometh out of the coasts of the Amorites: for Arnon is the border of Moab, between Moab and the Amorites. 14. Wherefore it is said in the book of the wars of the LORD, What he did in the Red sea, and in the brooks of Arnon, 15. And at the stream of the brooks that goeth down to the dwelling of Ar, and lieth upon the border of Moab. 16. And from thence they went to Beer: that is the well whereof the LORD spake unto Moses, Gather the people together, and I will give them water. 17. Then Israel sang this song, Spring up, O well; sing ye unto it: 18. The princes digged the well, the nobles of the people digged it, by the direction of the lawgiver, with their staves. And from the wilderness they went to Mattanah: 19. And from Mattanah to Nabaiel: and from Nabaiel to Bamoth: 20. And from Bamoth in the valley, that is in the country of Moab, to the top of Pisgah, which looketh toward Jeshimon.

We have here an account of the several stages and removes of the children of Israel, till they came into the plains of Moab, out of which they at length passed over Jordan into Canaan, as we read in the beginning of Joshua. Natural motions move quicker the nearer they are to their centre. And now they set forward, as the expression is, v. 10. It were well if we would do thus in our way to heaven, rid ground in the latter end of our journey, and the nearer we come to heaven, be so much the more active and abundant in the work of the Lord. Two things especially are observable in the brief account here given of these removes.

1. The wonderful success which God blessed his people with near the brooks of Arnon, v. 13. 15. They had now compassed the land of Edom, which they were not to invade, nor so much as to infest, (Deut. 2. 4, 5.) and were come to the border of Moab. It is well that there are more ways than one to Canaan. The enemies of God's people may retard their passage, but cannot prevent their entrance into the promised rest. Care is taken to let us know that the Israelites in their march religiously observed the orders which God gave them, to use no hostility against the Moabites, (Deut. 2. 9.) because they were the posterity of righteous Lot; therefore they pitched on the other side of Arnon, (v. 13.) that side which was now in the possession of the Amorites, one of the devoted nations, though formerly it had belonged to Moab, as appears here, v. 26, 27. This care of their's not to offer violence to the Moabites is pleaded by Jephthah long afterward, in his remonstrance against the Ammonites, (Judg. 11. 15, &c.) and turned to them for a testimony. What their achievements were, now that they pitched on the banks of the river Arnon, we are not particularly told, but are referred to the book of the wars of the Lord; perhaps that book which was begun with the history of the war with the Amalekites, Exod. 17. 14. Write it (said God) for a memorial in a book; to which were added all the other battles which Israel fought, in order; and among the rest, their actions on the river Arnon, at Vahab in Supkah, as our margin reads it, and other places on that river. Or, it shall be said, (as some read it,) in the rehearsal, or commemoration of the wars of the Lord, what he did in the Red sea, when he brought Israel out of Egypt, and what he did in the brooks of Arnon, just before he brought them into Canaan. Note, In celebrating the memorials of God's favours to us, it is good to observe the series of them, and how divine goodness and mercy have constantly followed us, even from the Red sea to the brooks of Arnon. In every stage of our lives, nay in every step, we should take notice of what God has wrought for us; what he did at such a time, and what in such a place, ought to be distinctly remembered.

2. The wonderful supply which God blessed his people with at Beer, (v. 16.) they pitched in Oboth, which signifies bottles, so called, perhaps, because there they filled their bottles with water, which should last them for some time; but by this time, we may suppose, it was with them as it was with Hagar, (Gen. 21. 15.) The water was spent in the bottle; yet we do not find that they murmured, and therefore God, in compassion to them, brought them to a well of water, to encourage them to wait on him in humble silence and expectation, and to believe that he would graciously take cognizance of their wants, though they did not complain of them. In this world, we do at the best but pitch at Oboth, where our comforts lie in close and scanty vessels; when we come to heaven, we shall remove to Beer, the well of life, the fountain of living waters. Hitherto we have found, when they were supplied with water, they asked it in unjust discontent, and God gave it in just displeasure: but here we find, (1.) That God gave it in love, (v. 16.) Gather the people together, to be witnesses of the wonder, and joint-sharers in the favour, and I will give them water. Before they prayed, God granted, and prevented them with the blessings of his goodness. (2.) That they received it with joy and thankfulness, which made the mercy doubly sweet to them, v. 17. Then they sang this song, to the glory of God, and the encouragement of one another, Spring up, O well; thus they pray that it may spring up, for promised mercies must be fetched in by prayer; they triumph that it does spring up, and meet it with their joyful acclamations; with joy must we draw water out of the wells of salvation, Isa. 12. 3. As the brazen serpent was a figure of Christ, who is lifted up for our cure, so is this well a figure of the Spirit, who is poured forth for our comfort, and from whom flow to us rivers of living waters, John, 7. 38. Does this well spring up in our souls? We should sing to it; take the comfort to ourselves, and give the glory to God; stir up this gift, sing to it, Spring up, O well, thou fountain of gardens, to water my soul, (Cant. 4. 15.) plead the promise, which perhaps alludes to this story, (Isa. 41. 17, 18.) I will make the wilderness wells of water. (3.) That whereas, before, the remembrance of the miracle was perpetuated in the names given to the places, which signified the people's strife and murmuring, now, it was perpetuated in a song of praise, which preserved on record the manner in which it was done, (v. 18.) The princes digged the well, the seventy elders, it is probable, by direction of the lawgiver, that is, Moses, under God, with their staves; that is, with their staves they made holes in the soft and sandy ground, and God caused the water miraculously to spring up in the holes which they made. Thus the pious Israelites long afterward, passing through the valley of Baca, a dry and thirsty place, made wells, and God by rain from heaven filled the pools, Ps. 84. 6.

Observe, [1.] God promised to give them water, but they must open the ground to receive it, and give it vent. God's favours must be expected in the use of such means as lie within our power, but still the excellency of the power is of God. [2.] The nobles of Israel were forward to set their hands to this work, and used their staves, probably, those that were the ensigns of their honour and power, for the public service, and it is upon record to their honour. And we may suppose that it was a great confirmation to them in their offices, and a great comfort to the people, that they were made use of by the divine power, as instruments to this miraculous supply. By this it appeared that the spirit of Moses, who must shortly die, rested in some measure upon the nobles of Israel. Moses did not strike the ground himself, as formerly the rock, but gave them direction to do it, that their staves might share in the honour of his rod, and they might comfortably hope that when he should leave them, yet God would not, but that they also in their generation should be public blessings, and might expect the divine presence with them, as long as they acted by the direction of the lawgiver. For comfort must be looked for only in the way of duty; and if we would share in divine joys, we must carefully follow the divine conduct.

21. And Israel sent messengers unto Sihon king of the Amorites, saying, 22. Let me pass through thy land: we will not turn into the fields, or into the vineyards; we will not drink of the waters of the well: but we will go along by the king's high way, until we be past thy borders. 23. And Sihon would not suffer Israel to pass through his border: but Sihon gathered all his people together, and went out against Israel into the wilderness: and he came to Jahaz, and fought against Israel. 24. And Israel smote him with the edge of the sword, and possessed his land from Arnon unto Jabbok, even unto the children of Ammon: for the border of the children of Ammon was strong. 25. And Israel took all these cities: and Israel dwelt in all the cities of the Amorites, in Heshbon, and in all the villages thereof. 26. For Heshbon was the city of Sihon the king of the Amorites, who had fought against the former king of Moab, and taken all his land out of his hand, even unto Arnon. 27. Wherefore they that speak in proverbs say, Come into Heshbon, let the city of Sihon be built and prepared: 28. For there is a fire gone out of Heshbon, a flame from the city of Sihon: it hath consumed Ar of Moab, and the lords of the high-places of Arnon. 29. Woe to thee, Moab! thou art undone, O people of Chemosh: he hath given his sons that escaped, and his daughters, into captivity unto Sihon king of the Amorites. 30. We have shot at them; Heshbon is perished even unto Dibon, and we have laid them waste even unto Nophah, which reacheth unto Medaba. 31. Thus Israel dwelt in the land of the Amorites. 32. And Moses sent to spy out Jaazer, and they took the villages thereof, and drove out the Amorites that were there. 33. And they turned and went up by the way of Bashan: and Og the king of Bashan went out against them, he, and all his people, to the battle at Edrei. 34. And the Lord said unto Moses, Fear him not: for I have delivered him into thy hand, and all his people, and his land; and thou shalt do to him as thou didst unto Sihon king of the Amorites, which dwelt at Heshbon. 35. So they smote him, and his sons, and all his people, until there was none left him alive: and they possessed his land.

We have here an account of the victories obtained by Israel over Sihon and Og, which must be distinctly considered, not only because they are distinctly related, but because long afterward the memorial of them is distinctly celebrated, and they are severally assigned as instances of everlasting mercy; he slew Sihon king of the Amorites, for his mercy endureth for ever; and Og the king of Bashan, for his mercy endureth for ever, Ps. 136. 19, 20.

1. Israel sent a peaceable message to Sihon king of the Amorites, (v. 21.) but received an unpeaceable return, worse than that of the Edomites to the like message, ch. 20. 18, 20. For the Edomites only refused them a passage, and stood upon their own defence to keep them out; but Sihon went out with his forces against Israel in the wilderness, out of his own borders, without any provocation given him, (v. 23.) and so ran himself upon his own ruin. Jephthah intimates that he was prompted by his politics to do this; (Judg. 11. 20.) Sihon trusted not Israel to pass through his coast; but his politics deceived him, for Moses says, God hardened his spirit, and made his heart obstinate, that he might deliver him into the hand of Israel, Deut. 2. 30. The enemies of God's church are often infatuated in those very counsels which they think most wisely taken. Sihon's army was routed, and not only so, but all his country came into the possession of Israel, v. 24, 25.

This seizure is justified, 1. Against the Amorites themselves, for they were the aggressors, and provoked the Israelites to battle; and yet, perhaps, that would not have been sufficient to entitle Israel to their land, but God himself, the King of nations, the Lord of the whole earth, had given them a grant of it. The Amorites formed one of the devoted nations whose land God had promised to Abraham and his seed, which promise should be performed, when the iniquity of the Amorites should be full, Gen. 15. 16. Jephthah insists upon this grant as their title, Judg. 11. 23, 24. The victory which God gave them over the Amorites, put them in possession, and then the promise made to their fathers, having given them a right, by virtue of that, they kept possession.

2. Against the Moabites, who had formerly been the lords-proprietors of this country; if they should ever lay claim to it, and should plead that God himself had provided that none of their land should be given to Israel for a possession, (Deut. 2. 9.)

Moses here furnishes posterity with a replication to their plea, and Jephthah makes use of it against the Amorites 260 years after, when Israel's title to this country was questioned. (1.) The justification itself is, that though, it was true, this country had belonged to the Moabites, yet the Amorites had taken it from them some time before, and were now in full and quiet possession of it, v. 26. The Israelites did not take it out of the hands of the Moabites, they had before lost it to the Amorites, and were constrained to give up their pretensions to it; and when Israel had taken it from the Amorites, they were under no obligation to restore it to the Moabites, whose title to it was long since extinguished. See here the uncertainty of worldly possessions, how often they change their owners, and how soon we may be deprived of them, even when we think ourselves most sure of them; they make themselves wings. It is our wisdom therefore to secure the good part, which cannot be taken away from us. See also the wisdom of the Divine Providence and its perfect foresight, by which, preparation is made long before for the accomplishment of all God's purposes in their season. This country being designed in due time for Israel, it is beforehand put into the hand of the Amorites, who little think that they have it but as trustees, till Israel comes of age, and then must surrender it. We understand not the vast reaches of Providence, but known unto God are all his works, as appears in this instance, that he set the bounds of the people, according to the number of the children of Israel, Deut. 32. 8. All that land which he intended for his chosen people, he put into the possession of the devoted nations, that were to be driven out. (2.) For proof of the allegation, he refers to the authentic records of the country, for so their proverbs, or songs, were, one of which he quotes some passages out of, (v. 27..30.) which sufficiently proves what is vouched for, namely, [1.] That such and such places that are here named, though they had been in the possession of the Moabites, were by right of war become the dominion of Sihon king of the Amorites. Heshbon is become his city, and he obtained such a quiet possession of it, that it was built and prepared for him, (v. 27.) and the country of Dibon and Nophah was likewise subdued, and annexed to the kingdom of the Amorites, v. 30. [2.] That the Moabites were utterly disabled ever to regain the possession. Even Ar of Moab, though not taken or attempted by Sihon, but still remaining the metropolis of Moab, yet was so wasted by this loss that it would never be able to make head, v. 28. The Moabites were undone, and even Chemosh their god had given them up as unable to rescue them out of the hands of Sihon, v. 29. By all this it appears that the Moabites' claim to this country was barred for ever. There may be a further reason for inserting this Amorite poem, namely, to shew that the triumphing of the wicked is short. They that had conquered the Moabites, and insulted over them, are now themselves conquered and insulted over by the Israel of God. It is very probable that the same Sihon king of the Amorites, that had got this country from the Moabites, now lost it to the Israelites; for though it is said to be taken from a former king of Moab, (v. 26.) yet not by a former king of the Amorites; and then it shews how sometimes justice makes men to see the loss of that which they got by violence, and were puffed up with the gain of. They are exalted but for a little while, Job, 24. 24.

II. Og king of Bashan, instead of being warned by the fate of his neighbours to make peace with Israel, is instigated by it to make war with them, which proves in like manner to be his destruction. Og was also an Amorite, and therefore, perhaps, thought himself better able to deal with Israel than his neighbours were, and more likely to prevail, because of his own gigantic strength and stature, which Moses takes notice of, (Deut. 3. 11.) where he gives a more full account of this story. Here observe, 1. That the Amorite begins the war, v. 33. He went out to battle against Israel. His country was very rich and pleasant, Bashan was famous for the best timber, (witness the oaks of Bashan,) and the best breed of cattle, witness the bulls and kine of Bashan, and the lambs and rams of that country, which are celebrated, Deut. 32. 14. Wicked men do their utmost to secure themselves and their possessions against the judgments of God, but all in vain, when their day comes, on which they must fall. 2. That God interests himself in the cause, bids Israel not to fear this threatening force, and promises a complete victory, "I have delivered him into thy hand, (v. 34.) the thing is as good as done already, it is all thine own, enter and take possession." Giants are but worms before God's power. 3. That Israel is more than a conqueror, not only routs the enemies' army, but gains the enemies' country, which afterward was part of the inheritance of the two tribes and a half, that were first seated on the other side Jordan. God gave Israel these successes, while Moses was yet with them, both for his comfort, that he might see the beginning of that glorious work, which he must not live to see the finishing of; and for the encouragement of the people, in the war of Canaan under Joshua. Though this was to them in comparison but as the day of small things, yet it was an earnest of great things.

CHAP. XXII.

At this chapter begins the famous story of Balak and Balaam, their attempt to curse Israel, and the baffling of that attempt; God's people are long afterward bid to remember what Balak the king of Moab consulted, and what Balaam the son of Beor answered him, that they might know the righteousness of the Lord, Mic. 6. 5. In this chapter we have, I. Balak's fear of Israel, and the plot he had to get them cursed, v. 1..4. II. The embassy he sent to Balaam, a conjurer, to fetch him for that purpose, and the disappointment he met with in that first embassy, v. 5..14. III. Balaam's coming to him upon his second message, v. 15..21. IV. The opposition Balaam met with by the way, v. 22..35. V. The interview at length between Balak and Balaam v. 36..41.

1. AND the children of Israel set forward, and pitched in the plains of Moab on this side Jordan by Jericho. 2. And Balak the son of Zippor saw all that Israel had done to the Amorites. 3. And Moab was sore afraid of the people, because they were many: and Moab was distressed because of the children of Israel. 4. And Moab said unto the elders of Midian, Now shall this company lick up all that are round about us, as the ox licketh up the grass of the field. And Balak the son of Zippor was king of the Moabites at that time. 5. He sent messengers therefore unto Balaam the son of Beor to Pethor, which is by the river of the land of the children of his people, to call him, saying, Behold, there is a people come out from Egypt: behold, they cover the face of the earth, and they abide over against me. 6. Come now therefore, I pray thee, curse me this people; for they are too mighty for me: peradventure I shall prevail, that we may smite them, and that I may drive them out of the land: for I wot that he whom thou blessest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed. 7. And the elders of Moab and the elders of Midian departed with the rewards of divination in their hand; and they came unto Balaam, and spake unto him the words of Balak. 8. And he said unto them, Lodge here this night, and I will bring you word again, as the LORD shall speak unto me. And the princes of Moab abode with Balaam. 9. And God came unto Balaam, and said, What men are these with thee? 10. And Balaam said unto God, Balak the son of Zippor, king of Moab, hath sent unto me, saying, 11. Behold, there is a people come out of Egypt, which covereth the face of the earth: Come now, curse me them; peradventure I shall be able to overcome them, and drive them out. 12. And God said unto Balaam, Thou shalt not go with them; thou shalt not curse the people: for they are blessed. 13. And Balaam rose up in the morning, and said unto the princes of Balak, Get you into your land: for the LORD refuseth to give me leave to go with you. 14. And the princes of Moab rose up, and they went unto Balak, and said, Balaam refuseth to come with us.

The children of Israel have at length finished their wanderings in the wilderness, out of which they went up, (ch. 21. 18.) and are now encamped in the plains of Moab near Jordan, where they continued till they passed through Jordan under Joshua, after the death of Moses. Now we have here,

I. The fright which the Moabites were in upon the approach of Israel, v. 2. . 4. They needed not to fear any harm from them, if they knew (and it is probable Moses let them know) the orders God had given Israel, not to contend with the Moabites, nor to use any hostility against them, Deut. 2. 9. But if they had any notice of this, they were jealous that it was but a sham, to make them secure, that they might be the more easily conquered. Notwithstanding the old friendship between Abraham and Lot, the Moabites resolved to ruin Israel if they could, and therefore they will take it for granted, without any ground for the suspicion, that Israel resolves to ruin them. Thus it is common for those that design mischief to pretend that mischief is designed against them; and their groundless jealousies must be the colour of their causeless malice. They hear of their triumphs over the Amorites, (v. 2.) and think that their own house is in danger, when their neighbour's is on fire. They observe their multitudes, (v. 3.) They were many; and hence infer how easily they would conquer their country, and all about them, if some speedy and effectual course were not taken to stop the progress of their victorious arms; they shall lick up, or devour us, and all that are round about us, as speedily and irresistibly as the ox eats up the grass, (v. 4.) owning himself to be an unequal match for so formidable an enemy. Therefore they were sore afraid and distressed themselves; thus were the wicked in great fear where no fear was, Ps. 53. 5. These fears they communicated to their neighbours, the elders of Midian, that some measures might be concerted between them for their common safety; for, if the kingdom of Moab fall, the republic of Midian cannot stand long. The Moabites, if they had pleased, might have made a good use of the advances of Israel, and their successes against the Amorites; they had reason to rejoice, and give God and Israel thanks for freeing them from the threatening power of Sihon king of the Amorites, who had taken from them part of their country, and was likely to over-run the rest. They had reason likewise to have courted Israel's friendship, and to have come in to their assistance; but, having forsaken the religion of their father Lot, and being sunk into idolatry, they hated the people of the God of Abraham, and were justly infatuated in their counsels, and given up to distress.

II. The project which the king of Moab formed, to get the people of Israel cursed, that is, to set God against them, who, he perceived, hitherto fought for them. He trusted more to his arts than to his arms, and had a notion, that if he could but get some prophet or other, with his powerful charms, to imprecate evil upon them, and to pronounce a blessing upon himself and his forces, that then, though otherwise too weak, he should be able to deal with them. This notion arose, 1. Out of the remains of some religion; for it owns a dependence upon some visible sovereign powers that rule in the affairs of the children of men, and determine them, and an obligation upon us to make application to these powers. 2. Out of the rums of the true religion; for if the Midianites and Moabites had not wretchedly degenerated from the faith and worship of their pious ancestors, Abraham and Lot, they could not have imagined it possible, with their curses, to do any mischief to a people who alone adhered to the service of the true God, from whose service they had revolted.

III. The court which he made to Balaam the son of Beor, a famous conjurer, to engage him to curse Israel. This Balaam lived a great way off, in that country from whence Abraham came, and where Laban lived; but though it was probable that there were many nearer home that were pretenders to divination, yet none had so great a reputation for success as Balaam, and Balak will employ the best he can hear of, though he send a great way for him, so much is his heart upon this project. And, to gain him, 1. He makes him his friend; complaining to him, as his confidant, of the danger he was in from the numbers and neighbourhood of the camp of Israel, (v. 5.) They cover the face of the earth, and they abide over against me. 2. In effect, he makes him his god, by the great power he attributes to his word; He whom thou blessest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed, v. 6. The learned Bishop Patrick inclines to think, with many of the Jewish writers, that Balaam had been a great prophet, who, for the accomplishment of his predictions, and the answers of his prayers, both for good and evil, had been looked upon justly as a man of great interest with God; but that, growing proud and covetous, God departed from him, and then, to support his sinking credit, he betook himself to diabolical arts. He is called a prophet, (2 Pet. 2. 16.) because he had been one, or, perhaps, he had raised his reputation from the first by his magical charms, as Simon Magus, who bewitched the people so far, that he was called The great power of God, Acts. 8. 10. Curses pronounced by God's prophets, in the name of the Lord, have wonderful effects, as Noah's, Gen. 9. 25. Elisha's, 2 Kings. 2. 24. But the curse causeless shall not come; (Prov. 26. 2.) no more than Goliath's, when he curse David by his gods, 1 Sam. 17. 43. Let us desire to have the prayers of God's ministers and people for us, and dread having them against us, for they are greatly regarded by him who blesseth indeed, and curseth indeed. But Balak cannot rely upon these compliments as sufficient to prevail with Balaam, the main inducement is yet behind, (v. 7.) they took the rewards of divination in their hand, the wages of unrighteousness, which he loved, 2 Pet. 2. 15.

IV. The restraint God lays upon Balaam, forbidding him to curse Israel. It is very probable, that Balaam, being a curious inquisitive man, was no stranger to Israel's case and character, but had heard that God was with them of a truth; so that he ought to have given the messengers their answer immediately, that he would never curse a people whom God had blessed; but he lodges the messengers, and takes a night's time to consider what he should do, and to receive instructions from God, v. 8. When we enter into a parley with temptations, we are in great danger of being overcome by them. In the night God comes to him, probably in a dream, and inquires what business those strangers had with him; He knows it, but he will know it from him. Balaam gives him an account of their errand; (v. 9. . 11.) and God thereupon charges him not to go with them, nor attempt to curse that blessed people, v. 12. Thus God sometimes, for the preservation of his people, was pleased to speak to bad men, as to Abimelech, (Gen. 20. 3.) and to Laban, Gen. 31. 24. And we read of some that were workers of iniquity, and yet in Christ's name prophesied, and did many wondrous works. Balaam is charged not only not to go to Balak, but not to offer to curse this people, which he might have attempted at a distance; and the reason is given, they are blessed. This was part of the blessing of Abraham, (Gen. 12. 3.) I will curse him that curseth thee. So that an attempt to curse them would be not only fruitless, but perilous. Israel had often provoked God in the wilderness, yet he will not suffer their enemies to curse them, for he rewards them not according to their iniquities. The blessedness of those whose sin is covered comes with them, Rom. 4. 6, 7.

V. The return of the messengers without Balaam. 1. Balaam is not faithful in returning God's answer to the messengers, v. 13. He only tells them, The Lord refuseth to give me leave to go with you; he does not tell them, as he ought to have done, that Israel was a blessed people, and must by no means be cursed, for then the design had been crushed, and the temptation had not been renewed; but he does, in effect, desire them to give his humble service to Balak, and let him know that he applauded his project, and would have been very glad to gratify him, but that truly he has the character of a prophet, and must not go without leave from God, which he has not yet obtained, and therefore for the present he must be excused. Note, Those are a fair mark for Satan's temptation that speak diminishingly of divine prohibitions, as if they amounted to no more than the denial of a permission, and as if to go against God's law were only to go without his leave. 2. The messengers are not faithful in returning Balaam's answer to Balak; all the account they give of it, is, Balaam refuseth to come with us; (v. 14.) intimating that he only wanted more courtship, and higher proffers: but they are not willing that Balak should know that God had signified his disallowance of the attempt. Thus are great men wretchedly abused by the flatteries of those about them, who do all they can to prevent their seeing their own faults and follies.

15. And Balak sent yet again princes, more, and more honourable than they. 16. And they came to Balaam, and said to him, Thus saith Balak the son of Zippor, Let nothing, I pray thee, hinder thee from coming unto me: 17. For I will promote thee unto very great honour, and I will do whatsoever thou sayest unto me: Come therefore, I pray thee, curse me this people. 18. And Balaam answered and said unto the servants of Balak, If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the word of the LORD my God, to do less or more. 19. Now therefore, I pray you, tarry ye also here this night, that I may know what the LORD will say unto me more. 20. And God came unto Balaam at night, and said unto him, If the men come to call thee, rise up, and go with them; but yet the word which I shall say unto thee, that shalt thou do. 21. And Balaam rose up in the morning, and saddled his ass, and went with the princes of Moab

We have here a second embassy sent to Balaam, to fetch him over to curse Israel. It were well for us, if we were as earnest and constant in prosecuting a good work, notwithstanding disappointments, as Balak was in pursuing this ill design. The enemies of the church are restless and unwearied in their attempts against it; but he that sits in heaven laughs at them.

Observe,

1. The temptation Balak laid before Balaam; he contrived to make this assault more vigorous than the former. It is very probable that he sent double money in the hands of his messengers; but, beside that, now he tempted him with honours, laid a bait not only for his covetousness, but for his pride and ambition. How earnestly should we beg of God daily: to mortify in us these two limbs of the old man! Those that know how to look with a holy contempt upon worldly wealth and preferment, will find it not so hard a matter, as most men do, to keep a good conscience. See how artfully Balak managed the temptation. 1. The messengers he sent were more, and more honourable, v. 15. He sent to this conjurer with as great respect and deference to his quality, as if he had been a sovereign prince; apprehending, perhaps, that Balaam had thought himself slighted in the fewness and meanness of the former messengers. 2. The request was very urgent; this powerful prince becomes a suitor to him, Let nothing, I pray thee, hinder thee, (v. 16.) no, not God, or conscience, or any fear either of sin or shame." 3. The proffers were high; I will promote thee to very great honour among the princes of Moab; nay, he gives him a blank, and he shall write his own terms, I will do whatsoever thou sayest, that is, "I will give thee whatever thou desirest, and observe whatever thou orderest; thy word shall be a law to me," v. 17. Thus sinners stick at no pains, spare no cost, and care not how low they stoop, for the gratifying either of their luxury, or of their malice; shall we then be stiff and strait-handed in our compliance with the laws of virtue? God forbid.

II. Balaam's seeming resistance of, but real yielding to, this temptation. We may here discern in Balaam a struggle between his convictions and his corruptions. 1. His convictions charged him to adhere to the command of God, and he spoke their language, v. 18. Nor could any man have said better; If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, and that is more than he can give, or I can ask, I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God. See how honourably he speaks of God, he is Jehovah, my God. Note, Many call God their's, that are not his, not truly because not only his; they swear by the Lord, and by Malcham. See how respectfully he speaks of the word of God, as one resolved to stick to it, and in nothing to vary from it, and how slightly of the wealth of this world, as if gold and silver were nothing to him in comparison with the favour of God; and yet, at the same time, the Searcher of hearts knew that he loved the wages of unrighteousness. Note, It is an easy thing for bad men to speak very good words, and with their mouth to make a shew of piety. There is no judging of men by their words, God knows the heart. 2. His corruptions at the same time strongly inclined him to go contrary to the command. He seemed to refuse the temptation, v. 18. But even then he expressed no abhorrence of it, as Christ did when he had the kingdoms of the world offered him, Get thee hence, Satan: and as Peter did, when Simon Magus offered him money; Thy money perish with thee. But it appears (v. 19.) that he had a strong inclination to accept the proffer; for he would further attend, to know what God would say to him, hoping that he might alter his mind, and give him leave to go. This was a vile reflection upon God Almighty, as if he could change his mind, and now, at last, suffer those to be cursed whom he had pronounced blessed; and as if he would be brought to allow of that which he had already declared to be evil. Surely he thought God altogether such a one as himself. He had already been told what the will of God was, in which he ought to have acquiesced, and not to have desired a re-hearing of that cause which was already so plainly determined. Note, It is a very great affront to God, and a certain evidence of the dominion of corruption in the heart, to beg leave to sin.

III. The permission God gave him to go, v. 20. God came to him, probably, by an angel, and told him he might, if he pleased, go with Balak's messengers. So he gave him up to his own heart's lusts. "Since thou hast such a mind to go, even go, yet know that the journey thou undertakest shall not be for thine honour; for, though thou hast leave to go, thou shalt not, as thou hopest, have leave to curse, for the word which I shall say unto thee, that thou shalt do." Note, God has wicked men in a chain; hitherto they shall come by his permission, but no further than he does permit them. Thus he makes the wrath of man to praise him, yet, at the same time, restrains the remainder of it. It was in anger that God said to Balaam, "Go with them," and we have reason to think that Balaam himself so understood it, for we do not find him pleading this allowance, when God reproved him for going. Note

As God sometimes denies the prayers of his people in love, so sometimes he grants the desires of the wicked in wrath.

IV. His setting out in the journey, v. 21. God gave him leave to go, if the men called him, but he was so fond of the journey, that we do not find he stayed for their calling him, but he himself rose up in the morning, got every thing ready with all speed, and went with the princes of Moab, who were proud enough that they had carried their point. The apostle describes Balaam's sin here to be, that he ran greedily into an error for reward, Jude, 11. The love of money is the root of all evil.

22. And God's anger was kindled because he went: and the angel of the LORD stood in the way for an adversary against him. Now he was riding upon his ass, and his two servants were with him.

23. And the ass saw the angel of the LORD standing in the way, and his sword drawn in his hand: and the ass turned aside out of the way, and went into the field: and Balaam smote the ass, to turn her into the way. 24. But the angel of the LORD stood in a path of the vineyards, a wall being on this side, and a wall on that side. 25. And when the ass saw the angel of the LORD, she thrust herself unto the wall, and crushed Balaam's foot against the wall: and he smote her again. 26. And the angel of the LORD went further, and stood in a narrow place, where was no way to turn either to the right hand or to the left. 27. And when the ass saw the angel of the LORD, she fell down under Balaam: and Balaam's anger was kindled, and he smote the ass with a staff. 28. And the LORD opened the mouth of the ass, and she said unto Balaam, What have I done unto thee, that thou hast smitten me these three times? 29. And Balaam said unto the ass, Because thou hast mocked me: I would there were a sword in mine hand, for now would I kill thee. 30. And the ass said unto Balaam, Am not I thine ass, upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine unto this day? was I ever wont to do so unto thee? And he said, Nay. 31. Then the LORD opened the eyes of Balaam, and he saw the angel of the LORD standing in the way, and his sword drawn in his hand: and he bowed down his head, and fell flat on his face. 32. And the angel of the LORD said unto him, Wherefore hast thou smitten thine ass these three times? Behold, I went out to withstand thee, because thy way is perverse before me. 33. And the ass saw me, and turned from me these three times: unless she had turned from me, surely now also I had slain thee, and saved her alive. 34. And Balaam said unto the angel of the LORD, I have sinned; for I knew not that thou stoodest in the way against me: now therefore, if it displease thee, I will get me back again. 35. And the angel of the LORD said unto Balaam, Go with the men: but only the word that I shall speak unto thee, that thou shalt speak. So Balaam went with the princes of Balak.

We have here an account of the opposition God gave to Balaam in his journey toward Moab; probably the princes were gone before, or gone some other way, and Balaam had pointed out where he would meet them, or where they should stay for him, for we read nothing of them in this part of our narrative: only that Balaam, like a person of some quality, was attended with his two men; honour enough, one would think, for such a man, he needed not to be beholden to Balak for promotion.

I. Here is God's displeasure against Balaam for undertaking this journey; God's anger was kindled because he went, v. 22. Note, 1. The sin of sinners is not to be thought the less provoking to God, because he permits it. We must not think that, because God does not by his providence restrain men from sin, therefore he approves of it, or that it is therefore not hateful to him; he suffers sin, and yet is angry at it. 2. Nothing is more displeasing to God than malicious designs against his people; he that touches them touches the apple of his eye.

II. The way God took to let Balaam know his displeasure against him; An angel stood in the way for an adversary. Now God fulfilled his promise to Israel, (Exod. 23. 22.) I will be an enemy to thine enemies. The holy angels are adversaries to sin, and perhaps are employed more than we are aware of in preventing it, particularly in opposing those that have any ill designs against God's church and people, for whom Michael our prince stands up, Dan. 12. 1, 10, 21. What a comfort is this to all that wish well to the Israel of God, that he never suffers wicked men to form any attempt against them, without sending his holy angels forth to break this attempt, and secure his little ones. When the prophet saw the four horns that scattered Judah, at the same time he saw four carpenters that were to fray those horns, Zech. 1. 18, &c. When the enemy comes in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord will lift up a standard against him. This angel was an adversary to Balaam, because Balaam counted him his adversary; otherwise these are really our best friends, and we are so to reckon them, that stop our progress in a sinful way. The angel stood with his sword drawn; (v. 23.) a flaming sword, like that in the hands of the cherub, (Gen. 3. 24.) turning every way. Note, The holy angels are at war with those with whom God is angry, for they are the ministers of his justice.

Balaam has notice given him of God's displeasure, 1. By the ass, and that did not startle him. The ass saw the angel, v. 23. How vainly did Balaam boast that he was a man whose eyes were open, and that he saw the visions of the Almighty, (ch. 24. 3, 4.) when the ass he rode on saw more than he did, his eyes being blinded with covetousness and ambition, and dazzled with the rewards of divination. Note, Many have God against them, and his holy angels, but are not aware of it. The ass knows his owner, sees his danger, but Balaam does not know, does not consider, Isa. 1. 3. Lord, when thy hand is lifted up, they will not see. Let none be puffed up with a conceit of visions and revelations, when even an ass saw an angel; yet let those be ashamed of their own sottishness, worse than that of the beasts that perish, who, when they are told of the sword of God's wrath drawn against them, while they persist in wicked ways, yet will go on; the ass understood the law of self-preservation better than so; for, to save both herself and her senseless rider, (1.) She turned aside out of the way, v. 23. Balaam should have taken the hint of this, and considered whether he was not out of the way of his duty; but, instead of that, he beat her into the way again. Thus they who by wilful sin are running headlong into perdition are angry at those that would prevent their ruin. (2.) She had not gone much further, before she sees the angel again, and then, to avoid him, runs up to a wall, and crushes her rider's foot, v. 24, 25. How many ill accidents are we liable to, in travelling upon the road, from which if we are preserved, we must own our obligations to the Divine Providence, which by the ministry of angels keeps us in all our ways, lest we dash our foot against a stone; but if we at any time meet with a disaster, it should put us upon inquiring whether our way be right in the sight of God or no. The crushing of Balaam's foot, though it was the saving of his life, provoked him so much, that he swears his ass the second time. So angry are we apt to be at that which, though a present uneasiness, yet is a real kindness. (3.) Upon the next encounter with the angel, the ass fell down under Balaam, v. 26, 27. He ought to have considered that there was certainly something extraordinary in this; for his ass was not restive, nor did she use to serve him thus; but it is common for those whose hearts are fully set in them to do evil, to push on violently, and break through all the difficulties which Providence lays in their way to give check to them, and to stop them in their career. Balaam the third time smote his ass, though she had now done him the best piece of service that ever she did him, saving him from the sword of the angel, and by her falling down teaching him to do likewise. (4.) When all this would not work upon him, God opened the mouth of the ass, and she spoke to him once and again; and yet neither did this move him, (v. 28.) The Lord opened the mouth of the ass. This was a great miracle, quite above the power of nature, and wrought by the power of the God of nature; who made man's mouth, and taught him to speak, for otherwise (since we learn to speak purely by imitation, and therefore they that are born deaf are consequently dumb) the first man had never spoken, nor any of his seed. He that made man speak, could, when he pleased, make the ass to speak with man's voice, 2 Pet. 2. 16. Here Mr. Ainsworth observes, that the Devil, when he tempted our first parents to sin, employed a subtle serpent; but that God, when he would convince Balaam, employed a silly ass, a creature dull and sottish to a proverb; for Satan corrupts men's minds by the craftiness of those that lie in wait to deceive, but Christ has chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise. By a dumb ass God rebukes the madness of the prophet, for he will never want reprovers, but, when he pleases, can make the stones cry out as witnesses to him, Luke, 19. 40. Hab. 2. 11. [1.] The ass complained of Balaam's cruelty, (v. 28.) What have I done unto thee, that thou hast smitten me? Note, The righteous God will not see the meanest and weakest abused; but either they shall be enabled to speak in their own defence, or he will some way or other speak for them. If God would not suffer a beast to be wronged, much less a man, a Christian, a child of his own. We cannot open the mouth of the dumb, as God did here, but we may and must open our mouth for the dumb, Prov. 31. 8. Job, 31. 13. The ass's complaint was just, What have I done? Note, When we are prompted to smite any with hand or tongue, we should consider what they have done unto us, and what provocation they have given us. We hear it not, but thus the whole creation groans, being burthened, Rom. 8. 22. It was much that Balaam was not astonished to hear his ass speak, and put to confusion; but some think that it was no new thing to him (being a conjurer) to be thus spoken to by his familiars; others rather think that his brutish headstrong passion so blinded him, that he could not observe or consider the strangeness of the thing. Nothing besots men worse than unbridled anger. Balaam in his fury wishes he had a sword to kill his ass with, v. 29. See his impotency; can he think by his curses to do mischief to Israel, that has it not in his power to kill his own ass? This he cannot do, yet he fain would; and what would he get by that, but make himself so much the poorer, (as many do,) to gratify his passion and revenge? Such was the madness of this false prophet. Here Bishop Hall observes, It is ill falling into the hands of those whom the brute-creatures find unmerciful; for a good man regardeth the life of his beast. [2.] The ass reasoned with him, v. 30. God enabled not only a dumb creature to speak, but a dull creature to speak to the purpose. Three things she argues with him from: First, His propriety in her; Am not I thine ass? Note, 1. God has given to man a dominion over the creatures; they are delivered into his hand to be used, and put under his feet to be ruled. 2. Even wicked people have a title to the possessions God gives to them, which they are not to be wronged of. 3. The dominion God has given us over the creatures is a good reason why we should not abuse them. We are their lords, and therefore must not be tyrants. Secondly, Her servicableness to him; on which thou hast ridden. Note, It is good for us often to consider how useful the inferior creatures are, and have been, to us, that we may be thankful to God, and tender of them. Thirdly, That she was not wont to do so by him, and had never before crushed his foot, or fallen down under him; he might therefore conclude there was something more than ordinary that made her do so now. Note, 1. The rare recurrence of an offence should moderate our displeasure against an offender. 2. When creatures depart from their wonted obedience to us, we should inquire the cause within ourselves, and be humbled for our sin.

2. Balaam at length has notice of God's displeasure, by the angel, and that did startle him. When God opened his eyes, he saw the angel, (v. 31.) and then he himself fell flat upon his face, in reverence of that glorious messenger, and in fear of the sword he saw in his hand. God has many ways of breaking and bringing down the hard and unhumiliated heart. (1.) The angel reproved him for his outrageousness; (v. 32, 33.) Wherefore hast thou smitten thine ass? Whether we consider it or no, it is certain that God will call us to account for the abuses done to his creatures. Nay, he shews him how much more reason he had to smite upon his breast, and to condemn himself, than to fly out thus against his ass; "Thy way is perverse before me, and then how canst thou expect to prosper?" And how much wiser his ass was than himself, and how much beholden he was to her that she turned aside; it was for his safety, and not for her own, for, had she gone on, he had been slain, and she had been saved alive. Note, When our eyes are opened, we shall see what danger we are in, in a sinful way; and how much it was for our advantage to be crossed in it, and what fools we were to quarrel with our crosses, which helped to save our lives. (2.) Balaam then seemed to relent; (v. 34.) "I have sinned; sinned in undertaking this journey, sinned in pushing on so violently;" but he excuses it with this, that he saw not the angel; yet, now that he did see him, he was willing to go back again. That which was displeasing to God, was not so much his going, as his going with a malicious design against Israel, and a secret hope, that, notwithstanding the proviso with which his permission was clogged, he might prevail to curse them, and to gratify Balak, and get preferment under him. It does not appear that he is sensible of this wickedness of his heart, or willing to own it; but, if he finds he cannot go forward, he will be content (since there is no remedy) to go back. Here is no sign that his heart is turned, but, if his hands are tied, he cannot help it. Thus many leave their sins, only because their sins have left them. There seems to be a reformation of the life, but what will that avail, if there be no renovation of the heart? (3.) The angel however continued his permission; (v. 35.) "Go with the men. Go, if thou hast a mind to be made a fool of, and to be ashamed before Balak, and all the princes of Moab; Go, only the word that I shall speak unto thee, that thou shalt speak, whether thou wilt or no." For this seems not to be a precept, but a prediction of the event, that he should not only not be able to curse Israel, but should be forced to bless them; which would be more for the glory of God, and his own confusion, than if he had turned back. Thus God gave him fair warning, but he would not take it, he went with the princes of Balak. For the iniquity of Balaam's covetousness God was wroth, and smote him, but he went on forwardly, Isa. 57. 17.

36. And when Balak heard that Balaam was come, he went out to meet him unto a city of Moab, which is in the border of Arnon, which is in the utmost coast. 37. And Balak said unto Balaam, Did I not earnestly send unto thee to call thee? wherefore camest thou not unto me? am I not able indeed to promote thee to honour? 38. And Balaam said unto Balak, Lo, I am come unto thee: have I now any power at all to say any thing? the word that God putteth in my mouth, that shall I speak. 39. And Balaam went with Balak, and they came unto Kirjath-Huzoth. 40. And Balak offered oxen and sheep, and sent to Balaam, and to the princes that were with him. 41. And it came to pass on the morrow, that Balak took Balaam, and brought him up into the high places of Baal, that thence he might see the utmost part of the people.

We have here the meeting between Balak and Balaam, confederate enemies to God's Israel; but here they seem to differ in their expectations of the success.

1. Balak speaks of it with confidence, not doubting but to gain his point, now that Balaam was come. In expectation of this, he went out to meet him, even to the utmost border of his country, (v. 36.) partly to gratify his own impatient desire to see one he had such great expectations from, and partly to do honour to Balaam, and so to engage him with his utmost power to serve him. See what respect heathen princes paid to those that had but the name and face of prophets, and pretended to have any interest in heaven; and how welcome one was that came with his mouth full of curses. What a shame is it, then, that the ambassadors of Christ are so little respected by most, so much despised by some, and that they are so coldly entertained, who bring tidings of peace and a blessing! Balak has now nothing to complain of, but that Balaam did not come sooner, v. 37. And he thinks that he should have considered both the importunity Balak had used, did I not earnestly send to thee? (and the importunity of people inferior to kings has prevailed with many against their inclinations,) and that he should also have considered Balak's intentions concerning him, Am not I able to promote thee to honour? Balak, as king, was in his own kingdom the fountain of honour, and Balaam should have his choice of all the preferments that were in his gift; he therefore thinks himself affronted by Balaam's delays, which looks as if he thought the honours he prepared not worthy his acceptance. Note, Promotion to honour is a very tempting bait to many people; and it were well if we would be drawn into the service of God by the honour he sets before us. Why do we delay to come unto him? Is not he able to promote us to honour? 2. Balaam speaks doubtfully of the issue, and bids Balak not depend too much upon him, (v. 38.) Have I now any power at all to say any thing? I am come, but what the nearer am I? Gladly would I curse Israel; but I must not, I cannot, God will not suffer me." He seems to speak with vexation at the hook in his nose, and the bridle in his jaws, such as Sennacherib was tied up with, Isa. 37. 29. 3. They address themselves with all speed to the business. Balaam is nobly entertained over night, a sacrifice of thanksgiving is offered to the gods of Moab, for the safe arrival of this welcome guest, and he is treated with a feast upon the sacrifice, v. 40. And the next morning, that no time might be lost, Balak takes Balaam in his chariot to the high-places of his kingdom, not only because their holiness, (such as it was,) he thought, might give some advantage to his divinations, but their height might give him a convenient prospect of the camp of Israel, which was to be the butt or mark at which he must shoot his envenomed arrows. And now Balaam is really as solicitous to please Balak, as ever he had pretended to be to please God. See what need we have to pray every day, Our Father in heaven, lead us not into temptation.

CHAP. XXIII.

In this chapter, we have Balak and Balaam busy at work to do Israel a mischief, and, for aught that appears, neither Moses nor the elders of Israel know any thing of the matter, nor are in a capacity to break the snare; but God, who keeps Israel, and neither slumbers nor sleeps, baffles the attempt, without any intercession or contrivance of their's. Here is, I. The first attempt to curse Israel.

1. The preparation made for it by sacrifice, v. 1. 3. 2. The contrary instruction God gave Balaam, v. 4, 5. 3. The blessing Balaam was compelled to pronounce upon Israel, instead of a curse, v. 7. 10. 4. The great disappointment of Balak, v. 11, 12. II. The second attempt, in the same manner made, and in the same manner frustrated, v. 13. 26. III. Preparations made for a third attempt, (v. 27. 30.) the issue of which we have in the next chapter.

1. AND Balaam said unto Balak, Build me here seven altars, and prepare me here seven oxen and seven rams. 2. And Balak did as Balaam had spoken; and Balak and Balaam offered on every altar a bullock and a ram. 3. And Balaam said unto Balak, Stand by thy burnt-offering, and I will go: peradventure the LORD will come to meet me; and whatsoever he sheweth me I will tell thee. And he went to an high place. 4. And God met Balaam: and he said unto him, I have prepared seven altars, and I have offered upon every altar a bullock and a ram. 5. And the LORD put a word in Balaam's mouth, and said, Return unto Balak, and thus thou shalt speak. 6. And he returned unto him, and, lo, he stood by his burnt-sacrifice, he, and all the princes of Moab. 7. And he took up his parable, and said, Balak the king of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the mountains of the east, saying, Come, curse me Jacob, and come, defy Israel. 8. How shall I curse, whom God hath not cursed? or how shall I defy, whom the LORD hath not defied? 9. For from the top of the rocks I see him, and from the hills I behold him: lo, the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations. 10. Who can count the dust of Jacob, and the number of the fourth part of Israel? Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his! 11. And Balak said unto Balaam, What hast thou done unto me? I took thee to curse mine enemies, and, behold, thou hast blessed them altogether. 12. And he answered and said, Must I not take heed to speak that which the LORD hath put in my mouth?

Here is,

I. Great preparation made for the cursing of Israel. That which was aimed at, was, to engage the God of Israel to forsake them, and either to be on Moab's side, or to stand neuter. Oh the sottishness of superstition, to imagine that God will be at men's beck! Balaam and Balak think to bribe him with altars and sacrifices, offered without any warrant or institution of his: as if he would eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats. Ridiculous nonsense, to think that these would please God, and gain his favour, when there could be in them no exercise either of faith or obedience! Yet, it should seem, they offered these sacrifices to the God of heaven, the supreme Numen—Divinity, and not to any of their local deities. But the multiplying of altars was an instance of their degeneracy from the religion of their ancestors, and their apostacy to idolatry; for they that multiplied altars multiplied gods: Ephraim made many altars to sin, Hos. 8. 11. Thus they liked not to retain God in their knowledge, but became vain in their imaginations; and yet presumptuously expected hereby to gain God over to them from Israel, who had his sanctuary among them, and his anointed altar.

Observe here, 1. How very imperious Balaam was, proud to have the command of a king, and to give law to princes. See: 2.

the spirit of that wicked one who exalts himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped. With what authority does Balaam give orders, Build me here (in the place I have pitched upon) seven altars of stone or turf. Thus he covers his malice against Israel with a show of devotion, but his sacrifice was an abomination, being brought with such a wicked mind, Prov. 21. 27. That which he aimed at, was, not to honour God with the sacrifices of righteousness, but to enrich himself with the wages of unrighteousness. 2. How very obsequious Balak was. The altars were presently built, and the sacrifices prepared, the best of the sort, seven bullocks and seven rams. Balak makes no objection to the charge, nor does he snuff at it, or think it either a weariness or a disparagement to stand by his burnt-offering, as Balaam ordered him.

II. The turning of the curse into a blessing, by the overruling power of God, in love to Israel; which is the account Moses gives of it, Dent. 23. 5.

1. God puts the blessing into the mouth of Balaam. While the sacrifices were burning, Balaam retired; he went solitary, into some dark grove on the top of the high place, v. 3. margin. Thus much he knew, that solitude gives a good opportunity for communion with God; those that would meet with him, must retire from the world, and the business and conversation of it, and long to be private, reckoning themselves never less alone than when alone, because the Father is with them. Enter therefore into thy closet, and shut the door, and be assured that God will meet thee, if thou seek him in the due order; but Balaam retired with a peradventure only, having some thoughts that God might meet him, but being conscious to himself of guilt, and knowing that God had lately met him in anger, he had reason to speak doubtfully, v. 3. Peradventure the Lord will come to meet me. But let not such a man think that he shall receive any favour from God. Nay, it should seem, though he pretended to go meet with God, he really designed to use enchantments. See ch. 24. 1. But, whatever he intended, God designed to serve his own glory by him, and therefore met Balaam, v. 4. What communion has light with darkness? No friendly communion, we may be sure; Balaam's way was still perverse, and God was still an adversary to him; but Balak having chosen him for his oracle, God would constrain him to utter such a confession to the honour of God and Israel, as should render those for ever inexcusable who should appear in arms against them. When Balaam was aware that God met him, probably by an angel, he boasted of his performances, I have prepared seven altars, and offered upon every altar a bullock and a ram. How had he done it? It cost him nothing, it was done at Balak's expence; yet, (1.) He boasts of it, as if he had done some great thing. The acts of devotion which are done in hypocrisy are commonly reflected upon with pride and vain-glory. Thus the Pharisee went up to the temple to boast of his religion, Luke, 18. 12. (2.) He insists upon it as a reason why God should gratify him in his desire to curse Israel, as if now he had made God his debtor, and might draw upon him for what he pleased. He thinks God is so much beholden to him for these sacrifices, that the least he can do in recompence for them, is, to sacrifice his Israel to the malice of the king of Moab. Note, It is a common cheat that wicked people put upon themselves, to think, that by the shows of piety they may prevail with God to countenance them, and connive at them, in their greatest immoralities, especially in persecution, Isa. 66. 5. However, though the sacrifice was an abomination, God took the occasion of Balaam's expectation to put a word into his mouth, v. 5. for the answer of the tongue is from the Lord; and thus he would shew how much they are mistaken, who say, With our tongue we will prevail, our lips are our own, Ps. 12. 4. He that made man's mouth knows how to manage it, and to serve his own purposes by it. This speaks terror to daring sinners, that set their mouth against the heavens. God can make their own tongues to fall upon themselves, Ps. 64. 8. And it speaks comfort to God's witnesses, whom at any time he calls out to appear for him; if God put a word into the mouth of Balaam, who would have defied God and Israel, surely he will not be wanting to those who desire to glorify God, and edify his people by their testimony; but it shall be given them in that same hour what they should speak.

2. Balaam pronounced the blessing in the ears of Balak. He found him standing by his burnt-sacrifice, v. 6. closely attending it, and earnestly expecting the success. Those that would have an answer of peace from God must abide by the sacrifice, and attend on the Lord without distraction, not weary in well-doing. Balaam, having fixed himself in the place appointed for his denouncing curses against Israel, which perhaps he had drawn up in form ready to deliver, takes up his parable, and it proves a blessing, v. 7. He pronounces Israel safe and happy, and so blesses them.

(1.) He pronounces them safe, and out of the reach of his envenomed darts. [1.] He owns that the design was to curse them; that Balak sent for him out of his own country, and he came, with that intent, v. 7. The message sent to him, was, Come, curse me Jacob, and come, defy Israel. Balak intended to make war upon them, and he would have Balaam to bless his arms, and to prophesy and pray for the ruin of Israel. [2.] He owns the design defeated, and his own inability to accomplish it. He could not so much as give them an ill word, or an ill wish. How shall I curse whom God has not cursed? v. 8. not that therefore he would not do it, but therefore he could not do it. This is a fair confession, First, Of the weakness and impotency of his own magic skill, for which others valued him so much, and doubtless he valued himself no less. He was the most celebrated man of that profession, and yet owns himself baffled. God had warned the Israelites not to use divination, Lev. 19. 31. and this providence gave them a reason for that law, by shewing them the weakness and folly of it. As they had seen the magicians of Egypt befooled, so, here, the great conjurer of the East. See Isa. 47. 12. . 14. Secondly, It is a confession of the sovereignty and dominion of the divine power. He owns that he could do no more than God would suffer him to do, for God could overrule all his purposes, and turn his counsels headlong. Thirdly, It is a confession of the inviolable security of the people of God. Note, 1. God's Israel are owned and blessed of him. He has not cursed them, for they are delivered from the curse of the law, he has not defied them, nor rejected or abandoned them, though mean and vile. 2. Those that have the good will of Heaven have the ill will of Hell; the serpent and his seed have an enmity to them. 3. Though the enemies of God's people may prevail far against them, yet they cannot curse them; that is, they cannot do them any real mischief, much less a ruining mischief, for they cannot separate them from the love of God, Rom. 8. 39.

[1.] Happy in their peculiarity, and distinction from the rest of the nations, v. 9. From the top of the rocks I see him. And it seems to have been a great surprise to him, that whereas (it is probable) they were represented to him as a rude and disorderly rabble, that infested the countries round about in rambling parties, he saw them a regular incorporated camp, in which appeared all the marks of discipline and good order; he saw them a people dwelling alone, and foresaw they would continue so, and their singularity would be their unspeakable honour. Persons of quality we call persons of distinction; this was Israel's praise, though their enemies turned it to their reproach, that they differed from all the neighbouring nations, not only in their religion and sacred rites, but in their diet, and dress, and common usages, as a people called out of the world, and not to be conformed to it. They never lost their reputation till they mingled themselves among the heathen, Ps. 106. 35. Note, It is the duty and honour of those that are dedicated to God, to be separated from the world, and not to walk according to the course and custom of it. Those who make conscience of peculiar duties, may take the comfort of peculiar privileges, which, it is probable, Balaam has an eye to here; God's Israel shall not stand upon a level with other nations, but be dignified above them all, as a people near to God, and set apart for him.

[2.] Happy in their numbers: not so few and despicable as they were represented to him, but an innumerable company, which made them both honourable and formidable, v. 10. Who can count the dust of Jacob? The number of the people was the thing that Balak was vexed at, ch. 22. 3. Moab was afraid of them, because they were many; and God does here by Balaam promote that fear and vexation, foretelling their further increase. Balak would have him see the utmost part of the people, ch. 22. 41. hoping, the more he saw of them, the more he would be exasperated against them, and throw about his curses with the more keenness and rage; but it proved quite contrary, instead of being angry at their numbers, he admired them. The better acquainted we are with God's people, the better opinion we have of them. He takes notice of the number, First, Of the dust of Jacob, that is, the people of Jacob, concerning whom, it was foretold that they should be as the dust for number, Gen. 28. 14. Thus he owns the fulfilling of the promise made to the fathers, and expects that it should be yet further accomplished. Perhaps it was part of David's fault, in numbering the people, that he offered to count the dust of Jacob, which God had said should be innumerable. Secondly, Of the fourth part of Israel; alluding to the form of their camp, which was cast into four squadrons, under four standards. Note, God's Israel are a very great body, his spiritual Israel are so, and they will appear to be so, when they shall all be gathered together unto him in the great day, Rev. 7. 9.

[3.] Happy in their last end. Let me die the death of the righteous Israelites, that are in covenant with God, and let my last end, or future state, be like their's, or my recompence, namely, in the other world. Here, First, It is taken for granted that death is the end of all men; the righteous themselves must die, and it is good for us to think of this with application, as Balaam himself does here, speaking of his own death. Secondly, He goes upon the supposition of the soul's immortality, and a different state on the other side death, to which this is a noble testimony, and an evidence of its being anciently known and believed. For, how could the death of the righteous be more desirable than the death of the wicked, upon any other account than as it involved happiness in another world, since in the manner and circumstances of dying we see all things come alike to all? Thirdly, He pronounces the righteous truly blessed, not only while they live, but when they die; which makes their death not only more desirable than the death of others, but even more desirable than life itself; for in that sense his wish may be taken; "Not only when I do die, let me die the death of the righteous; but I could even now be willing to die, on condition that I might die the death of the righteous, and reach my end this moment, provided it might be like his." Very near the place where Balaam now was, on one of the mountains of Moab, not long after this, Moses died, and to that, perhaps, God, who put this word into his mouth, designed it should have a reference; that by it Moses might be encouraged to go up and die such a death as Balaam himself wished to have died. Fourthly, He shews his opinion of religion to be better than his resolution; there are many who desire to die the death of the righteous, but do not endeavour to live the life of the righteous; gladly would they have their end like their's, but not their way. They would be saints in heaven, but not saints on earth. This is the desire of the slothful, which kills him because his hands refuse to labour. This of Balaam's is only a wish, not a prayer, and it is a vain wish, being only a wish for the end, without any care for the means. Thus far this blessing goes, even to death, and beyond it, as far as the last end. Now we are told, v. 11, 12,

1. How Balak fretted at it, v. 11. He pretended to honour the Lord with his sacrifices, and to wait for the answer God would send him; and yet, when it did not prove according to his mind, he forgat God, and flew out in a great passion against Balaam, as if it had been purely his doing, "What hast thou done unto me? How hast thou disappointed me!" Sometimes God makes the enemies of his church a vexation one to another, while he that sits in heaven laughs at them, and the efforts of their impotent malice. 2. How Balaam was forced to acquiesce in it. He submits, because he cannot help it, and yet humours the thing with no small address, as if he had been peculiarly conscientious, answering Balak with the gravity of a prophet, Must I not take heed to speak that which the Lord has put in my mouth?

v. 12. Thus a confession of God's overruling power is extorted from a wicked prophet, to the further confusion of a wicked prince.

13. And Balak said unto him, Come, I pray thee, with me unto another place, from whence thou mayest see them: thou shalt see but the utmost part of them, and shalt not see them all: and curse me them from thence. 14. And he brought him into the field of Zophim, to the top of Pisgah, and built seven altars, and offered a bullock and a ram on every altar. 15. And he said unto Balak, Stand here by thy burnt-offering, while I meet the LORD yonder. 16. And the LORD met Balaam, and put a word in his mouth, and said, Go again unto Balak, and say thus. 17. And when he came to him, behold, he stood by his burnt-offering, and the princes of Moab with him. And Balak said unto him, What hath the LORD spoken? 18. And he took up his parable, and said, Rise up, Balak, and hear; hearken unto me, thou son of Zippor: 19. God is not a man, that he should lie; neither the son of man, that he should repent: hath he said, and shall he not do it? or hath he spoken, and shall he not make it good? 20. Behold, I have received commandment to bless: and he hath blessed; and I cannot reverse it. 21. He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob, neither hath he seen perverseness in Israel: the LORD his God is with him, and the shout of a king is among them. 22. God brought them out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn. 23. Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, neither is there any divination against Israel: according to this time it shall be said of Jacob and of Israel, What hath God wrought! 24. Behold, the people shall rise up as a great lion, and lift up himself as a young lion: he shall not lie down until he eat of the prey, and drink the blood of the slain. 25. And Balak said unto Balaam, Neither curse them at all, nor bless them at all. 26. But Balaam answered and said unto Balak, Told not I thee, saying, All that the LORD speaketh, that I must do? 27. And Balak said unto Balaam, Come, I pray thee, I will bring thee unto another place; peradventure it will please God that thou mayest curse me them from thence. 28. And Balak brought Balaam unto the top of Peor, that looketh toward Jeshimon. 29. And Balaam said unto Balak, Build me here seven altars, and prepare me here seven bullocks and seven rams. 30. And Balak did as Balaam had said, and offered a bullock and a ram on every altar.

Here is,

1. Preparation made the second time, as before, for the cursing of Israel. 1. The place is changed, v. 13. Balak fancied that Balaam, having so full a prospect of the whole camp of Israel, from the top of the rocks, v. 9. was either so enamoured with the beauty of it, that he would not curse them, or so affrighted with the terror of it, that he durst not; and therefore he would bring him to another place, from which he might see only some part of them, which would appear more despicable, and that part at least which would lie in view he hoped he might obtain leave to curse, and so by degrees he should get ground against them; intending, no doubt, if he had gained this point, to make his attack on that part of the camp of Israel which Balaam now had in his eye, and into which he was to throw the fireballs of his curses. See how restless and unwearied the church's enemies are in their malicious attempts to ruin it; they leave no stone unturned, no project untried, to compass it. Oh that we were as full of contrivance and resolution in prosecuting good designs for the glory of God! 2. The sacrifices are repeated, new altars are built, a bullock and a ram offered on every altar, and Balak attends his sacrifice as closely as ever, v. 14, 15. Were we thus earnest to obtain the blessing, as Balak was to procure a curse, (designedly upon Israel, but really upon himself and his people,) we should not grudge the return both of the charge and of the labour of religious exercises. 3. Balaam renews his attendance on God, and God meets him the second time, and puts another word into his mouth, not to reverse the former, but to ratify it, v. 16, 17. If God said not to Balaam, Seek, in vain, much less will he say so to any of the seed of Jacob, who shall surely find him, not only as Balaam, their Instructor and Oracle, but their bountiful Rewarder. When Balaam returned, Balak was impatient to know what message he had, "What hath the Lord spoken?" Are there any better tidings yet, any hopes of speeding? This should be our inquiry, when we come to hear the word of God. See Jer. 23. 35.

11. A second conversion of the curse into a blessing, by the overruling power of God; and this blessing is both larger and stronger than the former, and quite cuts off all hopes of altering it. Balak having been so forward to ask what the Lord had spoken, v. 17. Balaam now addresses himself particularly to him, v. 18. Rise up, Balak, and hear. It was a message from God that he had to deliver, and it is required of Balak, though a king, 1. That he attend, hear, and hearken, with a close application of mind, let not a word slip. 2. That he attend with reverence, Rise up, and hear. His successor, Eglon, when he was to receive a message from God, rose out of his seat, Judg. 3. 20.

Two things Balaam in this discourse informs Balak of, sorely to his grief and disappointment.

(1.) That he had no reason to hope he should ruin Israel; it would be to no purpose to attempt it, and he would deceive himself if he expected it; for two reasons, [1.] Because God is unchangeable, v. 19. God is not a man, that he should lie. Men change their minds, and therefore break their words; they lie because they repent. But God does neither. He never changes his mind, and therefore never recalls his promise. Balaam had owned, v. 8, that he could not alter God's counsel, and from thence he infers here, that God himself would not alter it; such is the imperfection of man, and such the perfection of God. It is impossible for God to lie, Heb. 6. 18. And when in scripture he is said to repent, it is not meant of any change of his mind, (for he is in one mind, and who can turn him,) but only of the change of his way. This is a great truth, that with God there is no variableness or shadow of turning: Now here, First, He appeals to Balak himself concerning it: "Hath he said, and shall he not do it?" said it in his own purpose, and shall he not perform it in his providence, according to the counsel of his will? Hath he spoken in his word, in his promise, and shall he not make it good? Can we think otherwise of God, than that he is unchangeably one with himself, and true to his word? All his decrees are unalterable, and all his promises inviolable. Secondly, He applies this general truth to the case in hand, v. 20. He hath blessed, and I cannot reverse it: that is, "I cannot prevail with him to reverse it." Israel were of old a blessed people, a seed that the Lord had blessed, the blessing of Abraham came upon them; they were born under the blessing of the covenant, and born to the blessing of Canaan, and therefore they could not be cursed, unless you could suppose that the God of eternal truth should break his word, and become false to himself and his people. [2.] Because Israel are at present unblameable, v. 21. He has not beheld iniquity in Jacob. Not but that there was iniquity in Jacob, and God saw it; but, First, There was not such a degree of iniquity as might provoke God to abandon them, and give them up to ruin. As bad as they were, they were not so bad. Secondly, There was no idolatry among them, which is in a particular manner called iniquity and perverseness; we have found nothing of that kind in Israel since the golden calf, and therefore, though they were in other instances very provoking, yet God would not cast them off. Balaam knew that nothing would separate between them and God, but sin; while God saw no reigning sin among them, he would send no destroying curse among them; and therefore, as long as they kept in with God, he despaired of ever doing them any mischief. Note, While we keep from sin, we keep from harm. Some give another sense of those words: they read it thus: He has not beheld wrong offered to Jacob, nor will he see any grievance done to Israel; that is, "He has not, nor will he permit it, or allow it; he will not see Israel injured, but he will right them, and avenge their quarrel." Note, God will not bear to see any injury done to his church and people; for what is done against them he takes as done against himself, and will reckon for it accordingly. [3.] Because the power of both was irresistible. He shews Balak there was no contending with them, it was to no purpose to offer it; For, First, They had the presence of God with them. The Lord his God is with him, in a particular manner, and not provoked to withdraw from him. Secondly, They had the joy of that presence, and were always made to triumph in it; the shout or alarm of a king is among them. They shout against their enemies, as sure of victory and success, glorying continually in God as their King and Conqueror for them. Thirdly, They had had the experience of the benefit of God's presence with them, and his power engaged for them. For God brought them out of Egypt, v. 22. The power which had done that could never be restrained, never resisted; and, having begun so gloriously, would, no doubt, finish gloriously. Fourthly, While they had God's presence with them, they had the strength of an unicorn, able to make head against all that opposed them. See ch. 24. 8. Such is the strength which the God of Israel gives unto his people.

Now, from all this he infers, that it was to no purpose for him to think of doing them a mischief, by all the arts he could use, v. 23. 1. He owns himself baffled. Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob, so as to prevail. The curses of hell can never take place against the blessings of heaven. Not but that attempts of this kind would be made, but they would certainly be fruitless and ineffectual. Some observe, that Jacob denotes the church low and afflicted, Israel denotes it prosperous and advanced; but, be the church high or low, her friends few or many, let second causes smile or frown, it comes all to one. No weapon formed against it shall prosper. Note, God easily can, and certainly will, baffle and disappoint all the devices and designs of the powers of darkness against his church, so that they shall not prevail to destroy it. 2 He foresees that this would be remembered in time to come. According to this time, that is, with reference to this we are now about, it shall be said concerning Jacob and Israel, and said by them, What hath God wrought! What great things hath God done for his people! It shall be said with wonder, joy, and thankfulness, and a challenge to the neighbouring nations to produce any like instances of the care of their gods for them. Note, The defeating of the designs of the church's enemies ought to be had in everlasting remembrance to the glory of God. There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun. What Baalam says here, concerning the pre-eminence of the God of Israel above all the gods of the Gentiles, perhaps Moses refers to, when he says, Deut. 32. 31. Their rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being judges, Balaam particularly. Balak therefore has no hopes of ruining Israel; but,

(2.) Balaam shews him that he had more reason to fear being ruined by them, for they were likely to make bloody work among his neighbours; and if he and his country escaped, it was not because he was too great for them to meddle with, but because he fell not within their commission, v. 24. Behold, and tremble; the people that now have him for some time closely encamped, do but repose themselves for a while like a lion couchant, but shortly they shall rise up as a great lion, a lion rampant, that shall not lie down till he eat of the prey, and drink the blood of the slain. This seems to point at the victories he foresaw they would obtain over the Canaanites; that they would never lay down their arms till they had made a complete conquest of the land they had now in view; and when his neighbour's house was on fire, he had reason to think his own in danger.

Now what was the issue of this disappointment? [1.] Balak and Balaam were both of them sick of the cause. First, Balak is now willing to have his conjurer silenced. Since he cannot say what he would have him, he wishes him to say nothing; "Neither curse them at all, nor bless them at all, v. 25. If thou canst not curse them, I beseech thee not to bless them. If thou canst not assist and encourage my forces, yet do not oppose and dispirit them." Note, God can make those that depart from him weary of the multitude of their counsels, Isa. 47. 13.—57. 10. Secondly, Balaam is still willing to own himself overruled, and appeals to what he had said in the beginning of this enterprise, (ch. 22. 38.) All that the Lord speaketh, that I must do, v. 26. This shows, 1. In general, that the way of man is not in himself; there are many devices in man's heart, but God's counsels shall stand. 2. In particular, that as no weapon formed against the church shall prosper, so every tongue that rises against her in judgment, God will control and condemn, Isa. 54. 17. [2.] Yet they resolve to make another attempt. They think it scorn to be baffled, and therefore pursue the design, though it be only to their further confusion. And now the third time, First, They change the place; Balak is at last convinced that it is not Balaam's fault, on whom, before, he had laid the blame, but that really he was under a divine check, and therefore now he hopes to bring him to a place, whence God might at least permit him to curse them, v. 27. Probably, he and Balaam were the more encouraged thus to repeat their attempt, because God had the second time allowed Balaam to go, though he had forbidden him the first time; because by repeated trials they had carried that point, they hope in like manner to carry this. Thus because sinners are connived at, and sentence against their evil works is not executed speedily, their hearts are the more fully set in them to do evil. The place he now took him to, was, the top of Peor; the most eminent high place in all his country, where, it is probable, Baal was worshipped, and was thence called Baal-peor. He chose this place, with a hope, either, 1. That it being the residence (as he fancied) of Baal the god of Moab, Jehovah the God of Israel would not, or could not, come hither to hinder the operation; or, 2. That it being a place acceptable to his god, it would be so to the Lord, and there he would be brought into a good humour. Such idle conceits have foolish men of God, and so vain are their imaginations concerning him. Thus the Syrians fancied the Lord to be God of the hills, but not of the vallies, (1 Kings 20. 28.) as if he were more powerful in one place, than he is in every place. Secondly, They repeat their sacrifice, seven bullocks and seven rams, upon seven altars, v. 29, 30. Thus do they persevere in their expensive oblations, though they had no promise on which to build their hopes of speeding. Let not us therefore, who have a promise that the vision at the end shall speak and not lie, be discouraged by delays, but continue instant in prayer, and not faint, Luke 18. 1.

CHAP. XXIV.

This chapter continues and concludes the history of the defeat of the counsels of Balak and Balaam against Israel, not by might, nor by power, but by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts; and as great an instance it is of God's power over the children of men, and his favour toward his own children, as any of the victories recorded in the book of the wars of the Lord. What preparation was made the third time, for the cursing of Israel, we read of in the close of the foregoing chapter. In this chapter we are told, I. What the blessing was into which that intended curse was turned, v. 1—9. II. How Balak dismissed Balaam from his service thereupon, v. 10—13. III. The predictions Balaam left behind him concerning Israel, and some of the neighbouring nations, v. 14—25.

1. AND when Balaam saw that it pleased the LORD to bless Israel, he went not, as at other times, to seek for enchantments, but he set his face toward the wilderness. 2. And Balaam lifted up his eyes, and he saw Israel abiding in his tents according to their tribes; and the Spirit of God came upon him. 3. And he took up his parable, and said, Balaam the son of Beor hath said, and the man whose eyes are open hath said: 4. He hath said, which heard the words of God, which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open: 5. How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel! 6. As the vallies are they spread forth, as gardens by the river's side, as the trees of lign-aloes which the LORD hath planted, and as cedar-trees beside the waters. 7. He shall pour the water out of his buckets, and his seed shall be in many waters, and his king shall be higher than Agag, and his kingdom shall be exalted. 8. God brought him forth out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn: he shall eat up the nations his enemies, and shall break their bones, and pierce them through with his arrows. 9. He couched, he lay down as a lion, and as a great lion: who shall stir him up? Blessed is he that blesseth thee, and cursed is he that curseth thee.

The blessing itself, which Balaam here pronounces upon Israel, is much the same with the two we had in the foregoing chapter; but the introduction to it is different.

I. The method of proceeding here varies much in several instances. 1. Balaam laid aside the enchantments which he had hitherto depended on; used no spells, or charms, or magic arts, finding they did him no service; it was to no purpose to deal with the Devil for a curse, when it was plain that God was determined immovably to bless, v. 1. Sooner or later, God will convince men of their folly, in seeking after lying vanities which cannot profit. To what purpose should he seek for enchantments? He knew that God was out of the reach of them. 2. He did not now retire into a solitary place as before, but set his face directly toward the wilderness where Israel lay encamped; and since there is no remedy but they must be blessed, he will design nothing else, but will submit by compulsion. 3. Now the Spirit of God come upon him, namely, the Spirit of prophecy, as upon Saul to prevent him from taking David, 1 Sam. 19. 23. He spake not his own sense, but the language of the Spirit that came upon him. 4. He used a different preface now from what he had used before, (v. 3, 4.) much like that of David's, (2 Sam. 23. 1—3.) yet savouring very much (some think) of pride, and vain-glory, taking all the praise of this prophecy to himself, and magnifying himself as one of the cabinet-council of heaven. Two things he boasts of; (1. The favour God did him in making known himself to him. He heard the words of God, and saw the vision of the Almighty; God himself had met him, and spoken to him, (ch. 23. 16.) and this puffs him up. Paul speaks with humility of his visions and revelations, (2 Cor. 12. 1.) but Balaam speaks of them with pride. (2.) His own power to receive and bear those revelations. He fell into a trance indeed, as other prophets did, but he had his eyes open. This he mentions twice; but the words in the original are not the same. The man whose eyes were shut, some think it may be read so, v. 3. but now having his eyes open, v. 4. When he had attempted to curse Israel, he owns himself in a mistake, but now he began to see his error; and yet still he remained blinded by covetousness and ambition, those foolish and hurtful lusts. Note, [1.] Those that oppose God and his people will sooner or later be made to see themselves wretchedly deceived. [2.] Many have their eyes open that have not their hearts open; are enlightened, but not sanctified; and that knowledge which puffs men up with pride will but serve to light them to hell, whither many go with their eyes open.

II. Yet the blessing is for substance the same with those before. Several things he admires in Israel. 1. Their beauty, v. 5. How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob! Though they dwelt not in stately palaces, but in coarse and homely tents, and those, no doubt, sadly weatherbeaten, yet Balaam sees a beauty in those tents, because of their admirable order, according to their tribes, v. 2. Nothing recommends religion more to the good opinion of those that look upon it at a distance, than the unity and harmony of its professors, Ps. 133. 1. The amiableness of this people, and the great reputation they should gain among their neighbours, are compared (v. 6.) to the beauty and sweetness of fruitful valleys, and fine gardens, flourishing trees, and fragrant spices. Note, Those whose eyes are open, see the saints on the earth to be excellent ones, and their delight is accordingly in them. The righteous, doubtless, is more excellent than his neighbour. They are trees which the Lord has planted; that is their excellency. The branches of righteousness are the planting of the Lord. See Hos. 14. 5. . 7. 2. Their fruitfulness and increase. This may be intended by those similitudes, v. 6. of the valleys, gardens, and trees, as well as by those expressions, v. 7. He shall pour the water out of his buckets, that is, God shall water them with his blessing, like rain from heaven, and then his seed shall be in many waters; compare Hos. 2. 23. I will sow her unto me in the earth. And waters are in scripture put for people, and multitudes, and nations. This has been fulfilled in the wonderful increase of that nation, and their vast multitude even in their dispersion. 3. Their honour and advancement. As the multitude of the people is the honour of the prince, so the magnificence of the prince is the honour of the people; Balaam therefore foretells that his king shall be higher than Agag. Agag, it is probable, was the most potent monarch in those parts; Balaam knew of none more considerable than he was; he rose above the rest of his neighbours, but Balaam foretells, that Israel's chief commander, who, after Moses, was Joshua, should be more great and honourable than ever Agag was, and make a far better figure in history. Saul, their first king, triumphed over Agag, though it is said, he came delicately. 4. Their power and victory, v. 8. (1.) He looks back upon what they had done, or rather what had been done for them. God brought him forth out of Egypt, this he had spoken of before, ch. 23. 22. The wonders that attended their deliverance out of Egypt contributed more to their honour, and the terror of their adversaries, than any thing else, Josh. 2. 10. He that brought them out of Egypt will not fail to bring them into Canaan, for, as for God, his work is perfect. (2.) He looks down upon their present strength. Israel hath, as it were, the strength of an unicorn; of which creature it is said, Job, 39. 9, 10. Will he be willing to serve thee, or abide thy crib? Canst thou bind him with his band in the furrow? "No, Israel is too powerful to be checked or held in by thy curses, or thy armies." (3.) He looks forward to their future conquests. He shall eat up the nations his enemies, that is, "He shall not only destroy and devour them as easily and irresistibly as a lion does his prey, but he shall himself be strengthened, and fattened, and enriched, by their spoils." 5. Their courage and security, v. 9. He lay down as a lion, as a great lion. Now he does so, in the plains of Moab, and asks no leave of the king of Moab, nor is he in fear of him; shortly will he do so in Canaan, when he has torn his prey, he will take his repose, quiet from the fear of evil, and bid defiance to all his neighbours; for who shall stir up a sleeping lion? It is observed of lions, (as the learned Bishop Patrick takes notice here,) that they do not retire into places of shelter to sleep, but lie down any where, knowing that none dares meddle with them; thus secure were Israel in Canaan, chiefly in the days of David and Solomon; and thus is the righteous bold as a lion, Prov. 28. 1. not to assault others, but to repose themselves, because God maketh them to dwell in safety, Ps. 4. 8. 6. Their interest, and influence upon their neighbours. Their friends, and those in alliance with them, were happy, Blessed is he that blesseth thee; those that do them any kindness will certainly fare the better for it: but their enemies, and those in arms against them, were certainly miserable; Cursed is he that curseth thee: those that do them any injury, do it at their peril; for God takes what is done to them, whether good or evil, as done to himself. Thus he confirms the blessing of Abraham, Gen. 12. 3. and speaks as if therefore he did at this time bless Israel, and not curse them, because he desired to share in the blessing of Israel's friends, and dreaded the curse on Israel's enemies.

10. And Balak's anger was kindled against Balaam, and he smote his hands together: and Balak said unto Balaam, I called thee to curse mine enemies, and, behold, thou hast altogether blessed them these three times. 11. Therefore now flee thou to thy place: I thought to promote thee unto great honour; but, lo, the LORD hath kept thee back from honour. 12. And Balaam said unto Balak, Spake I not also to thy messengers which thou sentest unto me, saying, 13. If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the commandment of the LORD, to do either good or bad of mine own mind; but what the LORD saith, that will I speak? 14. And now, behold, I go unto my people: come therefore, and I will advertise thee what this people shall do to thy people in the latter days.

We have here the conclusion of this vain attempt to curse Israel, and the total abandonment of it. 1. Balak made the worst of it. He broke out into a rage against Balaam, v. 10. expressed, both in words and gesture the highest degree of vexation at the disappointment; he smote his hands together, for indignation, to see all his measures thus broken, and his project baffled. He charged Balaam with putting upon him the basest affront and cheat imaginable; "I called thee to curse mine enemies, and thou hast shewed thyself in league with them, and in their interests, for thou hast blessed them these three times; though, by appointing the altars to be built, and sacrifices to be offered, thou madest me believe thou wouldst certainly curse them." Hereupon he forbade him his presence, expelled him his country, upbraided him with the preferences he had designed to have bestowed upon him, but now would not, v. 11. "The Lord hath kept thee back from honour. See what thou gettest by pleasing the Lord, instead of pleasing me; thou hast hindered thy preferment by it." Thus they who are any way losers by their duty, are commonly upbraided with it, as fools for preferring that before their interest in the world. Whereas, if Balaam had been voluntary and sincere in his adherence to the word of the Lord, though he lost the honour Balak designed him by it, God would have made that loss up to him abundantly to his advantage. 2. Balaam made the best of it. (1.) He endeavours to excuse the disappointment. And a very good excuse he has for it, that God restrained him from saying what he would have said, and constrained him to say what he would not; and that this was what Balak ought not to be displeased at, not only because he could not help it, but because he had told Balak before what he must depend upon, v. 12, 13. Balak could not say that he had cheated him, since he had given him fair notice of the check he found himself under. (2.) He endeavours to atone for it, v. 14. Though he cannot do what Balak would have him do; yet, [1.] He will gratify his curiosity with some predictions concerning the nations about him. It is natural to us to be pleased with prophecy, and with this he hopes to pacify the angry prince. [2.] He will satisfy him with an assurance, that, whatever this formidable people should do to his people, it should not be till the latter days; so that he, for his part, needed not to fear any mischief or molestation from them; the vision was for a great while to come, but in his days there should be peace. [3.] He will put him into a method of doing Israel a mischief without the ceremonies of enchantment and execration. This seems to be implied in that word, I will advertise thee; for it properly signifies, I will counsel thee: what the counsel was, is not set down here, because it was given privately, but we are told afterward what it was, ch. 31. 16. He counselled him to entice the Israelites to idolatry, Rev. 2. 14. Since he could not have leave from God to curse them, he puts him in a way of getting help from the devil to tempt them. Electere si nequeo superos, Acheronta movebo—If I cannot move Heaven, I will solicit Hell.

15. And he took up his parable, and said, Balaam the son of Beor hath said, and the man whose eyes are open hath said: 16. He hath said, which heard the words of God, and knew the knowledge of the Most High, which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open: 17. I shall see him, but not now: I shall behold him, but not nigh: there shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth. 18. And Edom shall be a possession, Seir also shall be a possession for his enemies; and Israel shall do valiantly. 19. Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion, and shall destroy him that remaineth of the city. 20. And when he looked on Amalek, he took up his parable, and said, Amalek was the first of the nations; but his latter end shall be that he perish for ever. 21. And he looked on the Kenites, and took up his parable, and said, Strong is thy dwelling-place, and thou puttst thy nest in a rock. 22. Nevertheless the Kenite shall be wasted, until Asshur shall carry thee away captive. 23. And he took up his parable, and said, Alas, who shall live when God doeth this! 24. And ships shall come from the coast of Chittim, and shall afflict Asshur, and shall afflict Eber, and he also shall perish for ever. 25. And Balaam rose up, and went and returned to his place: and Balak also went his way.

The office of prophets was both to bless and to prophesy in the name of the Lord. Balaam, as a prophet, per force had blessed Israel, here he foretells future events.

I. His preface is much the same with that, v. 3, 4. He personates a true prophet admirably well, God permitting and directing him to do so, because, whatever he was, the prophecy itself was a true prophecy. He boasts, 1. That his eyes are open, v. 15. for the prophets were in old time called Seers, 1 Sam. 9. 9.

because they must speak what they had seen, and therefore, before they opened their lips, it was necessary that they should have their eyes open. 2. That he had heard the words of God, which many do that do not heed them, or hear God in them. 3. That he knew the knowledge of the Most High, this is added here. A man may be full of the knowledge of God, and yet utterly destitute of the grace of God; may receive the truth in the light of it, and yet be a stranger to the love of it. 4. That he saw the vision of the Almighty, but not so as to be changed into the same image. He calls God the Most High, and the Almighty; no man could speak more honourably of him, nor seem to put a greater value upon his acquaintance with him, and yet he had no true fear of him, love to him, or faith in him; so far may a man go toward heaven, and yet come short.

II. Here is his prophecy concerning him that should be the crown and glory of his people Israel; who is, 1. David in the type, who, not now, not quickly, but in process of time, should smite the corners of Moab, v. 17. and take possession of Edom, and Mount Seir, and under whom the forces of Israel should do valiantly, v. 18. This was fulfilled when David smote Moab, and measured them with a line, so that the Moabites became David's servants, 2 Sam. 8. 2. And at the same time the Edonites likewise were brought into obedience to Israel, v. 14. But, 2. Our Lord Jesus, the promised Messiah, is chiefly pointed at in the antitype, and of him it is an illustrious prophecy; it was the will of God that notice should thus be given of his coming, a great while before, not only to the people of the Jews, but to other nations, because his gospel and kingdom were to extend themselves so far beyond the borders of the land of Israel. It is here foretold, (1.) That his coming should not be yet of a great while: "I shall see him, but not now; I do see him in vision, but at a very great distance, through the interposing space of fifteen hundred years at least." Or, understand it thus: Balaam, a wicked man, shall see Christ, but shall not see him nigh; nor see him, as Job, who saw him as his Redeemer, and saw him for himself, Job, 19. 25, 27. When he comes in the clouds, every eye shall see him, but many will see him (as the rich man in hell saw Abraham) afar off. (2.) That he shall come out of Jacob, and Israel, as a Star and a Sceptre; the former denoting his glory and lustre, as the bright and morning Star; the latter his power and authority; it is he that shall have dominion. Perhaps this prophecy of Balaam (one of the children of the East) concerning a star that should arise out of Jacob, as the indication of a sceptre arising in Israel, being preserved by a tradition of that country, gave occasion to the wise men, who were of the East too, upon the sight of an unusual star over the land of Judea, to inquire for him that was born King of the Jews, Matth. 2. 2. (3.) That his kingdom shall be universal, and victorious over all opposition; which was typified by David's victories over Moab and Edom. But the Messiah shall destroy, or, as some read it, shall rule over, all the children of Seth, v. 17. that is, all the children of men, who descend from Seth, the son of Adam; the descendants of the rest of Adam's sons being cut off by the deluge. Christ shall be King, not only of Jacob and Israel, but of all the world; so that all the children of Seth shall be either governed by his golden sceptre, or dashed in pieces by his iron rod. He shall set up an universal rule, authority, and power, of his own, and shall put down all opposing rule, 1 Cor. 15. 24. He shall unwall all the children of Seth; so some read it. He shall take down all their defences and carnal confidences, so as that they shall either admit his government, or lie open to his judgments. (4.) That his Israel shall do valiantly; the subjects of Christ, animated by his might, shall maintain a spiritual war with the powers of darkness, and be more than conquerors. The people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits, Dan. 11. 32.

III. Here is his prophecy concerning the Amalekites and Kenites, part of whose country, it is probable, he had now in view. 1. The Amalekites were now the chief of the nations, v. 20. therefore Agag was spoken of, v. 7. as an eminent prince, and there-were the first that engaged Israel when they came out of Egypt; but the time will come when that nation, as great as it looks now, will be totally ruined and rooted out. His latter end shall be, that he perish for ever. Here Balaam confirms that doom of Amalek which Moses had read, Exod. 17. 14, 16. where God had sworn that he would have perpetual war with Amalek. Note, Those whom God is at war with will certainly perish for ever; for, when God judges, he will overcome. 2. The Kenites were now the securest of the nations; their situation was such, as that nature was their engineer, and had strongly fortified them; "Thou puttest thy nest (like the eagle) in a rock, v. 21. Thou thinkest thyself safe, and yet the Kenite shall be wasted, v. 22. and gradually brought to decay, till they be carried away captive by the Assyrians," which was done at the captivity of the ten tribes. Note, Bodies politic, like natural bodies, though of the strongest constitutions, will gradually decay, and come to ruin at last; even a nest in a rock will be no perpetual security.

IV. Here is a prophecy that looks as far forward as the Greeks and Romans, for their's is supposed to be meant by the coast of Chittim, v. 24. 1. The introduction to this parable; this article of his prophecy is very observable, v. 23. Alas! who shall live when God doeth this? Here he acknowledges all the revolutions of states and kingdoms to be the Lord's doing, God doeth this; whoever are the instruments, he is the Supreme Director; but he speaks mournfully concerning them, and has a very melancholy prospect of these events; Who shall live? Either, (1.) These events are so distant, and so far off to come, that it is hard to say who shall live till they come. But, whoever shall live to see them, there will be amazing turns. Or, (2.) They will be so dismal, and make such desolations, that scarcely any will escape, or be left alive: Who shall live, when death rides in triumph? Rev. 6. 8. They that live then, will be as brands plucked out of the fire, and will have their lives given them as a prey. God fit us for the worst of times! 2. The prophecy itself is observable. Both Greece and Italy lie much upon the sea, and therefore their armies were sent forth mostly in ships. Now he seems here to foretell, (1.) That the forces of the Grecians should humble and bring down the Assyrians, who were united with the Persians, which was fulfilled when the eastern country was overcome, or over-run rather, by Alexander. (2.) That their's and the Roman forces should afflict the Hebrews or Jews, who were called the children of Eber; this was fulfilled in part, when the Grecian empire was oppressive to the Jewish nation, but chiefly when the Roman empire ruined it, and put a period to it. But, (3.) That Chittim, that is, the Roman Empire, in which the Grecian was at length swallowed up, should perish itself for ever, when the stone cut out of the mountain without hands shall consume all these kingdoms, and particularly the feet of iron and clay, Dan. 2. 34. Thus (says Dr. Lighfoot) Balaam, instead of cursing the church, curses Amalek the first, and Rome the last, enemy of the church. And so let all thine enemies perish, O Lord!

CHAP. XXV.

Israel, having escaped the curse of Balaam, here sustains a great deal of damage and reproach by the counsel of Balaam, who, it seems, before he left Balak, put him into a more effectual way than that which Balak thought of, to separate between the Israelites and their God. "The Lord will not be prevailed with by Balaam's charms to ruin them; try if they will not be prevailed with by the charms of the daughters of Moab to ruin themselves." None are more fatally bewitched than those that are bewitched by their own lusts. Here is, I. The sin of Israel; they were enticed by the daughters of Moab both to whoredom and to idolatry, v. 1. 3. II. The punishment of this sin by the hand of the magistrate, v. 4, 5. And by the immediate hand of God, v. 9. III. The pious zeal of Phinehas in slaying Zimri and Cozbi, two impudent sinners, v. 6. 8, 14, 15. IV. God's commendation of the zeal of Phinehas, v. 10. 13. V. Enmity put between the Israelites and the Midianites, their tempters, as at first between the woman and the serpent, v. 16. 18.

I. AND Israel abode in Shittim, and the people began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab. 2. And they called the people unto the sacrifices of their gods: and the people did eat, and bowed down to their gods. 3. And Israel joined himself unto Baal-peor: and the anger of the LORD was kindled against Israel. 4. And the LORD said unto Moses, Take all the heads of the people, and hang them up before the LORD against the sun, that the fierce anger of the LORD may be turned away from Israel. 5. And Moses said unto the judges of Israel, Slay ye every one his men that were joined unto Baal-peor.

Here is,

I. The sin of Israel, to which they are enticed by the daughters of Moab and Midian; they are guilty both of corporal and spiritual whoredoms, for Israel joined himself unto Baal-peor, v. 3. Not all, nor the most, but very many, were taken in this snare. Now, concerning this, observe, 1. That Balak, by the advice of Balaam, cast this stumbling-block before the children of Israel, Rev. 2. 14. Note, Those are our worst enemies that draw us to sin, for that is the greatest mischief any man can do us. If Balak had drawn out his armed men against them, to fight them, Israel had bravely resisted, and no doubt had been more than conquerors; but now that he sends his beautiful women among them, and invites them to his idolatrous feasts, the Israelites basely yield, and are shamefully overcome: they are smitten with his harlots, that could not be smitten with the sword. Note, We are more endangered by the charms of a smiling world, than by the terrors of a frowning world. 2. That the daughters of Moab were their tempters and conquerors. Ever since Eve was first in the transgression, the fairer sex, though the weaker, has been a snare to many; yea, strong men have been wounded and slain by the lips of the strange woman, Prov. 7. 26. witness Solomon, whose wives were snares and nets to him, Eccl. 7. 26. 3. That whoredom and idolatry went together. They first defiled and debauched their consciences, by committing lewdness with the women, and then were easily drawn, in complaisance to them, and in contempt of the God of Israel, to bow down to their idols. And they were more likely to do so, if, as it is commonly supposed, and seems probable by the joining of them together, the uncleanness committed was a part of the worship and service performed to Baal-peor. Those that have broken the fences of modesty will never be held by the bonds of piety; and those that have dishonoured themselves by fleshly lusts will not scruple to dishonour God by idolatrous worship; for this they are justly given up yet further to vile affections. 4. That, by eating of the idolatrous sacrifices, they joined themselves to Baal-peor, to whom they were offered; which the apostle urges as a reason why Christians should not eat things offered to idols, because thereby they had fellowship with the devils to whom they were offered, 1 Cor. 10. 20. It is called eating the sacrifices of the dead, Ps. 106. 28. Not only because the idol itself was a dead thing, but, because the person represented by it was some great hero, who since his death was deified, as saints in the Roman church are canonized. 5. It was a great aggravation of the sin, that Israel abode in Shittim, where they had the land of Canaan in view, and were just ready to enter and take possession of it. It was the highest degree of treachery and ingratitude to be false to their God whom they had found so faithful to them, and to eat of idol-sacrifices, when they were ready to be feasted so richly on God's favours.

II. God's just displeasure against them for this sin. Israel's whoredoms did that which all Balaam's enchantments could not do, they set God against them; now he was turned to be their enemy, and fought against them. So many of the people, nay so many of the princes, were guilty, that the sin became national, and for it God was wroth with the whole congregation.

1. A plague immediately broke out, for we read of the staying of it, v. 8. and of the number that died of it, v. 9. but no mention of the beginning of it, which therefore must be implied in those words, v. 3. The anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel. It is said expressly, Ps. 106. 29. The plague brake in. Note, Epidemical diseases are the fruits of God's anger, and the just punishments of epidemical sins; one infection follows the other. The plague, no doubt, fastened on those that were most guilty, who were soon made to pay dear for their forbidden pleasures; and though now God does not always plague such sinners as he did here, yet that word of God will be fulfilled, If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy, 1 Cor. 3. 17. 2. The ringleaders are ordered to be put to death by the hand of public justice, which will be the only way to stay the plague, v. 4. Take the heads of the people, that is, of that part of the people that went out of the camp of Israel into the country of Moab, to join in their idolatries; Take them and hang them up before the sun, as sacrifices to God's justice, and for a terror to the rest of the people. The judges must first order them to be slain with the sword, v. 5. and their dead bodies must be hanged up, that the stupid Israelites, seeing their leaders and princes so severely punished for their whoredom and idolatry, without any regard to their quality, might be possessed with a sense of the evil of the sin, and the terror of God's wrath against them. Ringleaders in sin ought to be made examples of justice.

6. And, behold, one of the children of Israel came and brought unto his brethren a Midianitish woman in the sight of Moses, and in the sight of all the congregation of the children of Israel, who were weeping before the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. 7. And when Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron the priest, saw it, he rose up from among the congregation, and took a javelin in his hand; 8. And he went after the man of Israel into the tent, and thrust both of them through, the man of Israel, and the woman through her belly. So the plague was stayed from the children of Israel. 9. And those that died in the plague were twenty and four thousand. 10. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 11. Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron the priest, hath turned my wrath away from the children of Israel, while he was zealous for my sake among them, that I consumed not the children of Israel in my jealousy. 12. Wherefore say, Behold, I give unto him my covenant of peace: 13. And he shall have it, and his seed after him, even the covenant of an everlasting priesthood; because he was zealous for his God, and made an atonement for the children of Israel. 14. Now the name of the Israelite that was slain, even that was slain with the Midianitish woman, was Zimri, the son of Salu, a prince of a chief house among the Simeonites. 15. And the name of the Midianitish woman that was slain was Cozbi, the daughter of Zur; he was head over a people, and of a chief house in Midian.

Here is a remarkable contest between wickedness and righteousness, which shall be most bold and resolute; and righteousness carries the day, as no doubt it will at last.

I. Never was vice more daring than it was in Zimri; a prince of a chief house in the tribe of Simeon. Such a degree of impudence in wickedness was he arrived at, that he publicly appeared leading a Midianitish harlot (and a harlot of quality too, like himself, a daughter of a chief house in Midian) in the sight of Moses, and all the good people of Israel. He did not think it enough to go out with his harlot to worship the gods of Moab, but, when he had done that, he brought her with him to dishonour the God of Israel. He not only owned her publicly, as his friend, and higher in his favour than any of the daughters of Israel, but openly went with her into the tent, v. 8. The word signifies such a booth, or place of retirement, as was designed and fitted up for lewdness. Thus he declared his sin as Sodom, and was so far from blushing for it, that he rather prided himself in it, and gloried in his shame. All the circumstances concurred to make it exceeding sinful, exceeding shameful. 1. It was an affront to the justice of the nation, and bid defiance to that: the judges were ordered to put the criminals to death, but he thought himself too great for them to meddle with, and, in effect, bid them touch him if they durst. He had certainly cast off all fear of God, who stood in no awe of the powers which he had ordained to be a terror to evildoers. 2. It was an affront to the religion of the nation, and put a contempt upon that. Moses, and the main body of the congregation, who kept their integrity, were weeping at the door of the tabernacle; lamenting the sin committed, and deprecating the plague begun; they were sanctifying a fast in a solemn assembly, weeping between the porch and the altar, to turn away the wrath of God from the congregation; then comes Zimri among them, with his harlot in his hand, to banter them, and, in effect, to tell them that he was resolved to fill the measure of sin as fast as they emptied it.

II. Never was virtue more daring than it was in Phinehas. Being aware of the insolence of Zimri, which, it is probable, all the congregation took notice of, in a holy indignation at the offenders, he rises up from his prayers, takes his sword or half-pike, follows those impudent sinners into their tent, and stabs them both, v. 7, 8. It is not at all difficult to justify Phinehas in what he did; for being now heir-apparent to the high priesthood, no doubt, he was one of those judges of Israel whom Moses had ordered, by the divine appointment, to slay all those whom they knew to have joined themselves to Baal-peor; so that this gives no countenance at all to private persons, under pretence of zeal against sin, to put offenders to death, who ought to be prosecuted by due course of law. The civil magistrate is the avenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil, and no private person may take his work out of his hand.

Two ways God testified his acceptance of the pious zeal of Phinehas. 1. He immediately put a stop to the plague, v. 8. Their weeping and praying prevailed not, till this piece of necessary justice was done. If magistrates do not take care to punish sin, God will; but their justice will be the best prevention of his judgment, as in the case of Achan, Josh. 7. 13. 2. He put an honour upon Phinehas; though he did no more than was his duty to do as a judge, yet, because he did it with extraordinary zeal against sin, and for the honour of God and Israel, and did it when the other judges, out of respect to Zimri's character, as a prince, were afraid, and declined doing it; therefore God shewed himself particularly well pleased with him, and it was counted to him for righteousness, Ps. 106. 31. There is nothing lost by venturing for God. If Zimri's relations bore him a grudge for it, and his friends might censure him as indiscreet in this violent and hasty execution, what needed he care while God accepted him? In a good thing we should be zealously affected. (1.) Phinehas, upon this occasion, though a young man, is pronounced his country's patriot and best friend, v. 11. He has turned away my wrath from the children of Israel. So much does God delight in shewing mercy, that he is well pleased with those that are instrumental in turning away his wrath; this is the best service we can do to our people; and we may contribute something towards it by our prayers, and by our endeavours in our places to bring the wickedness of the wicked to an end. (2.) The priesthood is entailed by covenant upon his family. It was designed him before, but now it was confirmed to him, and, which added much to the comfort and honour of it, it was made the recompence of his pious zeal, v. 12, 13. It is here called an everlasting priesthood, because it should continue to the period of the Old-Testament dispensation, and should then have its perfection and perpetuity in the unchangeable priesthood of Christ, who is consecrated for evermore. By the covenant of peace given him, some understand, in general, a promise of long life, and prosperity, and all good; it seems rather to be meant particularly of the covenant of priesthood, for that is called the covenant of life and peace, Mal. 2. 5. and was made for the preserving of peace between God and his people. Observe, how the reward answered the service; by executing justice he had made an atonement for the children of Israel, v. 13. and therefore he and his shall from henceforward be employed in making atonement by sacrifice. He was zealous for his God, and therefore he shall have the covenant of an everlasting priesthood. Note, It is requisite that ministers should be not only for God, but zealous for God. It is required of them that they do more than others for the support and advancement of the interests of God's kingdom among men.

16. And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, 17. Vex the Midianites, and smite them: 18. For they vex you with their wives, wherewith they have beguiled you in the matter of Peor, and in the matter of Cozbi, the daughter of a prince of Midian, their sister, which was slain in the day of the plague for Peor's sake.

God had punished the Israelites for their sin with a plague: as a Father, he corrected his own children with a rod; but we read not that any of the Midianites died of the plague, God took another course with them, and punished them with the sword of an enemy, not with the rod of a father. 1. Moses, though the meekest man, and far from a spirit of revenge, is bid to vex the Midianites, and smite them, v. 17. Note, We must set ourselves against that, whatever it is, which is an occasion of sin to us, though it be a right eye, or a right hand, that thus offends us, Matth. 5. 29, 30. This is that holy indignation and revenge which godly sorrow worketh, 2 Cor. 7. 11. 2. The reason given for the meditating of this revenge, is, because they vex you with their wives, v. 18. Note, Whatever draws us to sin, should be a vexation to us, as a thorn in the flesh. The mischief which the Midianites did to Israel, by enticing them to whoredom, must be remembered and punished with as much severity as that which the Amalekites did in fighting with them when they came out of Egypt, Exod. 17. 14. God will certainly reckon with those that do the devil's work in tempting men to sin, especially those that make Israel to sin. See further orders given in this matter, ch. 31. 2.

CHAP. XXVI.

This book is called Numbers, from the numberings of the children of Israel; which it gives an account of. Once they were numbered at mount Sinai, in the first year after they came out of Egypt, which we had an account of, ch. 1. and 2. And now a second time they were numbered in the plains of Moab, just before they entered Canaan, and that we have an account of in this chapter. I. Orders are given for the doing of it, v. 1. .4. II. A register of the families and numbers of each tribe, v. 5. .50. and the sum total, v. 51. III. Directions given to divide the land among them, v. 52. .56. IV. The families and numbers of the Levites by themselves, v. 57. .62. V. Notice is taken of the fulfilling of the threatening in the death of all those that were first numbered, v. 63. .65. and to this there seems to have been a special regard in the taking and keeping of this account.

1. AND it came to pass after the plague, that the LORD spake unto Moses and unto Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest, saying,

2. Take the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel, from twenty years old and upward, throughout their fathers' house, all that are able to go to war in Israel. 3. And Moses and Eleazar the priest spake with them in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho, saying, 4. Take the sum of the people, from twenty years old and upward; as the LORD commanded Moses and the children of Israel, which went forth out of the land of Egypt.

Observe here, 1. That Moses did not number the people, but when God commanded him. David, in his time, did it without a command, and paid dear for it. God was Israel's King, and he would not have this act of authority done, but by his express orders. Moses, perhaps, by this time, had heard of the blessing, with which Balaam was constrained, sore against his will, to bless Israel, and particularly the notice he took of their numbers; and is sufficiently pleased with that general testimony borne to this instance of their strength and honour by an adversary, though he knows not their numbers exactly, till God now appoints him to take the sum of them. 2. Eleazar is joined in commission with him, as Aaron had been before, by which God honoured Eleazar before the elders of his people, and confirmed his succession. 3. It was presently after the plague that this account was ordered to be taken; to shew, that though God had in justice contended with them by that sweeping pestilence, yet he had not made a full end, nor would he utterly cast them off. God's Israel shall not be ruined, though it be severely rebuked. 4. They were now to go by the same rule that they had gone by in the former numbering, counting those only that were able to go forth to war, for that was the service now before them.

5. Reuben, the eldest son of Israel: the children of Reuben; Hanoah, of whom cometh the family of the Hanoahites: of Pallu, the family of the Palluities: 6. Of Hezron, the family of the Hezronites: of Carmi, the families of the Carmites. 7. These are the families of the Reubenites: and they that were numbered of them were forty and three thousand and seven hundred and thirty. 8. And the sons of Pallu; Eliab. 9. And the sons of Eliab; Nemuel, and Dathan, and Abiram. This is that Dathan and Abiram, which were famous in the congregation, who strove against Moses and against Aaron in the company of Korah, when they strove against the LORD: 10. And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up together with Korah, when that company died, what time the fire devoured two hundred and fifty men: and they became a sign. 11. Notwithstanding the children of Korah died not. 12. The sons of Simeon after their families: of Nemuel, the family of the Nemuelites: of Jamin, the family of the Jaminites: of Jachin, the family of the Jachinites: 13. Of Zerach, the family of the Zarhites: of Shaul, the family of the Shaulites. 14. These are the families of the Simeonites, twenty and two thousand and two hundred. 15. The children of Gad after their families: of Zephon, the family of the Zephonites; of Haggi, the family of the Haggites:

of Shuni, the family of the Shunites: 16. Of Ozni, the family of the Oznites: of Eri, the family of the Erites: 17. Of Arod, the family of the Arodites: of Areli, the family of the Arelites. 18. These are the families of the children of Gad according to those that were numbered of them, forty thousand and five hundred. 19. The sons of Judah were Er and Onan: and Er and Onan died in the land of Canaan. 20. And the sons of Judah after their families were; of Shelah, the family of the Shelanites: of Pharez, the family of the Phartzites: of Zerah, the family of the Zarhites. 21. And the sons of Pharez were; of Hezron, the family of the Hezronites: of Hamul, the family of the Hamulites. 22. These are the families of Judah according to those that were numbered of them, threescore and sixteen thousand and five hundred. 23. Of the sons of Issachar after their families: of Tola, the family of the Tolaites: of Pua, the family of the Puites: 24. Of Jashub, the family of the Jashubites: of Shimron, the family of the Shimronites. 25. These are the families of Issachar according to those that were numbered of them, threescore and four thousand and three hundred. 26. Of the sons of Zebulun after their families: of Sered, the family of the Sardites: of Elon, the family of the Elonites: of Jahleel, the family of the Jahleelites. 27. These are the families of the Zebulunites according to those that were numbered of them, threescore thousand and five hundred. 28. The sons of Joseph after their families were Manasseh and Ephraim. 29. Of the sons of Manasseh: of Machir, the family of the Machirites: and Machir begat Gilead: of Gilead come the family of the Gileadites. 30. These are the sons of Gilead: of Jeezer, the family of the Jeezerites: of Helek, the family of the Helekites: 31. And of Asriel, the family of the Asrielites: and of Shechem, the family of the Shechemites: 32. And of Shemida, the family the Shemidaites: and of Hephher, the family of the Hephherites. 33. And Zelophehad the son of Hephher had no sons, but daughters: and the names of the daughters of Zelophehad were Mahlah, and Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Tirzah. 34. These are the families of Manasseh, and those that were numbered of them, fifty and two thousand and seven hundred. 35. These are the sons of Ephraim after their families: of Shuthelah, the family of the Shuthalhites: of Becher, the family of the Bachrites: of Tahan, the family of the Tahanites. 36. And these are the sons of Shuthelah: of Eran, the family of the Eranites. 37. These are the families of the sons of Ephraim according to those that were numbered of them, thirty and two thousand and five hundred. These are the sons of Joseph after their families. 38. The sons of Benjamin after their families: of Bela, the family of the Belaites: of Ashbel, the family of the Ashbelites: of Ahiram, the family of the Ahiramites: 39. Of Shupham, the family of the Shuphamites: of Hupham, the family of the Huphamites. 40. And the sons of Bela were Ard and Naaman: of Ard, the family of the Ardites: and of Naaman, the family of the Naamites. 41. These are the sons of Benjamin after their families: and they that were numbered of them were forty and five thousand and six hundred. 42. These are the sons of Dan after their families: of Shubam, the family of the Shubamites. These are the families of Dan after their families. 43. All the families of the Shubamites according to those that were numbered of them, were threescore and four thousand and four hundred. 44. Of the children of Asher after their families: of Jimna, the family of the Jimnites: of Jesui, the family of the Jesuites: of Beriab, the family of the Beriites. 45. Of the sons of Beriab: of Heber, the family of the Heberites: of Malchiel, the family of the Malchielites. 46. And the name of the daughter of Asher was Sarah. 47. These are the families of the sons of Asher according to those that were numbered of them; who were fifty and three thousand and four hundred. 48. Of the sons of Naphtali after their families: of Jahzeel, the family of the Jahzeelites: of Guni, the family of the Gunites: 49. Of Jezer, the family of the Jezerites: of Shillem, the family of the Shillemites. 50. These are the families of Naphtali according to their families: and they that were numbered of them were forty and five thousand and four hundred. 51. These were the numbered of the children of Israel, six hundred thousand and a thousand seven hundred and thirty.

This is the register of the tribes as they were now enrolled, in the same order that they were numbered in ch. 1.

Observe, 1. The account that is here kept of the families of each tribe; which must not be understood of such as we call families, those that live in a house together, but such as were the descendants of the several sons of the patriarchs, by whose names, in honour of them, their posterity distinguished themselves and one another. The families of the twelve tribes are thus numbered; of Dan but one, for Dan had but one son, and yet that tribe was the most numerous of all, except Judah, v. 42, 43. Its beginning was small, but its latter end greatly increased; Zebulun was divided into three families; Ephraim into four; Issachar into four; Naphtali into four; and Reuben into four; Judah, Simeon, and Asher, had five families apiece. Gad and Benjamin seven apiece; and Manasseh eight. Benjamin brought ten sons into Egypt, Gen. 46. 21. but three of them, it seems, either died childless, or their families were extinct, for here we find seven only of those names preserved, and that whole tribe none of the most numerous: for Providence, in the building up of families and nations, does not tie itself to probabilities. The barren hath born seven, and she that hath many children is waxed feeble, 1 Sam. 2. 5.

2. The numbers of each tribe. And here our best entertainment will be to compare those numbers with those when they were numbered at mount Sinai. The sum total was nearly the same; they were now one thousand eight hundred and twenty fewer than they were then; yet seven of the tribes increased in number. Judah increased one thousand nine hundred. Issachar, nine thousand nine hundred. Zebulun, three thousand one hundred. Manasseh, twenty thousand five hundred. Benjamin, ten thousand two hundred. Dan, one thousand seven hundred. Asher, eleven thousand nine hundred. But the other five decreased more than to balance that increase. Reuben decreased two thousand seven hundred and seventy. Simeon, thirty-seven thousand one hundred. Gad, five thousand one hundred and fifty. Ephraim, eight thousand. And Naphtali, eight thousand. In which account we may observe, (1.) That all the three tribes that were encamped under the standard of Judah, who was the ancestor of Christ, were increased, for his church shall be edified and multiplied. (2.) That none of the tribes increased so much as that of Manasseh, which in the former account was the smallest of all the tribes, only thirty-two thousand two hundred; while here it is one of the most considerable; and his brother Ephraim, which there was numerous, is here one of the least. Jacob had crossed hands upon their heads, and had preferred Ephraim before Manasseh, which perhaps the Ephraimites had prided themselves too much in, and had trampled upon their brethren the Manassites; but when the Lord saw that Manasseh was despised, he thus multiplied him exceedingly, for it is his glory to help the weakest, and raise up them that are cast down. (3.) That none of the tribes decreased so much as Simeon did, from fifty-nine thousand three hundred, it sunk to twenty-two thousand two hundred; almost to but a third part of what it was. One whole family of that tribe (namely, Ohad, mentioned Exod. 6. 15.) was extinct in the wilderness. Hence, Simeon is not mentioned in Moses's blessing, Deut. 33. and the lot of that tribe in Canaan was inconsiderable, only a canton out of Judah's lot, Josh. 19. 9. Some conjecture that most of those twenty-four thousand which were cut off by the plague, for the iniquity of Peor, were of that tribe; for Zimri, who was a ringleader in that iniquity, was a prince of that tribe, many of which therefore were influenced by his example to follow his pernicious ways.

3. In the account of the tribe of Reuben, mention is made of the rebellion of Dathan and Abiram, who were of that tribe, in confederacy with Korah a Levite, v. 9. 11. Though the story had been largely related but a few chapters before, yet here it comes in again, as fit to be had in remembrance and thought of by posterity, whenever they looked into their pedigree, and pleased themselves with the antiquity of their families and the glory of their ancestors, that they might call themselves a seed of evil-doers. Two things are here said of them, (1.) That they had been famous in the congregation, v. 9. Probably, they were remarkable for their ingenuity, activity, and fitness for business; that Dathan and Abiram, that might have been advanced in due time under God and Moses; but their ambitious spirits put them upon striving against God and Moses, and when they quarrelled with the one, they quarrelled with the other. And what was the issue? (2.) They, that might have been famous, were made infamous; they became a sign, v. 10. They were made monuments of divine justice; God in their ruin shewed himself glorious in holiness, and so they were set up for a warning to all others, in all ages, to take heed of treading in the steps of their pride and rebellion. Notice is here taken of the preservation of the children of Korah, v. 11. they died not; as the children of Dathan and Abiram did; doubtless, because they kept themselves pure from the infection, and would not join, no, not with their own father, in rebellion. If we partake not of the sins of sinners, we shall not partake of their plagues. These sons of Korah were afterwards eminently serviceable to the church, being employed by David as singers in the house of the Lord; hence many psalms are said to be for the sons of Korah; and perhaps they were made to bear his name so long after, rather than the name of any other of their ancestors, for warning to themselves, and as an instance of the power of God, which brought those choice fruits even out of that bitter root. The children of families that have been stigmatized should endeavour, by eminent virtues, to roll away the reproach of their fathers.

52. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 53. Unto these the land shall be divided for an inheritance, according to the number of names. 54. To many thou shalt give the more inheritance, and to few thou shalt give the less inheritance: to every one shall his inheritance be given according to those that were numbered of him. 55. Notwithstanding the land shall be divided by lot: according to the names of the tribes of their fathers they shall inherit. 56. According to the lot shall the possession thereof be divided between many and few.

If any ask why such a particular account is kept of the tribes and families, and numbers, of the people of Israel, here is an answer for them; as they were multiplied, so they were portioned, not by common providence, but by promise; and, for the support of the honour of divine revelation, God will have the fulfilling of the promise taken notice of, both in their increase and in their inheritance. When Moses had numbered the people, God does not say, By these shall the land be conquered; but, taking that for granted, he tells him, Unto these shall the land be divided. These, that are now registered as the sons of Israel, shall be admitted (as it were by copy of court-roll) heirs of the land of Canaan.

Now in the distributing, or quartering, of these tribes, 1. The general rule of equity is here prescribed to Moses, that to many he should give more, and to few he should give less, (v. 54.) yet, alas! he was so far from giving any to others, that he must not have any himself; but this direction given to him was intended for Joshua, his successor. 2. The application of this general rule was to be determined by lot, v. 55. Notwithstanding it seems thus to be left to the prudence of their prince, yet the matter must be finally reserved to the providence of their God, in which they must all acquiesce, how much soever it contradicted their policies or inclinations, According to the lot shall the possession be divided. As the God of nations, so the God of Israel in particular, reserves it to himself to appoint the bounds of our habitation. And thus Christ, our Joshua, when he was urged to appoint one of his disciples to his right hand, and another to his left in his kingdom, acknowledged the sovereignty of his Father in the disposal; It is not mine to give. Joshua must not dispose of inheritances in Canaan according to his own mind, but it shall be given to them for whom it is prepared of my Father.

57. And these are they that were numbered of the Levites after their families: of Gershon, the family of the Gershonites: of Kohath, the family of the Kohathites: of Merari, the family of the Merarites. 58. These are the families of the Levites: the family of the Libnites, the family of the Hebronites, the family of the Malites, the family of the Mushites, the family of the Korathites. And Kohath begat Amram. 59. And the name of Amram's wife was Jochebed, the daughter of Levi, whom her mother bare to Levi in Egypt; and she bare unto Amram Aaron and Moses, and Miriam their sister. 60. And unto Aaron was born Nadab, and Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. 61. And Nadab and Abihu died, when they offered strange fire before the LORD. 62. And those that were numbered of them were twenty and three thousand, all males from a month old and upward: for they were not numbered among the children of Israel, because there was no inheritance given them among the children of Israel.

Levi was God's tribe; a tribe that was to have no inheritance with the rest in the land of Canaan, and therefore was not numbered with the rest, but by itself; so it had been numbered in the beginning of this book at mount Sinai, and therefore came not under the sentence passed upon all that were then numbered, that none of them should enter Canaan, but Caleb and Joshua; for of the Levites that were not numbered with them, nor were to go forth to war, Eleazar and Ithamar, and perhaps others, who were above twenty years old then (as appears, ch. 4. 16, 28.) entered Canaan; and yet this tribe, now at its second numbering, was increased but one thousand; and was still one of the smallest tribes. Mention is made here of the death of Nadab and Abihu for offering strange fire, as before of the sin and punishment of Korah, because these things happened unto them for ensamples.

63. These are they that were numbered by Moses and Eleazar the priest, who numbered the children of Israel in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho. 64. But among these there was not a man of them whom Moses and Aaron the priest numbered, when they numbered the children of Israel in the wilderness of Sinai. 65. For the LORD had said of them, They shall surely die in the wilderness. And there was not left a man of them, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun.

That which is observable in this conclusion of the account, is, the execution of the sentence passed upon the murmurers, ch. 14. 29. that not one of those who were numbered from twenty years old and upward (and that the Levites were not, but either from a month old, or from thirty years old to fifty) should enter Canaan, except Caleb and Joshua. In the muster now made, particular directions, no doubt, were given to those of each tribe that were employed in taking the account, to compare these rolls with the former, and to observe whether there were any now left of those that were numbered at mount Sinai, and it appeared that there was not one man numbered now that was numbered then, but Caleb and Joshua, v. 64, 65. Herein appeared, 1. The righteousness of God, and his faithfulness to his threatenings, when once the decree is gone forth. He swore in his wrath, and what he had sworn he performed. Better all those carcasses, had they been ten times as many, should fall to the ground, than the word of God. Though the rising generation was mixed with them, and many of the guilty and condemned criminals long survived the sentence, even to the last year of the forty, yet they were cut off by some means or other before this muster was made: those whom God has condemned cannot escape, either by losing themselves in a crowd, or by the delay of execution. 2. The good news of God to this people, notwithstanding their provocations; though that murmuring race was cut off, yet God raised up another generation which was as numerous as they, that though they perished, yet the name of Israel might not be cut off, lest the inheritance of the promise should be lost for want of heirs. And though the number fell a little short of what it was at mount Sinai, yet those now numbered had this advantage, that they were all middle-aged men, between twenty and sixty, in the prime of their time for service; and, during the thirty-eight years of their wandering and wasting in the wilderness, they had an opportunity of acquainting themselves with the laws and ordinances of God, having no business, civil or military, to divert them from those sacred studies; and having Moses and Aaron to instruct them, and God's good Spirit. Neh. 9. 20. 3. The truth of God, in performing his promise made to Caleb and Joshua. They were to be preserved from falling in this common ruin, and they were so. The arrows of death, though they fly in the dark, do not fly at random, even when they fly thickest, but are directed to the mark intended, and no other. All that are written among the living shall have their lives given them for a prey, in the most dangerous times. Thousands may fall on their right hand, and ten thousand on their left, but they shall escape.

CHAP. XXVII.

Here is, I. The case of Zelophehad's daughter determined, v. 1..11. II. Notice given to Moses of his death approaching, v. 12..14. III. Provision made of a successor in the government, 1. By the prayer of Moses, v. 15..17. 2. By the appointment of God, v. 18..23.

1. THEN came the daughters of Zelophehad, the son of Hopher, the son of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh, of the families of Manasseh the son of Joseph: and these are the names of his daughters; Mahlah, Noah, and Hoglah, and Milcah, and Tirzah. 2. And they stood before Moses, and before Eleazar the priest, and before the princes and all the congregation, by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, saying, 3. Our father died in the wilderness, and he was not in the company of them that gathered themselves together against the LORD in the company of Korah; but died in his own sin, and had no sons. 4. Why should the name of our father be done away from among his family, because he hath no son? Give unto us therefore a possession among the brethren of our father. 5. And Moses brought their cause before the LORD. 6. And the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 7. The daughters of Zelophehad speak right: thou shalt surely give them a possession of an inheritance among their father's brethren; and thou shalt cause the inheritance of their father to pass unto them. 8. And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a man die, and have no son, then ye shall cause his inheritance to pass unto his daughter. 9. And if he have no daughter, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his brethren. 10. And if he have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his father's brethren. 11. And if his father have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his kinsman that is next to him of his family, and he shall possess it: and it shall be unto the children of Israel a statute of judgment, as the LORD commanded Moses.

Mention was made of the case of these daughters of Zelophehad, in the chapter before, v. 33. It should seem, by the particular notice taken of it, that it was a singular case, and that the like did not at this time occur in all Israel, that the head of a family had no sons, but daughters only; their case is again debated, ch. 36. upon another article of it; and, according to the judgments given in their case, we find them put in possession, Josh. 17. 3, 4. One would suppose that their personal character was such as added weight to their case, and made it to be so often taken notice of. Here is,

I. Their case stated by themselves, and their petition upon it presented to the highest court of judicature, which consisted of Moses as king, the princes as lords, and the congregation, or elders of the people, who were chosen their representatives, as the commons, v. 2. This august assembly sat near the door of the tabernacle, that in difficult cases they might consult the oracle. To them these young ladies made their application: for it is the duty of magistrates to defend the fatherless, Ps. 82. 3. We find not that they had any advocate to speak for them, but they managed their own cause ingeniously enough, which they could do the better, because it was plain and honest, and spoke for itself.

Now observe, 1. What it is they petition for; that they might have a possession in the land of Canaan among the brethren of their father, v. 4. What God had said to Moses, ch. 26. 53. he had faithfully made known to the people, that the land of Canaan was to be divided among those that were now numbered; these daughters knew that they were not numbered, and therefore by this rule must expect no inheritance, and the family of their father must be looked upon as extinct, and written childless, though he had all these daughters: this they thought hard, and therefore prayed to be admitted heirs to their father, and to have an inheritance in his right. If they had had a brother, they would not have applied to Moses (as one did to Christ, Luke, 12. 13.) for an order to inherit with him. But having no brother, they beg for a possession. Herein they discovered, (1.) A strong faith in the power and promise of God, concerning the giving of the land of Canaan to Israel. Though it was yet unconquered, untouched, and in the full possession of the natives, yet they petition for their share in it, as if it were all their own already. See Ps. 60. 6, 7. God has spoken in his holiness, and then Gilead is mine, Manasseh is mine. (2.) An earnest desire of a place and name in the land of promise, which was a type of heaven; and if they had, as some think, an eye to that, and by this claim laid hold on eternal life, they were five wise virgins indeed; and their example should quicken us with all possible diligence to make sure of our title to the heavenly inheritance, in the disposal of which, by the covenant of grace, no difference is made between male and female, Gal. 3. 28. (3.) A true respect and honour for their father, whose name was dear and precious to them, now that he was gone, and they were therefore solicitous that it should not be done away from among his family. There is a debt which children owe to the memory of their parents, required by the fifth commandment; Honour thy father and mother. 2. What their plea is; That their father did not die under any attainder which might be thought to have corrupted his blood, and forfeited his estate, but he died in his own sin, v. 3. not engaged in any mutiny or rebellion against Moses, particularly not in that of Korah and his company, nor in any way concerned in the sins of others, but chargeable only with the common iniquities of mankind, for which to his own Master he was to stand or fall, but laid not himself open to any judicial process before Moses and the princes. He was never convicted of any thing that might be a bar to his children's claim. It is a comfort to parents when they come to die, if, though they smart themselves for their own sin, yet they are not conscious to themselves of any of those iniquities which God visits upon the children.

II. Their case determined by the divine oracle. Moses did not presume to give judgment himself, because, though their pretensions seemed just and reasonable, yet his express orders were to divide the land among those that were numbered, which were the males only: he therefore brings their cause before the Lord, and waits for his decision, v. 5. and God himself gives judgment upon it. He takes cognizance of the affairs, not only of nations, but of private families, and orders them in judgment according to the counsel of his own will. 1. The petition is granted, v. 7. They speak right, give them a possession. Those that seek an inheritance in the land of promise shall have what they seek for, and other things shall be added to them. Those are claims which God will rountenance and crown. The point is settled for all future occasions. These daughters of Zelophehad consulted, not only their own comfort, and the credit of their family, but the honour and happiness of their sex likewise; for on this particular occasion a general law was made, that in case a man had no son, his estate should go to his daughters, v. 8. Not to the eldest, as the eldest son, but to them all in copartnership, share and share alike. Those that in such a case deprive their daughters of their right, purely to keep up the name of their family, unless a valuable consideration be allowed them, may make the entail of their lands surer than the entail of a blessing with them. Further directions are given for the disposal of inheritances, v. 9.. 11. That if a man have no issue at all, his estate shall go to his brethren; if no brethren, then to his father's brethren; and if there be no such, then to his next kinsman; with this the rules of our law exactly agree: and though the Jewish doctors here will have it understood, that if a man have no children, his estate shall go to his father, if living, before his brethren, yet there is nothing of that in the law, and our common law has an express rule against it; That an estate cannot ascend lineally; so that if a son purchase lands in fee-simple, and die without issue in the lifetime of his father, his father cannot be his heir. See how God makes heirs, and in his disposal we must acquiesce.

12. And the LORD said unto Moses, Get thee up into this mount Abarim, and see the land which I have given unto the children of Israel. 13. And when thou hast seen it, thou also shalt be gathered unto thy people, as Aaron thy brother was gathered. 14. For ye rebelled against my commandment in the desert of Zin, in the strife of the congregation, to sanctify me at the water before their eyes: that is the water of Meribah in Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin.

Here,

I. God tells Moses of his faults; his speaking unadvisedly with his lips at the Waters of Strife, where he did not express, so carefully as he ought to have done, a regard to the honour both of God and Israel, v. 14. Though Moses was a servant of the Lord, a faithful servant, yet once he rebelled against God's commandment, and failed in his duty; and though a very honourable servant, and highly favoured, yet he shall hear of his miscarriage, and all the world shall hear of it too again and again; for God will shew his displeasure against sin, even in those that are nearest and dearest to him. Those that are in reputation for wisdom and honour, have need to be constantly careful of their words and ways, lest at any time they say or do that which may be a diminution either to their comfort, or to their credit, or both, a great while after.

II. He tells Moses of his death; his death was the punishment of his sin, and yet notice is given him of it in such a manner as might best serve to sweeten and mollify the sentence, and reconcile him to it. 1. Moses must die, but he shall first have the satisfaction of seeing the land of promise, v. 12. God did not intend with this sight of Canaan to tantalize him, or upbraid him with his folly in doing that which cut him short of it, nor had it any impression of that kind upon him, but God appointed it, and Moses accepted it, as a favour; his sight (we have reason to think) being wonderfully strengthened and enlarged to take such a full and distinct view of it as did abundantly gratify his innocent curiosity. This sight of Canaan signified his believing prospect of the better country, that is, the heavenly, which is very comfortable to dying saints. 2. Moses must die, but death does not cut him off, it only gathers him to his people, brings him to rest with the holy patriarchs that were gone before him; Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, were his people, the people of his choice and love, and to them death gathered him. 3. Moses must die, but only as Aaron died before him, v. 13. And Moses had seen how easily and cheerfully Aaron had put off the priesthood first, and then the body: let not Moses therefore be afraid of dying, it was but to be gathered to his people, as Aaron was gathered. Thus the death of our near and dear relations should be improved by us, (1.) As an engagement to us to think often of dying; we are not better than our fathers or brethren; if they are gone, we are going; if they are gathered already, we must be gathered very shortly. (2.) As an encouragement to us to think of death without terror, and even to please ourselves with the thoughts of it; it is but to die as such and such die, if we live as they lived; and their end was peace, they finished their course with joy; why then should we fear any evil in that melancholy valley?

15. And Moses spake unto the LORD, saying, 16. Let the LORD, the God of the spirits of all flesh, set a man over the congregation, 17. Which may go out before them, and which may go in before them, and which may lead them out, and which may bring them in; that the congregation of the LORD be not as sheep which have no shepherd. 18. And the LORD said unto Moses, Take thee Joshua the son of Nun, a man in whom is the Spirit, and lay thine hand upon him; 19. And set him before Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation; and give him a charge in their sight. 20. And thou shalt put some of thine honour upon him, that all the congregation of the children of Israel may be obedient. 21. And he shall stand before Eleazar the priest, who shall ask counsel for him after the judgment of Urim before the LORD: at his word shall they go out, and at his word they shall come in, both he, and all the children of Israel with him, even all the congregation. 22. And Moses did as the LORD commanded him: and he took Joshua, and set him before Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation: 23. And he laid his hands upon him, and gave him a charge, as the LORD commanded by the hand of Moses.

Here,

I. Moses prays for a successor. When God had told him that he must die, though it appears elsewhere that he solicited for a reprieve for himself, Deut. 3. 24, 25. yet, when that could not be obtained, he begged earnestly that the work of God might be carried on, though he might not have the honour of finishing it. Envious spirits do not love their successors, but Moses was not one of those. We should concern ourselves both in our prayers and in our endeavours for the rising generation, that religion may flourish, and the interests of God's kingdom among men may be maintained and advanced, when we are in our graves. In this prayer Moses expresses, 1. A tender concern for the people of Israel, that the congregation of the Lord be not as sheep which have no shepherd. Our Saviour uses this comparison in his compassions for the people, when they wanted good ministers, Matth. 9. 36. Magistrates and ministers are the shepherds of a people; if those be wanting, or be not as they should be, people are apt to wander and be scattered abroad, are exposed to enemies, in danger of wanting food, and of hurting one another, as sheep having no shepherd. 2. A believing dependence upon God, as the God of the spirits of all flesh. He is both the Former and the Searcher of spirits, and therefore can either find men fit, or make them fit, to serve his purposes, for the good of his church. He prays to God, not to send an angel, but to set a man over the congregation, that is, to nominate and appoint one whom he would qualify and own, as ruler of his people Israel. Before God gave this blessing to Israel, he stirred up Moses to pray for it: thus Christ, before he sent forth his apostles, called to those about him, to pray the Lord of the harvest, that he would send forth labourers into his harvest, Matth. 9. 38.

II. God, in answer to his prayer, appoints him a successor, even Joshua, who had long since signalized himself by his courage in fighting Amalek, his humility in ministering to Moses, and his faith and sincerity in witnessing against the report of the evil spies: this is the man whom God pitches upon to succeed Moses. A man in whom is the Spirit, the Spirit of grace; he is a good man, fearing God, and hating covetousness, and acting from principle; the spirit of government; he is fit to do the work, and discharge the trusts of his place; a spirit of conduct and courage; and he had also the spirit of prophecy; for the Lord often spoke unto him, Josh. 4. 1.—6. 2.—7. 10. Now here, 1. God directs Moses how to secure the succession to Joshua. (1.) He must ordain him; lay thine hand upon him. This was done in token of Moses's transferring the government to him, as the laying of hands on the sacrifice put the offering in the place and stead of the offerer; also in token of God's conferring the blessing of the Spirit upon him, which Moses obtained by prayer. It is said, Deut. 34. 9. Joshua was full of the spirit of wisdom, for Moses had laid his hands on him. This rite of imposing hands we find used in the New Testament, in the setting apart of gospel ministers, denoting a solemn designation of them to the office, and an earnest desire that God would qualify them for it, and own them in it. It is the offering of them to Christ and his church for living sacrifices. (2.) He must present him to Eleazar and the people; set him before them, that they might know him to be designed of God for this great trust, and consent to that designation. (3.) He must give him a charge. He must be charged with the people of Israel, who were delivered into his hand as sheep into the hand of a shepherd, and for whom he must be accountable; he must be strictly charged to do his duty to them; though they were under his command, he was under God's command, and from him must receive charge; the highest must know that there is a higher than they. This charge must be given him in their sight, that it might be the more affecting to Joshua, and that the people, seeing the work and care of their prince, might be the more engaged to assist and encourage him. (4.) He must put some of his honour upon him, v. 20. Joshua at the most had but some of the honour of Moses, and in many instances came short of him; but this seems to be meant of his taking him now, while he lived, into partnership with him in the government, and admitting him to act with authority, as his assistant. It is an honour to be employed for God and his church; some of this honour must be put upon Joshua, that the people being used to obey him while Moses lived, they might the more cheerfully do it afterward. (5.) He must appoint Eleazar the high priest, with his breastplate of judgment, to be his privy council, v. 21. He shall stand before Eleazar, by him to consult the oracle, ready to receive and observe all the instructions that should be given him by it. This was a direction to Joshua, that though he was full of the Spirit, and had all this honour put upon him, yet he must do nothing without asking counsel of God, not leaning to his own understanding; it was also a great encouragement to him; to govern Israel, and to conquer Canaan, were two hard tasks, but God assures him that in both he should be under a divine conduct; and in every difficult case God would advise him to that which should be for the best. Moses had recourse to the oracle of God himself, but Joshua, and the succeeding judges, must use the ministry of the high priest, and consult the judgment of Urim, which, the Jews say, might not be inquired of but by the king, or the head of the Sanhedrim, or by the agent or representative of the people, for them, and in their name. Thus the government of Israel was now purely divine, for both the designation and direction of their princes were entirely so. At the word of the priest, according to the judgment of Urim, Joshua and all Israel must go out and come in; and, no doubt, God, who thus guided, would preserve both their going out and their coming in. Those are safe, and may be easy, that follow God, and in all their ways acknowledge him. 2. Moses does according to these directions, v. 22, 23. He cheerfully ordained Joshua. (1.) Though it was a present lessening to himself, and amounting almost to a resignation of the government. He is very willing that the people should look off him, and gaze on the rising sun. (2.) Though it might appear a perpetual slur upon his family. It had not been so much his praise, if he had thus resigned his honour to a son of his own; but with his own hands to ordain Eleazar, first, high priest, and now Joshua, one of another tribe, chief ruler, while his own children had no preferment at all, but were left in the rank of common Levites; this was such an instance of self-denial, and submission to the will of God, as was more his glory than the highest advancement of his family could have been; for it confirms his character as the meekest man upon earth, and faithful to him that appointed him in all his house. This (says the excellent Bishop Patrick) shews him to have had a principle which raised him above all other lawgivers, who always took care to establish their families in some share of that greatness which they themselves possessed; but hereby it appeared Moses acted not from himself, because he acted not for himself.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Now that the people were numbered, orders given for the dividing of the land, and a general of the forces nominated and commissioned, one would have expected that the next chapter should have begun the history of the campaign, or at least should have given us an account of the ordinances of war; no, it contains the ordinances of worship, and provides, that now, as they were on the point of entering Canaan, they should be sure to take their religion along with them, and not forget that, in the prosecution of their wars, v. 1, 2. The laws are here repeated and summed up concerning the sacrifices that were to be offered, I. Daily, v. 3..8. II. Weekly, v. 9, 10. III. Monthly, v. 11..15. IV. Yearly, 1. At the passover, v. 16..25. 2. At pentecost, v. 26..31. And the next chapter is concerning the annual solemnities of the seventh month.

1. AND the LORD spake unto Moses, saying, 2. Command the children of Israel, and say unto them, My offering, and my bread for my sacrifices made by fire, for a sweet savour unto me, shall ye observe to offer unto me in their due season. 3. And thou shalt say unto them, This is the offering made by fire which ye shall offer unto the LORD; two lambs of the first year without spot day by day, for a continual burnt-offering. 4. The one lamb shalt thou offer in the morning, and the other lamb shalt thou offer at even; 5. And a tenth part of an ephah of flour for a meat-offering, mingled with the fourth part of an hin of beaten oil. 6. It is a continual burnt-offering, which was ordained in mount Sinai for a sweet savour, a sacrifice made by fire unto the LORD. 7. And the drink-offering thereof shall be the fourth part of an hin for the one lamb: in the holy place shalt thou cause the strong wine to be poured unto the LORD for a drink-offering. 8. And the other lamb shalt thou offer at even: as the meat-offering of the morning, and as the drink-offering thereof, thou shalt offer it, a sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD.

Here is,

I. A general order given concerning the offerings of the Lord, which were to be brought in their season, v. 2. These laws are here given afresh, not because the observance of them was wholly disused during their thirty-eight years' wandering in the wilderness, we cannot think that they were so long without any public worship, but that at least the daily lamb was offered morn- and evening, and doubled on the sabbath-day; so Bishop Patrick conjectures; but that many of the sacrifices were then omitted, is plainly intimated, Amos, 5. 25. quoted by Stephen, Acts, 7. 42. Did ye offer unto me sacrifices and offerings in the wilderness forty years, O house of Israel? It is implied, "No, ye did not." But, whether the course of sacrifices had been interrupted or no, God saw fit now to repeat the law of sacrifices; 1. Because this was a new generation of men, that were most of them unborn when the former laws were given; therefore, that they might be left without excuse, they have not only these laws written, to be read to them, but again repeated from God himself, and put into a less compass and a plainer method. 2. Because they were now entering upon war, and might be tempted to think, that, while they were engaged in that, they should be excused from offering sacrifices; inter arma, silent leges—law is but little regarded amidst the clash of arms. No, says God, my bread for my sacrifices even now shall ye observe to offer, and that in their due season. They were then concerned to keep their peace with God, when they were at war with their enemies. In the wilderness they were solitary, and quite separate from all other people, and therefore there they needed not so much their distinguishing badges, nor would their omission of sacrifices be so scandalous, as when they came into Canaan, when they were mingled with other people. 3. Because possession was now to be given them of the land of promise, that land flowing with milk and honey, where they would have plenty of all good things; "Now," says God, "when you are feasting yourselves, forget not to offer the bread of your God." Canaan was given unto them upon this condition, that they should observe God's statutes, Ps. 105. 44, 45.

II. The particular law of the daily sacrifice, a lamb in the morning, and a lamb in the evening, which, for the constancy of it as duly as the day come, is called a continual burnt-offering, v. 3. which intimates, that when we are bid to pray always, and to pray without ceasing, it is intended, that at least every morning and every evening we offer up our solemn prayers and praises to God. This is said to be ordained in Mount Sinai, (v. 6.) when the other laws were given. The institution of it we have, Exod. 29. 38. Nothing is added here in the repetition of the law, but that the wine to be poured out in the drink-offering is ordered to be strong wine, v. 7. The richest and most generous and best bodied wine they could get. Though it was to be poured out upon the altar, and not drunk, (they therefore might be ready to think the worst would serve to be so thrown away,) yet God requires the strongest, to teach us to serve God with the best we have. The wine must be strong, (says Ainsworth,) because it was a figure of the blood of Christ, the memorial of which is still left to the church in wine; and of the blood of the martyrs, which was poured out as a drink-offering upon the sacrifice and service of our faith, Phil. 2. 17.

9. And on the sabbath-day two lambs of the first year without spot, and two tenth deals of flour for a meat-offering, mingled with oil, and the drink-offering thereof: 10. This is the burnt-offering of every sabbath, beside the continual burnt-offering, and his drink-offering. 11. And in the beginnings of your months ye shall offer a burnt-offering unto the LORD; two young bullocks, and one ram, seven lambs of the first year without spot; 12. And three tenth deals of flour for a meat-offering, mingled with oil, for one bullock; and two tenth deals of flour for a meat-offering, mingled with oil, for one ram; 13. And a several tenth deal of flour mingled with oil for a meat-offering unto one lamb; for a burnt-offering of a sweet savour, a sacrifice made by fire unto the LORD. 14. And their drink-offerings shall be half an hin of wine unto a bullock, and the third part of an hin unto a ram, and a fourth part of an hin unto a lamb: this is the burnt-offering of every month throughout the months of the year. 15. And one kid of the goats for a sin-offering unto the LORD shall be offered, beside the continual burnt-offering, and his drink-offering.

The new moons and the sabbaths are often spoken of together, as great solemnities in the Jewish Church, very comfortable to the saints then, and typical of gospel-grace. Now we have here the sacrifices appointed. 1. For the sabbaths. Every sabbath-day the offering must be doubled; beside the two lambs offered for the daily burnt-offering, there must be two more offered, one (it is probable) added to the morning sacrifice, and the other to the evening, v. 9, 10. This teaches us to double our devotions on sabbath-days, for so the duty of the day requires. The sabbath-rest is to be observed, in order to a more close application to the sabbath-work, which ought to fill up a sabbath-time. In Ezekiel's temple-service, which points at gospel-times, the sabbath-offerings were to be six lambs and a ram, with their meat-offerings and drink-offerings, Ezek. 46. 4, 5. to intimate not only the continuance, but the advancement, of sabbath-sanctification in the days of the Messiah. This is the burnt-offering of the sabbath, in his sabbath, so it is in the original, v. 10. We must do every sabbath-day's work in its day, studying to redeem every minute of sabbath-time, as those that believe it precious; and not thinking to put off one sabbath's work to another, for sufficient to every sabbath is the service thereof. 2. For the new moons. Some suggest, that as the sabbath was kept with an eye to the creation of the world, so the new moons were sanctified with an eye to the divine providence, which appoints the moon for seasons, guiding the revolutions of time by its changes, and governing sublunary bodies (as many think) by its influences; though we observe not any feast of new moons, yet we must not forget to give God the glory of all the precious things put forth by the moon, which he has established for ever, a faithful witness in heaven, Ps. 89. 37. The offerings in the new moons were very considerable, two bullocks, a ram, and seven lambs, with the meat-offerings and drink-offerings that were to attend them, v. 11. &c. beside a sin-offering, v. 15. For when we give glory to God, by confessing his mercies, we must give glory to him likewise, by confessing our own sins. And when we rejoice in the gifts of common providence, we must make the sacrifice of Christ, that great Gift of special grace, the fountain and spring-head of our joy. Some have questioned whether the new moons were to be reckoned among their feasts; but why should they not, when, beside the special sacrifices which were then to be offered, they rested from servile works, Amos, 8. 5. blew the trumpets, ch. 10. 10. and went to the prophets to hear the word? 2 Kings, 4. 23. And the worship performed in the new moons is made typical of gospel-solemnities, Isa. 66. 23.

16. And in the fourteenth day of the first month is the passover of the LORD. 17. And in the fifteenth day of this month is the feast: seven days shall unleavened bread be eaten. 18. In the first day shall be an holy convocation; ye shall do no manner of servile work therein: 19. But ye shall offer a sacrifice made by fire for a burnt-offering unto the LORD; two young bullocks, and one ram, and seven lambs of the first year: they shall be unto you without blemish: 20. And their meat-offering shall be of flour mingled with oil: three tenth deals shall ye offer for a bullock, and two tenth deals for a ram; 21. A several tenth deal shalt thou offer for every lamb, throughout the seven lambs: 22. And one goat for a sin-offering, to make an atonement for you. 23. Ye shall offer these beside the burnt-offering in the morning, which is for a continual burnt-offering. 24. After this manner ye shall offer daily, throughout the seven days, the meat of the sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD: it shall be offered beside the continual burnt-offering, and his drink-offering. 25. And on the seventh day ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work. 26. Also in the day of the first fruits, when ye bring a new meat-offering unto the LORD, after your weeks be out, ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work: 27. But ye shall offer the burnt-offering for a sweet savour unto the LORD; two young bullocks, one ram, seven lambs of the first year; 28. And their meat-offering of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals unto one bullock, two tenth deals unto one ram, 29. A several tenth deal unto one lamb, throughout the seven lambs; 30. And one kid of the goats, to make an atonement for you. 31. Ye shall offer them beside the continual burnt-offering, and his meat-offering, (they shall be unto you without blemish,) and their drink-offerings.

Here is,

1. The appointment of the passover-sacrifices, not that which was the chief, the paschal lamb, (sufficient instructions had formerly been given concerning that,) but those which were to be offered upon the seven days of unleavened bread, which followed it, v. 17. .25. The first and last of those seven days were to be sanctified as sabbaths, by a holy rest and a holy convocation, and, during each of the seven days, they were to be very liberal in their sacrifices, in token of their great and constant thankfulness for their deliverance out of Egypt; two bullocks, a ram, and seven lambs. A gospel-conversation, in gratitude for Christ our Passover, who was sacrificed, is called the keeping of this feast, 1 Cor. 5. 8. For it is not enough that we purge out the leavened bread of malice and wickedness, but we must offer the bread of our God, even the sacrifice of praise continually, and continue herein unto the end. 2. The sacrifices are likewise appointed, which were to be offered at the feast of pentecost, here called the day of the first fruits, v. 26. In the feast of unleavened bread they offered a sheaf of their first fruits of barley (which with them was first ripe) to the priest, Lev. 23. 10. as an introduction to the harvest; but now, about seven weeks after, they were to bring a new meat-offering to the Lord, at the end of harvest, in thankfulness to God, who had not only given, but preserved to their use, the kindly fruits of the earth, so as that in due time they did enjoy them. It was at this feast that the Spirit was poured out, Acts, 2. 1, &c. and thousands were converted by the preaching of the apostles, who had not only given, but preserved to their use, the kindly fruits of the earth, so as that in due time they did enjoy them. It was at this feast that the Spirit was poured out, Acts, 2. 1, &c. and thousands were converted by the preaching of the apostles, who had not only given, but preserved to their use, the kindly fruits of the earth, so as that in due time they did enjoy them. in this chapter, which were chiefly for the benefit of the offerers, and therefore in them they were left more to themselves; but burnt-offerings, which were purely for the honour of God, and confessions of his dominion, and which figured evangelical piety and devotion, by which the soul is wholly offered up to God in the flames of holy love; and sin-offerings, which were typical of Christ's sacrifice of himself, by which we and our services are perfected and sanctified.

CHAP. XXIX.

This chapter appoints the offerings that were to be made by fire unto the Lord, in the three great solemnities of the seventh month. I. In the feast of trumpets, on the first day of that month, v. 1..6. II. In the day of atonement, on the tenth day, v. 7..11. III. In the feast of tabernacles, on the fifteenth day, and the seven days following, v. 12..38. And then the conclusion of these ordinances, v. 39, 40.

1. AND in the seventh month, on the first day of the month, ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work: it is a day of blowing the trumpets unto you. 2. And ye shall offer a burnt-offering for a sweet savour unto the LORD; one young bullock, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year without blemish: 3. And their meat-offering shall be of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals for a bullock, and two tenth deals for a ram, 4. And one tenth deal for one lamb, throughout the seven lambs: 5. And one kid of the goats for a sin-offering, to make an atonement for you: 6. Beside the burnt-offering of the month, and his meat-offering, and the daily burnt-offering, and his meal-offering, and their drink-offerings, according unto their manner, for a sweet savour, a sacrifice made by fire unto the LORD. 7. And ye shall have on the tenth day of this seventh month an holy convocation; and ye shall afflict your souls: ye shall not do any work therein: 8. But ye shall offer a burnt-offering unto the LORD for a sweet savour; one young bullock, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year; they shall be unto you without blemish: 9. And their meat-offering shall be of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals to a bullock, and two tenth deals to one ram, 10. A several tenth deal for one lamb, throughout the seven lambs: 11. One kid of the goats for a sin-offering; beside the sin-offering of atonement, and the continual burnt-offering, and the meat-offering of it, and their drink-offerings.

There were more sacred solemnities in the seventh month than in any other month of the year: not only because it had been the first month till the deliverance of Israel out of Egypt, (which, falling in the month Abib, occasioned its being thenceforth made the beginning of the months in all ecclesiastical computations,) but because still it continued the first month in the civil reckonings of the jubilees, and years of release; and also because it was the time of vacation between harvest and seedness, when they had most leisure to attend the sanctuary: which intimates, that, though God will dispense with sacrifices, in consideration of works of necessity and mercy, yet, the more leisure we have from the pressing occasions of this life, the more time we should spend in the immediate service of God.

1. We have here the appointment of the sacrifices that were to be offered on the first day of the month, the day of blowing the trumpets, which was a preparative for the two great solemnities, that of holy mourning on the day of atonement, and that of holy joy in the feast of tabernacles. The intention of divine institutions is then well answered, when one religious service helps to fit us for another, and all for heaven. The blowing of the trumpets was appointed, Lev. 23. 24. Here they are directed what sacrifices to offer on that day, of which there was not then any mention made. Note, Those who would know the mind of God in the scripture, must compare one part of the scripture with another, and put those parts together that have reference to the same thing; for the latter discoveries of divine light explain what was dark, and supply what was defective in the former, that the man of God may be perfect. The sacrifices then to be offered are particularly ordered here, v. 2..6. and care taken that these should not supersede the daily oblation, and that of the new-moon. It is hereby intimated, that we must not seek occasions to abate our zeal in God's service, or be glad of an excuse to omit a good duty, but rather rejoice in an opportunity of accumulating and doing more than ordinary in religion. If we perform family worship, we must not think that that will excuse us from our secret devotions; nor that, on the days we go to church, we need not worship God alone, and with our families; but we should always abound in the work of the Lord. 2. On the day of atonement. Beside all the services of that day which we had the institution of, Lev. 16. and which, one would think, required trouble and charge enough; here are burnt-offerings ordered to be offered, v. 8..10. For, in our faith and repentance, those two great gospel-graces which were signified by that day's performances, we must have an eye to the glory and honour of God, which was purely intended in the burnt-offerings; there was likewise to be a kid of the goats for a sin-offering, besides the great sin-offering of atonement, v. 11. which intimates, that there are so many defects and faults, even in the exercises and expressions of our repentance, that we have need of an interest in a sacrifice to expiate the guilt even of that part of our holy things. Though we must not repent that we have repented, yet we must repent that we have not repented better. It likewise bespoke the imperfection of the legal sacrifices, and their insufficiency to take away sin, that, on the very day the sin-offering of atonement was offered, yet there must be another sin-offering. But, what the law could not do in that it was weak, that Christ has done.

12. And on the fifteenth day of the seventh month ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work, and ye shall keep a feast unto the LORD seven days: 13. And ye shall offer a burnt-offering, a sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD; thirteen young bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year; they shall be without blemish: 14. And their meat-offering shall be of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals unto every bullock of the thirteen bullocks, two tenth deals to each ram of the two rams, 15. And a several tenth deal to each lamb of the fourteen lambs: 16. And one kid of the goats for a sin-offering; beside the continual burnt-offering, his meat-offering, and his drink-offering. 17. And on the second day ye shall offer twelve young bullocks, two rams, fourteen lambs of the first year without spot: 18. And their meat-offering and their drink-offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner: 19. And one kid of the goats for a sin-offering; beside the continual burnt-offering, and the meat-offering thereof, and their drink-offerings. 20. And on the third day eleven bullocks, two rams, fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish; 21. And their meat-offering and their drink-offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner: 22. And one goat for a sin-offering; beside the continual burnt-offering, and his meat-offering, and his drink-offering. 23. And on the fourth day ten bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish: 24. Their meat-offering and their drink-offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner: 25. And one kid of the goats for a sin-offering; beside the continual burnt-offering, his meat-offering, and his drink-offering. 26. And on the fifth day nine bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year without spot: 27. And their meat-offering and their drink-offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner: 28. And one goat for a sin-offering; beside the continual burnt-offering, and his meat-offering, and his drink-offering. 29. And on the sixth day eight bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish: 30. And their meat-offering and their drink-offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner: 31. And one goat for a sin-offering; beside the continual burnt-offering, his meat-offering, and his drink-offering. 32. And on the seventh day seven bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish: 33. And their meat-offering and their drink-offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner: 34. And one goat for a sin-offering; beside the continual burnt-offering, his meat-offering, and his drink-offering. 35. On the eighth day ye shall have a solemn assembly: ye shall do no servile work therein: 36. But ye shall offer a burnt-offering, a sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the LORD: one bullock, one ram, seven lambs of the first year without blemish: 37. Their meat-offering and their drink-offerings for the bullock, for the ram, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner: 38. And one goat for a sin-offering; beside the continual burnt-offering, and his meat-offering, and his drink-offering. 39. These things ye shall do unto the LORD in your set feasts, beside your vows, and your freewill-offerings, for your burnt-offerings, and for your meat-offerings, and for your drink-offerings, and for your peace-offerings. 40. And Moses told the children of Israel according to all that the LORD commanded Moses.

Soon after the day of atonement, that day in which men were to afflict their souls, followed the feast of the tabernacles, in which they were to rejoice before the Lord; for they that sow in tears shall soon reap in joy. To the former laws about this feast, which we had, Lev. 23. 34, &c. here are added directions about the offerings made by fire, which they were to offer unto the Lord, during the seven days of that feast, Lev. 23. 36. Observe here, 1. Their days of rejoicing were to be days of sacrifices. A disposition to be cheerful does us no harm, nor is any bad symptom, when it is so far from unfitting us for, that it encourages and enlarges our hearts in, the duties of God's immediate service. 2. All the days of their dwelling in booths, they must offer sacrifices; while we are here in a tabernacle-state, it is our interest, as well as duty, constantly to keep up communion with God: nor will the unsettledness of our outward condition excuse us in our neglect of the duties of God's worship. 3. The sacrifices for each of the seven days, though differing in nothing but the number of the bullocks, are severally and particularly appointed, which yet is no vain repetition; for God would thus teach them to be very exact in those observances, and to keep an eye of faith fixed upon the institution in every day's work. It likewise intimates, that the repetition of the same services, if performed with an upright heart, and with a continued fire of pious and devout affection, is no weariness to God, and therefore we ought not to snuff at it, or to say, Behold, what a weariness it is to us! 4. The number of the bullocks (which were the most costly part of the sacrifice) decreased every day. On the first day of the feast, they were to offer thirteen, on the second day, but twelve, on the third day, eleven, &c. so that, on the seventh day, they offered seven. And the last day, though it was the great day of the feast, and celebrated with a holy convocation, yet they were to offer but one bullock; and whereas, on all the other days, they offered two rams and fourteen lambs, on this, but one ram and seven lambs. Such was the will of the Lawmaker, and that is reason enough for the law. Some suggest, that God herein considered the infirmity of the flesh, which is apt to grudge the charge and expence of religion; it is therefore ordered to grow less and less, that they might not complain, as if God had made them to serve with an offering, Isa. 43. 23. Or, it is hereby intimated to them, that the legal dispensation should wax old, and vanish away at last; and the multitude of their sacrifices should end in one great Sacrifice, infinitely more worthy than all of them. It was on the last day of the feast, after all these sacrifices had been offered, that our Lord Jesus stood, and cried to those who still thirsted after righteousness, (being sensible of the insufficiency of these sacrifices to justify them,) to come unto him and drink, John, 7. 37. 5. The meat-offerings and drink-offerings attended all the sacrifices, according to their number, after the manner. Be there never so much flesh, it is no feast without bread and drink; therefore these must never be omitted at God's altar, which was his table. We must not think that doing much in religion will be accepted, if we do not do it well, and after the manner that God has appointed. 6. Every day there must be a sin-offering presented, as observed in other feasts. Our burnt-offerings of praise cannot be accepted of God, unless we have an interest in the great sacrifice of propitiation which Christ offered, when for us he made himself a sin-offering. 7. Even when all these sacrifices were offered, yet the continual burnt-offering must not be omitted, either morning or evening, but each day that must be offered, first in the morning, and last in the evening. No extraordinary services should jumble out our stated devotions.

Lastly, Though all these services were required to be presented by the body of the congregation, at the common charge, yet, beside these, particular persons were to glorify God with their vows and their freewill-offerings, v. 39. When God commanded that this they must do, he left room for the generosity of their devotion, a great deal more they might do; not inventing other worship, but abounding in these, as 2 Chron. 30. 23, 24. Large directions had been given, in Leviticus, concerning the offerings of all sorts that should be brought by particular persons, according to the providences of God concerning them, and the graces of God in them. Though every Israelite had an interest in these common sacrifices, yet he must not think that these will serve instead of his vows and his freewill-offerings. Thus, our ministers praying with us, and for us, will not excuse us from praying for ourselves.

CHAP. XXX.

In this chapter, we have a law concerning vows, which had been mentioned in the close of the foregoing chapter. I. Here is a general rule laid down, that all vows must be carefully performed, v. 1, 2. II. Some particular exceptions to this rule. 1. That the vows of daughters should not be binding, unless allowed by the father, v. 3. .5. Nor, 2. The vows of wives, unless allowed by the husbands, v. 6. .16.

1. AND Moses spake unto the heads of the tribes concerning the children of Israel, saying, This is the thing which the LORD hath commanded. 2. If a man vow a vow unto the LORD, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond; he shall not break his word, he shall do according to all that proceedeth out of his mouth.

This law was delivered to the heads of the tribes, that they might instruct those who were under their charge, explain the law to them, give them necessary cautions, and call them to account, if there were occasion, for the breach of their vows. Perhaps the heads of the tribes did, upon some emergency of this kind, consulted Moses, and desired, by him, to know the mind of God, and here they are told it. This is the thing which the LORD has commanded concerning vows, and it is a command still in force.

1. The case supposed, is, that a person vows a vow unto the LORD, making God a party to the promise, and designing his honour and glory in it. The matter of the vow is supposed to be something lawful: no man can be, by his own promise, bound to do that which he is already, by the divine precept, prohibited to do. Yet it is supposed to be something which, in such and such measures and degrees, was not a necessary duty antecedent to the vow. A person might vow to bring such and such sacrifices at certain times; to give such a sum, or such a proportion, in alms; to forbear such meats and drinks which the law allowed; to fast and afflict the soul (which is specified, v. 13.) at other times beside the day of atonement. And many similar vows might be made, either in an extraordinary heat of holy zeal, or in humiliation for some sin committed, or for the prevention of sin, in pursuit of some mercy desired, or in gratitude for some mercy received. It is of great use to make such vows as these, provided they be made in sincerity, and with due caution. Vows (say the Jewish doctors) are the hedge of separation, that is, a fence to religion. He that vows is here said to bind his soul with a bond. It is a vow to God, who is a Spirit, and to him the soul, with all its powers, must be bound. A promise to man is a bond upon his estate, but a promise to God is a bond upon the soul. Our sacramental vows, by which we are bound to no more than what was before our duty, and which neither father nor husband can disannul, are bonds upon the soul, and by them we must feel ourselves bound out from all sin, and bound up to the whole will of God. Our occasional vows concerning that which before was in our own power, Acts, 5. 4. when they are made, are bonds upon the soul likewise.

2. The command given, is, that these vows be conscientiously performed. He shall not break his word, though afterward he may change his mind, but he shall do according to what he has said. Margin, He shall not change his word. Vowing is an ordinance of God; if we vow in hypocrisy, we profane that ordinance: it is plainly determined, Better not vow, than vow and not pay, Eccl. 5. 5. Be not deceived, God is not mocked. His promises to us are yea and amen, let not our's to him be yea and nay.

3. If a woman also vow a vow unto the LORD, and bind herself by a bond, being in her father's house in her youth; 4. And her father hear her vow, and her bond wherewith she hath bound her soul, and her father shall hold his peace at her: then all her vows shall stand, and every bond wherewith she hath bound her soul shall stand.

5. But if her father disallow her in the day that he heareth; not any of her vows, or of her bonds wherewith she hath bound her soul, shall stand: and the LORD shall forgive her, because her father disallowed her. 6. And if she had at all an husband, when she vowed, or uttered ought out of her lips, wherewith she bound her soul; 7. And her husband heard it, and held his peace at her in the day that he heard it: then her vows shall stand, and her bonds wherewith she bound her soul shall stand. 8. But if her husband disallowed her on the day that he heard it; then he shall make her vow which she vowed, and that which she uttered with her lips, wherewith she bound her soul, of none effect: and the LORD shall forgive her. 9. But every vow of a widow, and of her that is divorced, wherewith they have bound their souls, shall stand against her. 10. And if she vowed in her husband's house, or bound her soul by a bond with an oath; 11. And her husband heard it, and held his peace at her, and disallowed her not: then all her vows shall stand, and every bond wherewith she bound her soul shall stand. 12. But if her husband hath utterly made them void on the day he heard them; then whatsoever proceeded out of her lips concerning her vows, or concerning the bond of her soul, shall not stand: her husband hath made them void; and the LORD shall forgive her. 13. Every vow, and every binding oath to afflict the soul, her husband may establish it, or her husband may make it void. 14. But if her husband altogether hold his peace at her from day to day; then he establisheth all her vows, or all her bonds, which are upon her: he confirmeth them, because he held his peace at her in the day that he heard them. 15. But if he shall any ways make them void after that he hath heard them; then he shall bear her iniquity. 16. These are the statutes, which the LORD commanded Moses, between a man and his wife, between the father and his daughter, being yet in her youth in her father's house.

It is here taken for granted, that all such persons as are sui juris—at their own disposal, and are likewise of sound understanding and memory, are bound to perform whatever they vow that is lawful and possible; but, if the person vowing were under the dominion, and at the disposal, of another, the case is different.

I. The case of a daughter in her father's house; and, some think, probably enough, that it extends to a son likewise, while he is at home with his father, and under tutors and governors. Whether the exception may thus be stretched, I cannot say. Non est distinguendum, ubi lex non distinguit—We are not allowed to make distinctions which the law does not. The rule is general. If a man vow, he must pay. But, for a daughter, it is express: her vow is ambulatory, and in suspense, till her father knows it, and (it is supposed) knows it from her; for, when it comes to his knowledge, it is in his power either to ratify or nullify it. But, in favour of the vow, 1. Even his silence shall suffice to ratify it, v. 4. If he hold his peace, her vows shall stand. Qui tacet, consentire videtur—Silence gives consent. Hereby he allows his daughter the liberty she has assumed, and, as long as he says nothing against her vow, she shall be bound by it. But, 2. His protestation against it shall perfectly disannul it; because it is possible that such vow may be prejudicial to the affairs of the family, break the father's measures, perplex the provision made for his table, (if the vow related to meats,) or lessen the provision made for his children, if the vow would be more expensive than his estate would bear; however, it was certain that it was an infringement of his authority over his child, and, therefore, if he disallow it, she is discharged, and the Lord shall forgive her, that is, she shall not be charged with the guilt of violating her vow; she shewed her good-will in making the vow, and, if her intentions therein were sincere, she shall be accepted; and to obey her father shall be accounted better than sacrifice. This shews what a deference children owe to their parents, and how much they ought to honour them, and be obedient to them. It is for the interest of the public that the paternal authority be supported; for, when children are countenanced in their disobedience to their parents, (as they were by the tradition of the elders, Matth. 15. 5, 6.) they soon become, in other things, children of Belial. If this law be not to be extended to childrens' marrying without their parents' consent, so far as to put it in parents' power to null the marriage, and dissolve the obligation, (as some have thought it does,) yet certainly it proves the sinfulness of it, and obliges the children, that have thus done foolishly, to repent, and humble themselves before God and their parents.

II. The case of a wife is much the same. As for a woman that is a widow, or divorced, she has neither father nor husband to controul her, so that whatever vows she binds her soul with, they shall stand against her, v. 9. it is at her peril if she run back; but a wife, who has nothing that she can strictly call her own, but with her husband's allowance, cannot, without that, make any such vow.

1. The law is plain in case of a wife that continues so long after the vow. If her husband allow her vow, though only by silence, it stands, v. 6, 7. If he disallow it, since her obligation to that which she had vowed arose purely from her own act, and not from any prior command of God, her obligation to her husband shall take place of it, for to him she ought to be in subjection, as unto the Lord; and now it is so far from being her duty to fulfil her vow, that it would be her sin to disobey her husband, whose consent, perhaps, she ought to have asked before she had made the vow; therefore she needs forgiveness, v. 8.

2. The law is the same in case of a wife that soon after becomes a widow, or is put away. Though, if she return to her father's house, she does not therefore so come again under his authority, as that he has power to disannul her vows, v. 9. yet, if the vow was made while she was in the house of her husband, and her husband disallowed it, it was made void, and of no effect, for ever, and she does not return under the law of her vow when she is loosed from the law of her husband. This seems to be the
